Preface.

IN preparing this history of Washington County, we have kept in view the fact that since any former history was written a generation has passed away. The 19th century has been completed with all its records. It is therefore fitting that a history, which extends over parts of three centuries, should devote a larger proportion of space to the first half of the 19th century; to that period, when the various elements of our population were blending into one people.

In the early part of the last century, the great lessons to be learned were not how to repress a savage foe, but how to make our county a productive economic unit in our State and nation. We have, therefore, devoted much space to a description of the attempts to establish various forms of industry and of the long struggle to secure lines of commerce by water and land. In this, as well as in the history of political contests, we have given the story as far as possible in the very words of contemporaries. Washington County is very fortunate in having within her borders many persons who have carefully preserved manuscripts, newspapers, and other documents bearing upon the early history. From these we have copied very freely. In these records, we believe, the descendants of those who took an active part in making the history of Washington County in the 18th and 19th centuries have no reason to be ashamed of the story.

It is impossible to name all the kind friends who have assisted us in the preparation of this work. Mr. Archer B. Hulbert, who has already won distinction in the historical field, contributed the first and second chapters and assisted in the compilation of some of the others. For the revision of the chapter about the bench and bar, we are indebted to Mr. J. A. Gallaher; for the history of the early judiciary, to Mrs. Lillian T. Wood; for the chapter on the press, to Mr. George M. Cooke; and for the chapter on Marietta in the past two decades, to Mr. John W. Lansley. Mr. S. J. Hathaway has carefully revised his elaborate military history, which he prepared 25 years ago, and has brought it up to date, adding a concise history of the Spanish-American War. We are indebted to Mrs. Bertha G. Ballard, for a sketch of Belpre; to Mr. John D. Hallinger, for a description of Adams township; to Mr. A. D. Hopper for a description of Matamoras; and to Miss Virginia V. Dodge, for many items concerning both the early and the later history of Waterford township and the town of Beverly.

The biographical department, over which the historical editor had no supervision, will in his opinion prove hereafter the most valuable part of the whole book. Could we have such complete biographies of all the men who came to the Muskingum before 1890 it would be worth many times the cost of this volume. The biographies prepared in this volume have been carefully revised by friends or relatives and their pages will increase in value as the years pass by.

— NOTE. —

All the biographical sketches published in this volume were submitted to their respective subjects or to the subscribers, for whom the facts were primarily obtained, for their approval or correction before going to press; and a reasonable time was allowed in each case for the return of the typewritten copies. Most of them were returned to us within the time allotted, or before the work was printed, after being corrected or revised; and these may therefore be regarded as reasonably accurate.

A few, however, were not returned to us; and, as we have no means of knowing whether they contain errors or not, we cannot vouch for their accuracy. In justice to our readers, and to render this work more valuable for reference purposes, we have indicated these uncorrected sketches by a small asterisk (*), placed immediately after the name of the subject. They will all be found on the last pages of the book.

THE OLD WEST.

It must be next to impossible for one in this day to realize what a tangled wilderness this West was a century and a half ago. "The thing which puzzles us," writes W. H. H. Murray, "is not the past, but the future; not the door which has been shut, but the strange door which has never been opened. * * * For who, though knocking with reddened knuckles against it, may start even an echo?" True words, indeed; yet were the task put to us, it is to be seriously doubted if we of untrained imagination could not draw a truer picture of this land as it will appear a century hence than we could conjure up of the land as it appeared a century ago. Suppose the latter picture could be true to all intents and purposes, bush and tree, the wallowings of the plunging buffalo, the ways of the wild animals tunneled through the tangled maze of bush and vine—true, in short, to the groundwork, would it faithfully picture the tangled tops of the giant trees, where a more intricate network of Nature's handiwork might have been seen than on the ground? Who, but one acquainted with primeval forests, can picture the straggling branches of the giant trees reaching out into the ethereal battle ground to a last death grapple with its hoary rivals, both weighed down by luxuriant masses of moss and tangled vine? Records of early pioneers affirm that when this forest was first invaded by the woodman's ax it was found to be one thing to cut a tree's trunk, but quite another thing to dislodge its top from the network of forest overgrowth, from which giant trees have been known to hang suspended in mid air after their trunks were severed. Felling of trees often began at the top; boys were sent up to strip the branches before the trunk was cut. Where are the trees the like of which Washington found on the Ohio near the Great Kanawha with a diameter of over 14 feet?

What a sight the woodland rivers must have been! Think of the plunder of the forests which the Wabash and Kentucky at flood-tide must have carried on their boiling bosoms. Picture the gigantic gorges of forest trees, blocked in their wild course down the Alleghany and piled in monstrous and grotesque confusion from bank to bank, forcing even the river itself to find a new course through the forests. And so the vistas seen on our rivers to-day could not have been so beautiful in the old days; perhaps they were never visible on the lesser streams. For the continuous falling of the solid walls of trees which lined both banks must have well-nigh roofed over the smaller streams completely over, and the venturesome trapper in his canoe must have found the fear of falling trees added to his other fears. When Gen. Moses Cleveland attempted to ascend the Cuyahoga in a boat from Lake Erie, the great quantity of fallen trees compelled him to desist from the undertaking. An early pioneer to Kentucky, in giving directions to prospective voyagers down the Ohio River, warns them against rowing at night, as the noise of the oars would prevent them hearing the "riffing" of the water about the rocks and sunken logs which made river traveling, especially on swift streams, difficult and dangerous.

Nor have our rivers always held the position in respect to size which they relatively hold to-day. It is doubtful if one who knew the swift Monongahela would recognize the placid, turbid, faithful river which bears that name to-day. As though these streams of ours recognize in some way that they must needs conform to the state of civilization which they see about them, and may not run wild and free as when amenable only to the caprice of a savage aborigine! Of course the greater difference would be discoverable in such rivers as have been bound in locks and dams, and deepened by the dredge. Such was the rapidity of the current of many of our streams that the time now made by swift packets is more than double the time taken by canoes in the days before slackwater navigation. With the damming of these streams local history, in all our States, has lost many landmarks well known in the earliest days of navigation. On the Alleghany River, as on the Susquehanna on the eastern side of the mountains, rocks upon which the Indians inscribed their hieroglyphics are now so embedded that these inscriptions are visible only at low tide, and indeed in some cases are never seen above the surface of the water. Of all streams the majestic Ohio, alone, moves on much as of old; and, though many islands have passed from sight, there is hardly a mile in all her course which does not recall, in name, the days when that river was the great highway through the hunting ground of the Iroquois and of the race of "men who wore hats" who came upon its tides to found the empires which today exist along its sweeping shores. And yet the Ohio is soon to undergo great changes which will materially alter its aspect. Surveys for dams are being made, which, when completed, will give a minimum depth of six feet between locks.

The animal life of the forests one can fancy, perhaps, with more accuracy than any other characteristic, for the deer and turkey, the wolf and buffalo of that day have their antitypes in ours. And yet here one might fall short, for few recall the vast flocks of pigeons which swarmed above the primeval forest, even darkening the heavens as though a cloud had passed, and blighting the trees in which they spent a night. An early traveler in the West has left record that from a single hollow tree several wagon-loads of feathers have been extracted.

THE MOUND BUILDERS.

The history of this West is a long history of war, from the earliest days even to our own century. This territory between the Alleghenies and the Mississippi is one of the greatest battlefields in the world. It is certainly the oldest and most renowned in our America. The first of our race to enter it looked with wondering eyes upon the monstrous earthen forts of a prehistoric race whom we have named from the relics they left behind the "Mound Builders." Of this race the Indians knew nothing, save what the legends handed down by their fathers told of a race of giants which was driven out of the Central West, and sent flying down the Ohio and Mississippi to reappear no more in human history. Antiquarians find that these forts and mauseoleums reveal little in addition to the bloody story told by crude implements of war, of Old, unhappy, out of strings,

And battle-borne age.

In certain instances great piles of human bones are found at strategic reventment angles where heaviest attack was made and stoutest resistance encountered. Here bones are sometimes found pierced by death-dealing arrow-heads. What power hurled the flints of these warriors of prehistoric days? The Indian legend, that they were giants in strength, is easily believed. Nowhere else on the continent are found such forts as were built by these ancient defenders of the Central West.

MOUNDS AT MARIETTA.

The ancient works at Marietta occupied the "plain" and were included within the territory north of Putnam street and east of Third (with the exception of the graded way, extending down to the lower river terrace, at a point between Second and Front streets).

These works consisted originally of two enclosures (irregular squares, one of which contained about forty and the other twenty acres), together with several truncated pyramids or elevated platforms of earth, the graded way, the great mound now enclosed in the cemetery, several embankments flanking it, and numerous lesser tumuli. The portions of this interesting group of works remaining on the two truncated pyramids known as Quadranaou and Capitolium, and the mere bed or bottom of the graded way, Sacra Via.

When the settlement was made at Marietta these works were covered with a heavy forest. "When I arrived," says Dr. Cutler, "the ground was in part cleared, but many large trees remained on the walls and mounds. The only possible data for forming any probable conjecture respecting the antiquity of these works, I conceived, must be derived from the growth upon them. By the concentric circles, each of which denotes the annual growth, the age of the trees might be ascertained. For this purpose a number of trees were felled; and in the presence of Governor St. Clair and many other gentlemen, the number of circles was carefully counted. The trees of the greatest size were hollow. In the largest of those which were found there were from three to four hundred circles. One tree, somewhat decayed at the center, was found to contain at least 463 circles. Its age was undoubtedly more than 463 years. Other trees in a growing state were, from their appearance, much older. There were likewise the strongest marks of a previous growth, as large as the present. Decayed stumps could be traced at the surface of the ground, on different parts of the works, which measured from six to eight feet in diameter. In one of the angles of a square a decayed stump measured eight feet in diameter at the surface of the ground; and though the body of the tree was so mouldered as scarcely to be perceived above the surface of the earth, we were able to trace the decayed wood under the leaves and rubbish for nearly a hundred feet. A thrifty beech, containing 136 circles, appeared to have first vegetated within the space that had been occupied by an ancient predecessor of a different kind of wood."

Upon the hypothesis that the growth which he saw had occupied 463 years, and that it had been preceded by one of equal size and age, Dr. Cutler estimated that at least 900 years had elapsed since the works had been deserted by the people who constructed them.

We may remark in this connection that Clavigero, in his "History of Mexico," says that the emigration of the Toltecs commenced from their native country about the middle of the Sixth century.

The larger of the two square (or nearly square) fortifications, of which we have spoken, was commonly called by the early inhabitants of Marietta "The Town." The walls were, at the time when first observed and measured, from six to 10 feet in height, and from 25 to 35 feet broad at the base. Through these walls there were, upon three sides, three openings or gateways, of which the central ones were the largest. The central one in the front, facing the Muskingum, was 150 feet wide. Immediately in front of this great gateway, and leading from it toward the river, its walls running at right angles to those of "The Town," was the immense graded way, sometimes called the covert, or covered way, and named by some pioneer, of classical education, Sacra Via. This was a broad avenue, excavated so as to descend by a perfect grade to the lower or latest formed terrace of the Muskingum, at the foot of which it is supposed the stream flowed when the work was constructed. The grade remains, but the walls, thrown up at either side have long since been demolished. They began at a distance of 60 feet from the gateway, were exactly parallel, and 680 feet long. They were 150 feet apart at their bases, 230 feet at their summits, and the broad "way" between them was rounded and raised like a modern city street. At the base of the grade the walls were 21 feet in perpendicular height, measuring from the inside, while at the same point upon the outside they were from eight to 10 feet high, and much less at the upper end of the avenue. This portion of the Marietta works alone would be a stupendous achievement, in the present age; and in the era when it was executed must have been a marvel of engineering and have required the patient, long-continued toil of a vast number of men. Not less remarkable were the four squares or truncated pyramids (of which the two principal ones have been preserved), enclosed within the walls of the ancient town. The largest of these, the Quadranaou, the location of which is now best described by saying that it is upon the west side of Fourth street, north of Warren, was in the northwest corner of the great enclosure. It was described by Squier and Davis in 1847 as being 188 feet long by 132 feet wide, and 10 feet high. Its apparent height is now a little less than this figure. It contains more than a quarter of a million cubic feet of earth. At the center of each of the four sides the earth projects, forming gradual and easy ascents to the top. The elevated square, next in importance, is the Capitolium, which is situated upon the northwest corner of Washington and Fifth streets. The southern wall of "The Town" originally extended along Washington street, very near the Capitolium. This elevated square is 150 feet long by 120 feet wide, and is about eight feet high. Upon three sides are projections or inclined ways leading to the level platform, but upon the south side the graded ascent is a recess, the measurements of which are equal to those of the projections, or about 20 feet in width by 40 feet in length. East of this square there was originally another and a smaller one, which was known in earlier days as St. Cecelia. It was a truncated pyramid, similar in general characteristics to the Quadranaou and Capitolium, 120 feet long by 50 feet wide and five or six feet high. It had graded ascents only at the ends. In the northern angle of the enclosure was another rectangular elevation, which was never of as great a height as the others, and, unlike them, had no ascents.

The purpose for which these elevated squares and the great graded way leading down to the Muskingum can, of course, only be conjectured. The former, it has been generally thought by students of archæology, were designed as the sites of temples, and were constructed of perishable material, long since crumbled into dust. The surface of the elevated squares which we have described is perfectly level, except where it has been upheaved by the roots of falling trees, or burrowing animals. The squares bear a close resemblance to the Teocalli of Mexico, upon which temples still stand. In Ohio there are but few of these peculiar formations in connection with the great groups of works, and, in fact, besides the Marietta squares there are none, except at Portsmouth, Newark, and in the vicinity of Chillicothe. At no one of these localities are the squares as large as those we have here described. Works of this kind occur more frequently in the South, and investigators, who have traveled down the Valley of the Mississippi and thence into Mexico, report that there is exhibited quite a uniform and constant increase in the size of the squares until they lead up to the mighty temple-crowned Teocalli in the land of Montezuma. Upon the other hand, as we journey southward we find a decrease in the size and in the number of enclosures of similar nature to those which abound in Ohio.

We have so far said but little of the smaller of the two enclosures which existed at Marietta. As we have said, its area was about 20 acres. This area is now about equally divided north and south by Wooster street, and lies above Fourth street. This enclosure, which formed the connection in the great system of the Marietta works, between the larger enclosure and the great mound, was many years ago obliterated. Its walls were never as high as those of the larger enclosure called "The Town." There were openings or gateways at the center of each side and at the corners, which were defended by mounds. It is conjectured that these two enclosures were not designed for defense, although they may of course have served that purpose. The ditch or fosse which often occurs in connection with the walls of similar enclosures was wanting here, but it is not improbable that palisades were planted upon the top of the embankments.

The most reasonable hypothesis to be adopted in accounting for the construction of the so-called "forts" is that they were simply enclosures designed to protect the temples and the sacred altars of the ancient people from the profane gaze or touch of an alien race, or to guard them from desecration by animals. They may also have served as the place for great civic or religious assemblages, or the practice of something analogous to the Olympian games. Very likely they contained the residences of the priests or rulers of the people.

Most of the earth of which the so-called "forts" were constructed must have been taken evenly from the surface of the ground within and around them, although excavations commonly designated as "dug holes" were at an early day observable in several places not far from the works. Several of these have been supposed to be wells, funnel-shaped like those in eastern countries, so that the water carriers could go down into them.

The large mound now inclosed in the cemetery, the most interesting feature of the Marietta group of works, remains to be described. It is not larger than some others in Ohio, but is probably higher in proportion to its base measurement, and is unique in its accessories of embankment and fosse. It is 30 feet in height and its base is 115 feet in diameter. It is surrounded by a ditch about 15 feet wide and four feet deep, outside of which is a wall about four feet high, and twenty feet or more in breadth. There is an opening in this wall upon the north side and a filling in the fosse, each about 20 feet in width. The surrounding wall and ditch do not form a perfect circle, but an ellipse, the longer diameter of which is 230 feet, and the shorter 215 feet. Originally there were a number of fragmentary walls of slight elevation west and south of the great mound, forming an imperfect re-enclosure.

There was also a wall extending from a point near the filling of the fosse toward the south embankment of a smaller enclosure.

The mound was described by Squier and Davis in 1847 as being truncated. It so appears at present and the memory of the oldest inhabitant cannot recall a time when it was otherwise. The writer, however, has reason to believe that the mound, as originally constructed, was a perfect mammalian. The Marietta mound is, doubtless, a sepulchral mound, and it is probable that it contains (or did once contain) two chambers like the great mound at the mouth of Grave Creek, in West Virginia—one chamber being situated upon a level with the surrounding plain, and the other midway between the base and the apex of the mound. The flattening of the top may have been caused by the crushing in of one or both of these chambers (the chambers are in most cases constructed of timber), or by the uprooting of the great oak which Dr. Cutler's journal tells us stood upon the top in 1788. It is not generally known that the mound has been partially excavated, but such is the fact. Dr. Cutler, as quoted by Mr. Harris, says that "an opening being made at the summit of the great conic mound" (and it is worthy of note that he uses the word conic) "there were found the bones of an adult in a horizontal position, covered with a flat stone. Beneath this skeleton were three stones placed vertically at small and different distances, but no bones were discovered. That this venerable monument might not be defaced, the opening was closed without further search." The skeleton found was doubtless not lower down than the middle of the mound, that is to say, 15 feet from the apex. In every one of the few large mounds excavated, which have a chamber near the top, there has been found another at the base, and hence there is presumptive evidence that the bones of some mighty personage of the ancient race lie as they were originally deposited in an unknown age, amidst the pomp and splendor of strange and superstitious rites. While this mound is undoubtedly monumental in its character, its unique accessory formations—the fosse and wall—would suggest that the builders had in view some other purpose than the rearing of a massive sepulchre. It may have been utilized as a place for the observance of religious ceremonies.

Small mounds are usually to be found upon the hills overlooking the larger works in the valleys. These are not wanting at Marietta. Harmar Hill and the other eminences in the vicinity of the great group we have described are crowned with them and they occur at intervals along the whole length of the Muskingum Valley, and also those of the Tuscarawas and the Ohio. It is conjectured that these mounds served the purpose of coignes of vantage from which the approach of an enemy could be descried, and also that they were signal stations from which beacon lights have flashed forth at night and columns of smoke arisen in the daytime as warnings of impending danger, or the means of conveying quickly other information. It will be found that from one of these mounds upon the valley wall, another similar mound can nearly always be seen, and that the second commands a third, and so on. It is probable that these mounds formed systems extending along the valleys and across the country.

There are in Washington County many small works and mounds, the most interesting of which are mentioned in the histories of the localities in which they occur. It is scarcely necessary to say that there are none which approach in magnitude the ancient remains at Marietta.

The pioneers of Marietta exhibited a laudable disposition to preserve the strange monuments left by a prehistoric people, and although much has necessarily been swept from existence, the most interesting portions of the great system have been preserved, and nearly in the condition in which they were found. While the Goths and Vandals at Circleville were razing to the ground the wonderful works which gave their town its name, the citizens of Marietta were taking steps not only to guard against the immediate obliteration of the remains within the town plat, but to secure their protection for all time. The names which have been used in this chapter, Quadranau, Capitolium and Sacra Via, were bestowed upon the several works during the year 1788. A little later the Ohio Company passed the following resolution, which was the first measure adopted looking toward the preservation of the ancient works:

Resolved, That Colonel Ruffelle, Colonel Gray, and Major S. be and they be constituted a committee to survey the several public squares of the State, to plant the Roman Forum and General Greene respectively the trees which the great mound stand, the Quadranau and Capitolium, for as long a time as they are not wanted for the uses for which they were reserved. The committee are to point out the mode of improvement for ornament, and in what manner the ancient works shall be preserved, and also to ascertain the amount of what is to be given.

In March, 1791, the Company decided to lease Public Square No. 1 (Marie Antoinette), containing the great mound, to Rufus Putnam for 12 years, on condition that he should set out trees and make other improvements. On similar terms it was proposed to lease Square No. 2 (Capitolium), to Dudley Woodbridge for eight years, and Square No. 3 (Quadranau), to Benjamin Tupper for 10 years. It was resolved at the same time that Sacra Via be not leased, but that General Putnam should retain control of it, seed it down, plant trees upon it, etc. It was specified that the trees to be set out on the ancient works were to be of native growth. Subsequently Rufus Putnam, Paul Fearing, and Dr. Jabez True were appointed trustees to take charge of the public squares until the town should become incorporated, and lease them to proper persons, the avails of the rent to be applied to the education of indigent orphans.

The large trees growing upon the Quadranau are all of second growth and were set out in accordance with the requirements of the Ohio Company. This work, or rather the question of its preservation and the right of the lessee to obliterate or deface it, was the subject of a very warm controversy in 1820. The square containing the Quadranau had been leased to D. Hartshorn and he had transferred the right of possession to Rev. Joseph Willard. He began plowing down the truncated pyramid and the citizens protested. Caleb Emerson, who was a member of the Council, was active in opposing Willard's action. The Council removed the square from Willard's possession and leased it to C. D. G. Bonny, and a number of citizens turned out and repaired the damage done by the plowing. A discussion of the merits of the case was carried on for some months in the newspapers between a writer who signed himself "Fair Play," and Mr. Willard, and the case was carried into the court, where it was decided in favor of the town. The Council claimed the square as a reservation granted to the town for public works, or public buildings, and for the benefit of indigent orphan children.

The public squares had not been fenced, up to 1837, and some damage had been caused to the ancient works, but in the year mentioned the citizens raised a sufficient sum of money to repair the injuries effected and to build fences around the squares. Ichabod Nye and Thomas Vinton were appointed by the Council as a committee to make the needed improvements and restorations. The large mound has, perhaps, been injured more than either of the other remains, the water having washed the sides where the earth was loosened by the feet of climbers. The uneven places were filled, the defective trees cut down, and the entire surface of the mound sown with grass. In order that the symmetry of the mound should not again be impaired by the displacement of earth consequent upon many persons climbing up its steep sides, a flight of stone steps was constructed by which the summit could be easily gained. The mound has since been kept, in the best possible condition, as have also the other remains.

THE GREAT PATEL GROUND OF AMERICA.

Throughout the 18th century this West was a continual battle-ground. To it both France and England, in turn, clung with equal determination, and both tested the foolish experiment of attempting to win it back, when once it was lost, by means of the Indians who made it their lair.

THE HUNTING GROUNDS OF THE IROQUOIS.

When the first explorers entered the West, early in the 18th century, it was found to be the princely hunting ground of the Iroquois, better known as the Six Nations. Of all American Indians the Iroquois were ever pre-eminent, invincible. The proud races of the furthest South had felt the weight of their tomahawks and the nations that camped about the shores of Lake St. John "kept their sentinels pushed well southward in dread of their fierce invasion." As conquerors of half a continent, the choicest hunting grounds were theirs, and so the forests, divided by the Oyo (Ohio), which took its rise in the Iroquois homeland south of Lake Ontario, was the nation's choice.

The hunting grounds of an Indian nation were not, in the nature of the case, located near the nation's homeland. The forests near Indian villages soon became devoid of game, and the hunters were compelled to seek it at an increasing greater distance from home. And so it became customary for the stronger nations and confederacies to obtain by conquest or unopposed occupation, great tracts of distant forests which should be their own peculiar property and into which vagrant hunters of other nations came only on peril of their lives. These hunting grounds were as stable and well defined as a nation's homeland itself, and, as among the Bedouin nations of the Levant, the degree of the conqueror's victory over his adversary was measured by the number of sheep and camel purloined, so the victory of one Indian nation over another was measured, in part, by the extent of new hunting grounds in which it might thereafter roam without challenge. The hunting grounds were an Indian nation's pride and came first in the nation's category. And so the "Happy Hunting Ground," alive with game, which no ruthless conqueror could wrest away, was the red man's happiest conception for a life everlasting.

Still, during Iroquois sovereignty over the Central West, it is not probable that they alone knew of the treasures of buffalo and turkey and pike which the land and its streams contained. In the far West the Iroquois left the Miami's nation undisturbed in their old home between the Miami and the Wabash. Ottawas, "traders" from the North, who had never built a fire beside more splendid streams than the Central West contained, were at times vagrant, frightened, visitors to the lands between the Great Lakes and the Oyo. Other scattered remnants of Indian nations are rumored to have built fires in the hunting grounds of the Iroquois; if so they hid their charred embers in the leaves, to obliterate all proofs of their sly incursions.

Ever and anon, from the Iroquois homeland, came great armies into the West in search of game. Launching their painted canoes on the headwaters of the Oyo (now the Alleghany and Ohio), they came down with the flood tides of the spring and fall and scattered into all the rivers of the forest,—the Kanawha, Muskingum, Scioto, Kentucky, Miami and Wabash. Other canoes came up Lake Ontario to Lake Erie and passed up the Cuyahoga and down the Muskingum, or up the Sandusky and down the Scioto, or up the Miami-of-the-Lakes and down the Wabash. Then were the forests filled with shouting, and a hundred great fires illuminated the primeval shadows. After the hunters came the warriors in brightly colored canoes, their paddles sweeping in perfect unison. And woe to the arrogant southern nation whose annual tribute had failed to come! Down to the South the warriors sped, to return with terrible proofs of their prowess, leaving upon the rocks in the rivers haughty symbols of their victories.

WEAKENING OF THE IROQUOIS CONFEDERACY.

But, at last, the supremacy of the arrogant

Six Nations was challenged, and the territory over which they were hunters began to grow smaller instead of greater. The white men came to America. Their "new" empires were being erected on the continent. "New Spain" arose to the south; "New Sweden" was spoken of and "New Amsterdam" on Long Island Sound; "New England" was heard of between the St. Lawrence and the Atlantic Ocean, and "New France" was founded amid the Canadian snows, with its capital on the tumbling river of St. Laurant.

Though both came from beyond the same ocean the Iroquois found that there was a great difference between the founders of "New England" and the founders of "New France." The former settled down quietly, bought land, cleared it and raised crops. They treated the Indian very respectfully—paying little attention to him or his land. The French, however, were different. There was no end to their running about. Their arrival was scarcely noised abroad before they were seen hurrying up the inland rivers on missions of various import.

And so the Iroquois came to hate the French, especially after their first encounter with them on the shores of Lake Champlain, when the white captain fired off a horrid arquebuse which killed two chieftains and wounded another, and liked to have scared the whole Indian army to death. This hatred was augmented as the French made friends with the Algonquin tribes of the lower St. Lawrence who, having fled from before the Iroquois warriors like dust before the wind, now, in revenge, piloted the French up the Ottawa and showed them a way to enter the Great Lakes of the Iroquois by the back door, Georgian Bay! Once acquainted with the five Great Lakes, the French were even less satisfied than before, and down into the hunting grounds of the Iroquois they plunged in search of a great river and a sea which would lead to China. Already they had named the portage around one of the St. Lawrence Rapids "La Chine," believing that the river led "to China"

—a country of which the farthest western nations, the fierce Chippewas and Dacotahs, even, had never heard!

As the 18th century grew older the Iroquois became too busy with affairs of war and diplomacy and trade to come each year to their western hunting grounds and guard them with the ancient jealousy. Situated as they were between the French and English settlements, they found a neutral role difficult to maintain and they became fitfully allied now with the Albany, now with the Quebec governments, as each struggled to gain possession of the great Northern fur trade which was under the dominating influence of the Six Nations, who controlled the Ottawa, St. Lawrence and all the New York rivers.

THE STORY OF THE DELAWARES, SHAWANESSE AND WYANDOTS.

The hunting grounds of the Iroquois were too delightful a land to remain long unoccupied. Had Providence willed that these forests in and west of the Appalachian mountain system should have continued to be unoccupied until the white man came to possess it, many of the darkest pages of American history could never have been written. But the very reverse of this happened. Not only was it filled with Indians, but there came to it from far distant homes, as if chosen by fate, three of the most desperate Indian nations on the continent, each having been made ready, seemingly, by long years of oppression and tyranny, for the bloody work of holding this West from the white man. The three nations found by the first explorers in the abandoned hunting grounds of the Iroquois had been fugitives on the face of the earth for half a century, bandied about between the stronger confederacies like outcasts, denied refuge everywhere, pursued, persecuted, half destroyed. The story of any one of them is the story of the other two—a sad, desperate tale at the best.

These nations were the Shawanese, Delawares and Wyandots. The centers of population which they formed were on the Scioto, Muskingum and Sandusky rivers, respectively. And, with the fierce Miamis and the remnants of the Iroquois, these tribes fought the longest and most successful war ever waged by the red race in the history of the continent. From their lairs on the Alleghany, Scioto and Muskingum, they defied the white man for half a century, triumphing terribly at Braddock's defeat and St. Clair's, the greatest victories over the white man ever achieved by the red.

The first of these nations to enter the old hunting ground of the Iroquois was the Wyandot. Their home was about Sandusky Bay, and along the shores of the Sandusky River. Originally the Wyandots dwelt on the upper St. Lawrence, and were neighbors of the Seneca tribe of the Six Nations. As the result of a quarrel over a maiden, as legend has it, but more likely as the result of Iroquois conquest, the Wyandots were driven from their homes, vanishing westward into the land of the Hurons, who lived by the lake which bore their name. Here the brave Jesuit missionaries found them, where they were known as the "Tobacco Nation." The confederation of the Iroquois as the Six Nations sounded the doom of the Hurons, and with the Senecas at the head of the confederacy, only ruin stared the fugitive Wyandots in the face. By the beginning of the 18th century they had again fled westward, hopelessly seeking a new refuge. Some of the nation continued journeying even beyond the Sioux and Dacotahs to the "Backbone of the World," as they called the Rocky Mountains. There, tradition states, they found wanderers like themselves, who spoke a familiar language—Wyandots who had come hither long before to escape the revengeful Senecas! But the majority of the nation built great rafts and set afloat on the Detroit River. This was a reckless alternative to choose, but it brought the persecuted nation to their long-sought place of refuge. As they passed the present site of Detroit, they saw with amazement an array of white tents and soldiers dressed in white keeping watch. The Wyandots had found the French building De Troit, and fear of the Senecas vanished. On the shores of neighboring Sandusky Bay on Lake Erie the Wyandots built their fires, and the relations between them and the French were most cordial. The year of this memorable Wyandot hegira is given as 1701, which, fortunately, corresponds with the founding of Detroit.

When "Mad Anthony" Wayne was waging his last campaign against the Western Indians in 1794, he once summoned to him a knowing frontiersman and asked him if he could not capture an Indian in order to get some information concerning the enemy.

"Can you not capture one near Sandusky?" asked the General, as the man hesitated.

"No, not Sandusky," was the ready reply.

"And why not at Sandusky?"

"There are only Wyandots at Sandusky."

"Well, why won't a Wyandot do?" insisted the irrepressible Wayne.

"Because, sir," replied the woodsman "a Wyandot is never captured alive.

The story is typical of the Wyandots throughout all their history for a century—for it lacked but five years of a century when they signed the treaty at Greenville after General Wayne's campaign. Allied in the beginning, as we have seen, to the French, the Wyandots fought sturdily for their cause until New France was abandoned. Under Pontiac they joined in the plot to drive out the English from the West and win back the land for France. In turn they became attached to British interests at the breaking out of the Revolutionary War, and they were as true to the very last to them as they had been formerly to the French. Through their aid England managed to retain forts Sandusky, Miami and Detroit for 20 years after the close of the Revolution, despite the solemn pledges given in the treaty of Paris.

The Wyandots came from the far North. The second nation to enter the Alleghany forests was the Shawanese, who came from the far South. The Shawanese were the only American Indians who had even so much as a tradition of having come to this continent from across the ocean. Like that of the savage Wyandots, the history of the Shawanese before they settled down on the swift Scioto is a cheerless tale. Too proud to join one of the great Southern confederacies, if, indeed the opportunity was ever extended to them, they sifted northward through the forests from Florida until they settled between the Cumberland and Tennessee rivers. Here the earliest geographers found them and classified them as the connecting branch between the Algonquins of New England and the far Northwest, so different were they from their Southern neighbors. They remained but a short time by the Cumberland, for the Iroquois swept down upon them with a fury never exceeded by the Cherokees or Mobilians, and the fugitives scattered like leaves eastward toward the Alleghanies. By permission of the government of Pennsylvania, 70 families, perhaps 300 souls, settled down upon the Susquehanna at the beginning of the 18th century. By 1730 the number of Indian warriors in Pennsylvania was placed at 700, one-half of whom were said to be Shawanese. This would indicate a total population of perhaps 1,500 Shawanese. With the approach of the settlements of the white man and the opening of the bloody French and Indian War, they left the Susquehanna and pushed straight westward to the Scioto River valley beyond the Ohio.

The Shawanese have well been called the "Bedouins of the American Indians." The main body of the nation migrated from Florida to the Cumberland and Susquehanna and Scioto rivers. Fragmentary portions of the nation wandered elsewhere. Cadwallader Colden said in 1745 that one tribe of the Shawanese "had gone quite down to New Spain." When La Salle wished guides from Lake Ontario to the Gulf of Mexico in 1684, Shawanese were supplied him, it being as remarkable that they were Shawanese so far north (though they may have been prisoners among the Iroquois) as it was that they were acquainted with the Gulf of Mexico. In the Black Forest the Shawanese gained another and a well-earned reputation—of being the fiercest, most uncompromising Indian nation with which the white man ever dealt. They were for the half century which the Black Forest was their home and the Wyandots their allies, ever first for war and last for peace. Under their two terrible well-known chieftains, Cornstalk and Tecumseh, they were allied both with the French and with the British in the vain attempt to hold back the tide of civilization from the river valleys of the Central West. Missionary work among them proved a failure. They made treaties but to break them. Not an acre of all the land which lay south of them, Kentucky, but was drenched by blood they spilt. Incited by such hell-hounds as the Girty boys, there was no limit to which the Shawanese could not be pushed, and for it all they had been trained by instinct and tradition through numberless years of desperate ill-fortune.

The Wyandots and the Shawanese came from the North and South. The third nation which made the hunting grounds of the Iroquois its homeland came from the Eastern seaboard. The legendary history of the Lenni-Lenapes cannot be equaled, in point of romance in Indian history. Tradition states that they lived at a very early period west of the Mississippi River. Uniting with their neighbors, the Iroquois, the two nations began an eastward conquest which ended in driving the giant Alleghans, the Mound-Builders, from the alluvial valleys of the Scioto, Miami, Muskingum, Wabash, Kaskaskia, Cahokia and Illinois, where their mounds and ring forts were found, and dividing between them the Atlantic seaboard, the Iroquois taking the north and the Lenni-Lenapes settling in the valley of the Delaware, where they took the name of Delawares. But not long after this division had been effected, the spirit of jealousy arose. The Iroquois receiving arms from the Dutch who founded New Amsterdam (New York), became expert in the accomplishments of war,

The Delawares adapted themselves to peaceful modes of living, and their laden maize fields brought them rich returns for their labors. With the confederation of the Iroquois tribes into the Six Nations, the doom of the Delawares was sealed. By treachery or by main force the upstart "uncles" from the North fell to quarreling with their Southern "nephews." Seeing that nothing but ruin stared them in the face the Delawares began selling their land to the Dutch, the friends of their "Good Mignon" Penn. "How came you to take upon yourselves to sell land?" was the infuriated cry of the Iroquois, who sent by their orator, Cawassatiego, their ultimatum to the weakened Delawares. "You sell land in the dark. Did you ever tell us you sold land to them?"

*** We find you are none of our blood. Therefore we charge you to remove instantly. We assign you two places to go, either to Ugomon or Shamokin: Go!"

Disnayed, disgraced, the Delawares retired from the green maize fields which they loved and fell back, a crowd of disordered fugitives, into the Alleghany forests. Sifting through the forests, crowding the Shawanese before them, they at last crossed the Alleghany and settled down on the upper Muskingum about 1740. Here they lived for half a century, fighting with Villiers and Pontiac and Little Turtle. Here they were visited by armies and by missionaries who did noble work among them. The Delawares later fought against the armies of Harmar, St. Clair and Wayne, after they abandoned the valley which was first their home, and then sank hopelessly into the general rout of the broken tribes moving westward after the battles of Fallen Timbers and Tippecanoe. On the Kansas River and its tributaries the remnant of the once powerful Lenni-Lenapes range today over a territory of a million acres, still dreaming, it is said, of a time when they will again assume their historic position at the head of the Indian family. A great mass of tradition lives with them of their eastern conquest, the homes on the Delaware, Alleghany and Muskingum, where the poet had Evangeline visit them in her search for Gabriel. And still the massacre of Gnadenbrutten is told to wondering children in Delaware wigwams which dot the Ozark Mountains as they once dotted the Alleghany valleys.

The total number of Indians in the hunting ground of the Iroquois would be difficult to estimate. During the Revolutionary War, when the Central West was filled with an hundred fugitive tribes, a United States Commissioner reported the number of Indian warriors affiliated with the Iroquois as 3,100, divided as follows: Wyandots 300, Mingoes 600, Senecas 650, Mohawks 100, Cuyahogus 220, Onondagas 230, Oneidas and Tuscarawas 400, Ottawas 600; the other nations were given as follows: Chippewas 5,000, Pottawatomies 400; scattering, 800. Considering the Indian family as consisting of four persons, the total Indian population of the Central West would be 40,000, probably a very liberal estimate.

NOTES.

On the Plan of the Ancient Fortifications.

General Putnam has left very explicit notes about the plan of the ancient works as he found them in 1788. He says, "There are at least three kinds of works at Marietta as described on the plan, and designed for very different purposes. The walls A B C D and E F G H (the two large quadrangles covering the greater part of the high ground and lying between Putnam and Montgomery streets) were evidently erected for defense, and whoever views the figures 1, 2, &c., which are as level on top as a mosaic pavement, will not hesitate to pronounce that on them once stood some spacious buildings, and whoever considers the other figures, although he may be at a loss with respect to their use, he will have no difficulty in believing they were for purposes very different from either of the other kinds of work. Thus far, everyone who has viewed them, and, I will venture to say, whoever shall view them, will be of one opinion, but with respect to other matters everyone has his conjectures and I will give you mine.

"The chasms or openings in the walls by many are supposed to be intended for gateways, and no doubt but that they served partly for that purpose; but I think it highly probable that both these and the openings at the angles were supplied with wooden works, probably with something like bastions or projecting towers for the lodgment of the troops assigned for the defense of the place as well as the better to flank the curtains. It is observable in the square A B C D that from one opening to another the distance is no more than from 14 to 20 perches, the half of which distance must be the necessary flight of an arrow in order for a complete flank fire.

"As to the antiquity of these works they exceed all calculations, the size of trees growing on them being the same as on the other land.

"A B C D is the remains of an ancient wall or rampart of earth whose base is from 25 to 36 feet, and its height from four to eight feet. Figs. 5 and 6 are two parallel walls of earth distant from each other, from center to center, 14 perches, at e and f their perpendicular height is 21 feet and base 42 feet; at g and h their height is eight feet. This height was taken on the inside or between the two walls. On the outside they are nowhere more than five feet high.

"E F G H are walls or banks of earth. Their height and base were not taken by measure but they appear to be about 20 feet base and from three to five feet high."

CHAPTER II.

THREE FLAGS IN THE WEST

FRENCH EXPLORATIONS AND ESTABLISHMENT OF FRONTIER FORTS—ARMS OF THE KING OF FRANCE—FRENCH AND ENGLISH CHARACTER CONTRASTED—FRENCH AND INDIAN WAR—PONTIAC'S REBELLION—THE REVOLUTIONARY WAR IN THE WEST—MASSACRE OF GNADENHUTTEN.—NOTE.

FRENCH EXPLORATIONS AND ESTABLISHMENT OF FRONTIER FORTS.

In the year 1540, Jacques Cartier raised a white cross crowned with the fleur de lis of France upon an improvised altar of crossed canoe paddles at Québec, bearing the inscription "Franciscus primus, Dei gratia, Francorum Rex Regnat," and formally took possession of a new continent. Two centuries later, in the dawn of early morning, British soldiers wrested from the betrayed Montcalm the mist-enshrouded height where that emblazoned cross had stood and New France fell—"amid the proudest monuments of its own glory, and on the very spot of its origin."

All the American Indians soon found, as the Iroquois had, that nothing would do but these newly-come Frenchmen must run about over all the country. Each river must be ascended, the portages traversed and lakes crossed. Every hint of further rivers and lakes resulted forthwith in a thousand questions if not in the immediate formation of an exploring expedition.

And yet there was method in the madness of this running about. In the first place log forts were founded at various points, and when the world came to know even a fraction as much as the French did about the West, it found that these forts were situated at the most strategic points on the continent. For instance, there was Fort Frontenac, near the narrowing of Lake Ontario into the St. Lawrence. This fort commanded that river. Then there was Fort Niagara, which commanded the route to Lake Erie. There was Fort Detroit, which commanded all access from Lake Erie to lakes Huron, Michigan and Superior. There were forts La Boeuf, Venango and Duquesne to hold the Ohio, Fort Sandusky to hold the Sandusky River, Fort Miami at the head of the rapids on the Miami-of-the-Lakes to hold that river, and the portage to the Wabash, and Vincennes and Kaskaskia in the Illinois country.

The Indians did not object to these forts, because they found that they were really no forts at all, but rather depots and warehouses for the great fur trade, where their stacks of beautiful otter and sable and beaver skins could be exchanged for such splendid colored ribbons and tinkling bells and powder and lead and whiskey! Each fort became a trading post where the Indians gathered frequently for entertainments of various character.

Fancy if you can the emparadising dreams which must have filled the head of many a Gov-error of New France, as he surveyed with heaving breast the vast domains of the Mississippi Valley, comprising four million square miles of delectable land, and fancied the mighty empire it would some day sustain—outrivalling the dreams of a “Grand Monarque.” Picture, if you can, the great hopes of the builder of Quebec who could see the infant city holding in fee all the great system of lakes besides whose sea-outlet it stood—the Gibraltar of the new continent. Fancy the assemblies of notables which met when a returned Jesuit or forgotten courreur de bois came hurrying down the Ottawa in his canoe and reported the finding of a mighty river, yet unchronicled, filled with thousands of beaver and otter; a new bright gem in the Bourbon crown.

And so, we may suppose, such assemblies referred mockingly to the stolid Englishmen living along the Atlantic seaboard to the South. How the French must have scorned England's conception of America! Long after the French had passed from Quebec to the Great Lakes and down the Mississippi to the Gulf of Mexico, the English had a boat built at home which could be taken apart on the upper waters of the James River, carried across the mountains on wagons to be put together on the shores of the Pacific Sea! How the French must have laughed when they heard of this; we can imagine them drinking hilariously to the portable boat stranded in the Alleghany forests three thousand miles from its destination!

And so it was that the wily emissaries of the Bourbon throne incorporated the fast-filling hunting grounds of the Iroquois with New France. It was an easily acquired country since they brought nothing into it that was not wanted, and took nothing away—but furs! Though of these furs they were mighty particular respecting the number and the quality, and especially that traders from the English settlements over the mountains should not come and get them.

But it turned out that the English not only came, but even claimed for themselves the Ohio country which lay beyond the Alleghany mountains! If Cabot and Drake discovered the continent, did they not discover its interior as truly as its seaboard? Moreover, the English had by treaty acquired certain rights from the Iroquois which held good, they maintained, wherever the Iroquois had carried their irresistible conquests from Labrador to the Everglades of Florida. And who could then say that this did not hold good beyond the Alleghanies, where the Iroquois for so long had been the acknowledged masters?

Thus it was that slowly, naturally and with the certainty of doom itself, there drew on the terrible war which decided whether the destiny of the new continent should be placed in the hands of a Teuton or a Gaelic civilization—whether Providence should hold the descendants of the founders of Jamestown or of Quebec responsible for its mighty part in the history of human affairs. This war has received the vague name of the French and Indian War. By this is meant the war England and her colonists in America fought against the French and Indians.

It is remarkable enough that this war, which was to settle so much, began from a spark struck in the West. The explanation of this is found in the fact that a great expanse of forest separated the English settlements on the Atlantic seaboard and the great line of French settlements, 3,000 leagues in length, which stretched from the mouth of the St. Lawrence to the Gulf of Mexico. The nearest points of contact were in Virginia and Pennsylvania, for here the rivalry of French and English traders had been most intense.

Virginians found it a very acceptable part to play—this trying the test case with France to decide who was the real master of the land over the mountains. In 1749 a company of Virginian gentlemen received from the King of England a royal charter granting them possession of 200,000 acres of the Black Forest between the Monongahela and Kanawha rivers.

The astonishment and anger of the French on the St. Lawrence knew no bounds! Immediately the French governor Galissoniere set on foot plans which would result in the withdrawal of the English colonists.

Looking back through the years, it may seem very strange that the governors of New France never anticipated a clash with England on the Ohio and prepared for it, but it appears, that, of all the West, Lake Erie and the Ohio River were the least known to the French. This can be understood from the following romantic story of French exploration:

On a wild October day, Cartier who raised the altar at Quebec and claimed the new continent stood on Mount Royale, looking wistfully westward. Behind him lay the old world throbbing with an intuition of a north-west passage to China and India. Before him shimmered two waterways in the sun. As we know them now the southern was the St. Lawrence, the western the Ottawa.

It was a strange Providence which led the Algonquins to induce Cartier to set the tide of French trade and exploration over the Ottawa rather than up the St. Lawrence. By this France lost, we are told, the Hudson Valley—the key to the Eastern half of the continent—but gained the Great Lakes. This tide of trappers, merchants, Jesuits, and adventurers went up the Western river, across into Georgian Bay, through the lakes, down the Wisconsin, Illinois and Mississippi. Some few braved the dangers of traveling in the domains of the Iroquois and went up the St. Lawrence to Lake Ontario, then across to Lake Simcoe and Georgian Bay. The important result was that Lake Erie was the last of all the Great Lakes to be discovered and the country south of it was the last to be explored and claimed by the French. Lakes Ontario and Huron were discovered in 1615, Lake Superior in 1629, Lake Michigan in 1634. Lake Erie was not discovered until 1669—half a century after the two lakes which it joins. And then for a hundred years it was a mystery. Champlain drew it on his map as a widened river, and other maps of the day make it a brook, river, strait or lake, as their authors fancied. One drew it as a river, and, in perplexity over its outlet, ran it into the Susquehanna and down into Chesapeake Bay. And late as in the map of Celeron, in 1750, is written along the southern shore of Lake Erie—"This shore is almost unknown."

ARMS OF THE KING OF FRANCE.

It is a custom peculiar to the French to declare possession of a land by burying leaden plates, upon which their professions of sovereignty are incised, at the mouths of its rivers. This has been an immemorial custom, and has been done in recent times in the Pacific Ocean. La Salle buried a leaden plate at the mouth of the Mississippi in 1682, claiming possession of that river and all streams emptying into it and all lands drained by them. But, now, more plates were needed. And so Celeron de Bienville, a gallant chevalier of St. Louis, departed from Quebec in the fall of the same year with a detachment of eight subaltern officers, six cadets, an armorer, 20 soldiers, 180 Canadians, 30 friendly Iroquois and 25 Abenakis with a load of leaden plates to be buried at the mouths of all the rivers in the Central West. Two plates were buried in what we now call the Alleghany River and one at the mouth of Wheeling Creek, the Muskingum (Washington County), Great Kanawha and Miami rivers. (See Note.) At the burial of each plate a given formality was observed. The detachment was drawn up in battle array. The leader cried in a loud voice "Vive le Roi." and proclaimed that possession was taken in the name of the King. In each instance, the Arms of the King, stamped upon a sheet of tin, were affixed to the nearest tree, and a process verbal was drawn up and signed by the officers. Each plate bore the following inscription:

"In the year 1749, of the reign of Louis the XV, King of France, We, Celeron, commander of a detachment sent by Monsieur the Marquis de la Galissoniere, Governor General of New France, to re-establish tranquility in some Indian villages of these cantons, have buried (here a space was left for the date of and place of burial) this plate of lead near the river Ohio otherwise Belle Riviere as a monument of the renewal of possession we have taken of the said river Ohio, and of all those which empty into it, and of all lands on both sides as far as the sources of said rivers, as enjoyed by the Kings of France preceding, and as they have there maintained themselves by arms and treaties, especially those of Ryswick, Utrecht and Aix-la-Chapelle."

Ah! but leaden bullets were more needed in the West than leaden plates! This Celeron found out before he had gone a dozen leagues. Hostile Senecas dug up his first plate and hurried with it to the English at Albany. At Logstown, near the present city of Pittsburg, he found some detested English traders, and a strong anti-French influence. He drove off the intruders with a sharp letter to their governor, but here his Iroquois and Abenakis Indians deserted him, and, on their way north, tore from the trees the Arms of the King. Celeron hurried homeward by the shortest route—up the Miami River and down the Maumee and through the lakes—and rendered his alarming report. It was decided immediately to fortify Celeron's route. The enterprising successor of Galissoniere—Governor Duquesne—sent a detachment from Quebec with orders to proceed to Lake Erie and begin the building of a line of forts down the Ohio frontier, from Lake Erie to the Ohio River. This party, under the command of M. Marin, landed near the present site of Erie, Pennsylvania, and raised a fort.

The ruins of this fort in the West are still perceptible within the limits of the city of Erie. It was a strong work built of chestnut logs, 15 feet high and 120 feet square, with a block house on each side. It had a gate to the southward and one to the northward, but no port holes. It was first called Fort Duquesne, but later was named Fort Presque Isle from the promontory which juts out into the lake. From Fort Presque Isle M. Marin hewed a road southward, a distance of 13 miles, 21 feet in width, to the Riviere aux Boeufs—river of Buffaloes—later named French Creek by Washington. This was the first white man's road—military or otherwise—ever made in the Central West. It was built in 1753 and though it has not been used over its entire length since that day it marks, in a general way, the important route from the important route from the lakes to the Alleghany and Ohio rivers, which became early in the 19th century the great thoroughfare for freight to and from the Ohio Valley and the East. For a distance of seven miles out of the city of Erie, the old French road of a century and a half ago is the main road south. At that distance from the city the new highway leaves the old French route, but the latter can be followed without difficulty until it meets the Erie-Waterford plank road.

At the end of this road was erected Fort La Boeuf on the north bank of the West Fork of Riviere aux Boeufs, at the intersection of High and Water streets in what is now the town of Waterford, Pennsylvania. Being an inland fort it was not ranked or fortified as a first-class one; yet as a trading fort, it was of much importance in the chain from Quebec to the Ohio.

Late in the summer of 1753, M. Marin sent 50 men to erect a third fort in the chain from Lake Erie just below the junction of French Creek and the Alleghany River, on the present site of Franklin, Pennsylvania. Possession was taken of the site by Capt. Chabert de Joncaire who spent the winter in a trader's hut, having been opposed by Indians who said that the land was theirs, and that they would not have them build upon it. In the spring, however, machinery for a sawmill was brought from Canada and oak and chestnut trees were cut down and sawn into timbers for a new fort which was completed in April. It was not an elaborate work but answered its purpose as an entrepot for goods going down to Fort Duquesne. It was named Fort Machault from Jean Baptiste Machault, a celebrated French financier and politician and favorite of La Pompadour. The fort was a parallelogram about 75 by 105 feet with bastions in the form of polygons at the four angles. The gate fronted the river. It contained a magazine protected by three feet of earth and five barracks two stories high furnished with stone chimneys. The soldiers' barracks consisted of 44 buildings built around the fort on the north and east sides.

Thus, strong in her resources of military and civil centralization, France moved swiftly into the West at last. In this, her superiority over the English colonies was as marked as her success in winning her way into the good graces of the Indians.

FRENCH AND ENGLISH CHARACTER CONTRASTED.

French and English character nowhere show more plainly than in the nature of their contact with the Indian as each met him along the St. Lawrence, the Alleghany and the Great Lakes. The French came to conciliate the Indians, with no scruples as to how they might accomplish their task. The courcur-de-bois threw himself into the spirit of Indian life and very nearly adopted the Indian's ideals. The stolid English trader, keen for a bargain, justly suspicious of his white rival, invariably distant, seldom tried to ingratiate himself into the friendship of the redman. The voyageur flattered, cajoled, entertained in his wild way, regaled at tables, mingled without stint in Indian customs. Sir Guy Carleton writes: "France did not depend on the number of her troops, but on the discretion of her officers who learned the language of the natives. * * * * * * distributed the King's presents, excited no jealousy and gained the affections of an ignorant, credulous but brave people, whose ruling passions are independence, gratitude and revenge." The Englishman little affected the conceits of the red man, seldom opened his heart and was less commonly familiar. He ignored as much as possible Indian habits; the Frenchman feigned all reverence for them, with a care never to rupture their stolid complacency. The English trader dressed like a ranger or trapper, making as little use of Indian dress as practicable. The voyageur adopted Indian dress commonly, ornamented himself with vermilion and ochre and danced with the aborigines before the fires; he wore his hair long-crowned with a coronet of feathers; his hunting frock was trimmed with horsehair fringe and he carried a charmed rattlesnake's tail. "They were the most romantic and poetic characters ever known in American frontier life. Their every movement attracts the rosiest coloring of imagination. We see them gliding along the streams in their long canoes, shapely and serviceable as any water craft that man has ever designed, and yet buoyant and fragile as the wind-whirled autumn leaf. We catch afar off the thrilling cadences of their choruses floating over the prairie and marsh, echoing from forest and hill, startling the buffalo from his haunt in the reeds, telling the drowsy denizens of the approach of revelry and whispering to the Indian village of gaudy fabrics, of trinkets and of fire-water." This was not true alone of the French voyageur, it was more or less true of the French soldier and officer. Such conduct was not unknown among English traders but it must have been comparatively rare. Few men of his race had such a lasting and honorable hold upon the Indian as Sir William Johnson and we cannot be wrong in attributing much of his power (of such momentous value to England through so many years) to the spirit of comradeship and familiarity which underlay his studied deportment.

"Are you ignorant," said the French Governor, Marquis Duquesne, to a deputation of Indians, "of the difference between the King of France and the English? Look at the forts which the King had built; you will find that under their very walls the beasts of the forests are hunted and slain; that they are, in fact, fixed in places most frequented by you merely to gratify more conveniently your necessities. The English, on the contrary, no sooner occupy a post, than the woods fall before their hand—the earth is subjected to cultivation—the game disappears—and your people are speedily reduced to combat with starvation." M. Garneau, the French-Canadian historian, frankly acknowledges that the Marquis here accurately described the chief difference between the two civilizations. In 1757 M. Chauvignevie, Jr., a 17-year-old French prisoner among the English, said that at Fort La Boeuf the French plant corn around the fort for the Indians, "whose wives and children come to the fort for it, and get furnished also with clothes at the King's expense."

Horace Walpole, speaking of the French and English ways of seating themselves in America said: "They enslaved, or assisted the wretched nations to butcher one another, instructed them in the use of fire-arms, brandy and the New Testament, and at last, by scattered extension of forts and colonies, they have met to quarrel for the boundaries of empires, of which they can neither use nor occupy a twentieth part of the included territory." "But," he sneers elsewhere, "we do not massacre; we are such good Christians as only to cheat."

But, while the French moved down the lakes and the Alleghany, and the English came across the mountains, what of the "poor" Indian for whose rich lands both were so anxious?

An old Delaware sachem did not miss the mark widely when he asked the pathetic question: "The French claim all the lands on one side of the Ohio, and the English on the other; now where does the Indian's land lie?" Truly, "between their fathers, the French, and their brothers, the English, they were in a fair way of being lovingly shared out of the whole country."

FRENCH AND INDIAN WAR

In 1744 the English paid £400 to the representatives of the Six Nations for assuming to cede to them the land between the Alleghany Mountains. But, as we have seen, the Six Nations had practically given up their Alleghany hunting grounds to the other nations who had swarmed in,—the Delawares (known to the French as the Loups, "wolves") and the Shawanese. So, in a loose way, the confederacy of the Six Nations was friendly to the English, while the actual inhabitants of the land the Six Nations had "sold" were hostile to the English and usually friendly to the French. Besides these (the Delaware and Shawanese nations) many fugitives from the Six Nations, especially Senecas, were found aiding the French, as the momentous struggle was precipitated and as Washington, Braddock, Shirley and Montgomery fought in vain at Fort Necessity, Braddock's Field, Niagara and Quebec.

Almost nothing of this war occurred west of the Ohio River and it was won by England in the capture of Quebec in 1759.

PONTIAC'S REBELLION.

With the fall of Quebec, New France passed away and all French territory west of the Mississippi, save only a fishing station on the island of Newfoundland, came into the possession of the English crown. But the war which brought all this about was fought entirely in the northeast. Of it the West and its red-skinned inhabitants knew nothing. Fort Niagara was the most westerly fort which had succumbed to an English army, though Fort Duquesne had been evacuated. The story of successive defeats of the French were, perhaps, hardly heard of in the West, or, if communicated to the faithful Indian allies there, the logical conclusion was not forced upon their attention. So far as they were concerned, France was never more in the possession of their lakes and forests than then. Was not the blundering Braddock killed and his fine army utterly put to rout? Were not the French forts in the West—Presque Isle, Venango, La Boeuf, Miami and Detroit, secure? Fort Duquesne could be re-occupied whenever the French would give the signal. The leaden plates of France still reposed at the mouths of the rivers of the West and the Arms of the King of France still rattled in the wind which swept the land.

Fancy the surprise of the Indians, then, when little parties of red-coat soldiers came into the West and, with quiet insolence, took possession of the French forts and of the Indian's land! And the French moved neither hand nor foot to oppose them, though through so many years they had boasted their prowess, and though 10 Wyandots could have done so successfully. Detroit was surrendered to a mere corporal's guard, and the lesser forts to a sentry's watch each. It remained for the newcomers to inform the Indians of the events which led to the changing of the flags on these inland fortresses—to tell them that the French armies had been utterly overwhelmed, and the French capital captured, and French rule in America at an end.

But these explanations, given glibly, no doubt, by arrogant English officers, were repeated over and over by the Indians, and slowly, before a hundred, yea, a thousand dim fires in the forests. We can believe it was not all plain to them, this sudden conquest of a country where not a battle had been fought for eight years and that battle the greatest victory ever achieved by the red man. Perhaps messengers were sent back to the forts to gain casually, additional information concerning this marvelous conquest. French traders as ignorant, or feigning to be, as the Indians, were implored to explain the sudden forgetfulness of the "French Father" of the Indians.

It was inexplicable. The news spread rapidly: "The French have surrendered our land to the English." Fierce Shawanese around their fires at Chillicothe on the Scioto heard the news, and sullenly passed it on westward to the Miamis, and eastward to the Delawares on the Muskingum. The Senecas on the upper Alleghany heard the news. The Ottawas and Wyandots on both sides of the Detroit River heard it—and before the fires of each of these fierce French-loving Indian nations there was much silence while chieftains pondered, and the few words uttered were stern and cruel.

Cruel words grew to angry threats. By what right the chieftains asked, could the French surrender the Black Forest to the English? When did the French come to own the land anyway. They were the guests, the friends of the Indian—not his conquerors. The French built forts it was true, but they were for the Indian as well as for the French, and were forts in name only and the more of them the merrier! But now a conqueror had come, telling the Indian the land was no longer his, but belonged to the British King.

Threats soon grew into visible form. Where it started is not surely known—some say from the Senecas on the upper Alleghany—but soon a fearful "Bloody Belt" went on a journey with its terrible summons to war. It passed to the Delawares and to the Shawanese and Miamis and Wyandots, and where it went the death halloo sounded through the forests. The call was to the Indians of the Black Forest to rise and cast out the English from the land. If the French could not have it, certainly no one else should. The dogs of war were loosened. The young warriors of the Alleghany, and Muskingum, and Scioto, and Miami, and Detroit danced merrily before the fires, and the old men sang their half-forgotten war chants.

The terrible war which now burst over the West has never been paralleled by savages the world over in point of swift success. This may be attributed to the fact that a leader was found in Pontiac, a chieftain in the Ottawa nation, who, for daring and intelligence, was never matched by a man of his race. He had the courage of sweeping and patriotic convictions. He saw in the English occupation of the land the doom of the red man. Indeed, he must have seen it before, but if so he had not an opportunity to put his civilizations to a public test. The Indian was the more changed man. The implements and utensils of the white man were adopted by the red. The independent forest arts of their fathers were beginning to be forgotten. Kettles and blankets and powder and lead were taking the place of the wooden bowls and fur robes and swift flint-heads. In another generation the art of making a living for himself in the forest would be forgotten by the Indian, and he would henceforth be absolutely dependent upon the foreigner. All this Pontiac saw. He felt commissioned to lead a return to nature. The arts of the white man must be discarded and the Indians must come back to their primitive mode of living in dependence upon their own skill and ingenuity.

And so Pontiac waged a religious war. At a great convention of the savages he told them that a Delaware Indian had, while lost in the forests, been guided into a path which led to the home of the Great Spirit, and, on coming there, had been upbraided by the Master of Life himself for the degenerate state to which his race was falling. The forest arts of their fathers must be encouraged and relied up. The utensils of the white man must be banished from the wigwams. Bows and arrows and tomahawks and stone hatchets should not be discarded. Otherwise the Great Spirit would take away their land from them and give it to others. And so, much of the fury which accompanied the war was a sort of religious frenzy. "The Master of Life himself has stirred us up," said the warriors.

Pontiac's plot—undoubtedly the most comprehensive military campaign ever conceived in a red man's brain—was discovered by the British at Fort Miami, on the Maumee River, in March, 1763, four years after the fall of Quebec. There the "Bloody Belt" was found and secured before it could be forwarded to the Wabash with its murderous message. By threats and warnings the untutored English officers thought to quell the disturbance. Amherst, His Majesty's commanding general in America, haughtily condemned the signs of revolution as "unwarranted." Moreover, he gave his officers in the West authority to declare to the Indian chieftains that if they should conspire they would in his eyes make "a contemptible figure!" Time passed and the garrisons breathed easily as quiet reigned.

It was but the lull before the storm. On the 7th of May, Pontiac, who led his Ottawa was at Braddock's depot, appeared before, Detroit—the metropolis of the northwest—with 300 warriors. The watchfulness of the brave Major Gladwin, a well-trained pupil in that school on Braddock's Road, and the failure of Pontiac to capture the fort by strategy, though his warriors were admitted within its walls and had shortened guns concealed beneath their blankets, was the dramatic beginning of a reign of terror and a war of devastation all the way from Sault St. Marie to even beyond the crest of the Alleghanies. Pontiac immediately invested Detroit and throughout the Black Forest his faithful allies did their Ottawa chieftain's will. On the 16th of May, Fort Sandusky was surrounded by Indians seemingly friendly. The British commander permitted seven to enter. As they sat smoking, by the turn of a head the signal was given and the commander was a prisoner. As he was hurried out of the fort he saw, here one dead soldier, there another—victims of the massacre. Nine days later a band of Indians appeared before the fort at the mouth of the St. Joseph. "We are come to see our relatives," they said, "and wished the garrison good morning." Within two minutes after their entrance, the commanding officer and three men were prisoners and 11 others were murdered. Two days later the commander of Fort Miami, on the Maumee River, came, at an Indian mother's pitiful plea, to the Indian village to bleed a sick child. He was shot in his tracks. Four days later the commander of Fort Ouatanon, on the Wabash, was inveigled into an Indian cabin and captured, the fort surrendering forthwith. Two days later Indians gathered at Fort Michilimackinac to engage in a game of lacrosse. At the height of the contest, the ball was thrown near a gate of the fort. In the twinkling of an eye the commanding officer who stood watching the game was seized, and the Indians, snatching tomahawks from under the blankets of the squaws who were standing in proper position, entered the fort and killed 15 soldiers outright and took the remainder of the garrison prisoners. Sixteen days later Fort La Boeuf, on French Creek, where Washington delivered his message to the haughty St. Pierre a decade before, was attacked by an overwhelming army, of savages. Keeping the enemy off until midnight, the garrison made safe its escape, unknown to the exultant besiegers who had already fired one corner bastion, and fled down the river to Fort Pitt. On their way they passed the smoldering ruins of Fort Venango. Two days later Fort Presque Isle was attacked. In two days the commander senseless with terror struck his flag. The same day Fort Ligonier, in the foothills of the Alleghanies, was invested by a besieging army.

Thus the campaign of Pontiac, prosecuted with such swiftness and such success, bade fair to end in triumph. "We hate the English," the Indians sent word to the French on the Mississippi, "and wish to kill them. We are all united: the war is our war, and we will continue it for seven years. The English shall never come into the West!"

But Fort Detroit and Fort Pitt stood firm. For months Pontiac beleaguered the Northern fortress, gaining advantages whenever the garrison attacked him, but unable to reduce the fort. All summer long the eyes of the world were upon Detroit—and the gallant defense of Fort Pitt, was comparatively forgotten. But the maintenance of this strategic point was of incalculable importance to the West. The garrison felt this. And here, if anywhere, was courage shown in battle. Here, if ever, brave men faced fearful odds with unshaken courage worthy of their Saxon blood.

In planning his campaign, Pontiac delegated the Shawanese and Delawares to carry Fort Pitt. If they could not do it, he might be assured that the position was impregnable. They were his most reliable warriors, and, once given the task of carrying out the second most important coup of their great leader's plan, could be trusted to use any alternative savage lust could suggest, or trick savage cunning could invent in order to accomplish their portion of the terrible conquest of the West. The defense of Detroit was brave; but Detroit was on the great water highway east and west. Succor was possible, in fact probable, in time; if not, there was a way of escape. At Fort Pitt neither could be expected. Moreover the fort had never been completed. On three sides the flood tides of the rivers had injured it. Ecuyer, its valiant defender, threw up a rough rampart of logs and palisaded the interior. And in this fragile fortress, hardly worthy of the name, behind which lay the darkling Alleghanies and about which loomed the Black Forest, were gathered some 600 souls, a larger community, probably, than the total population of Detroit. And around on every side were gathered the lines of ochred warriors preparing for another charge even to the very blood-bespattered walls. The garrison might well have believed itself beyond the reach of succor, if, indeed, succor could avail before need of it had vanished. The bones of Braddock's 700 slain lay scattered about the forests only seven miles away. How could another army come even that far? Little wonder that the Shawanese and Delawares were already flushed with victory as they renewed their unavailing attacks.

But Braddock made a death-bed prophecy. Before he died he said: "We shall later know how to deal with them another time." And the British did; for an army from Philadelphia relieved Fort Pitt. While General Bradstreet was moving by water to Detroit and, with much bungling, reasserting English authority along the lake shore, an intrepid successor of the headstrong Braddock was doing, with greatest credit to himself and the brave men who constituted his army, what Braddock failed to do.

This notable expedition was put under the command of General Forbes' efficient officer, Col. Henry Bouquet, who had a good seven-years' record as an Indian fighter and was more crafty than many a redskin.

Bouquet marched westward from Philadelphia over Forbes' old road and at Bushy Run fought one of the decisive battles of America. From this hard-fought field he marched to Fort Pitt.

The year following Bouquet led across the Ohio the first English army that ever crossed into what is now Ohio and on the upper Muskingum he brought the Delawares to terms and ended then and there Pontiac's dream of an Indian empire.

THE REVOLUTIONARY WAR IN THE WEST.

History was making fast in the West when the Revolutionary struggle reached the crisis in 1775 at Concord and Lexington. South of the Ohio River, Virginia's new empire was filling with the conquerors of the West. The Mississippi Valley counted a population of 13,000, 3,000 being the population of New Orleans. St. Louis, in Spanish possession, was carrying on a brisk trade with the Indians on the Missouri. Vincennes, the British port on the Wabash, had a population of 400 whites. Detroit, the metropolis of the West, numbered 1,500 inhabitants, more than double the number in the dashing days of Gladwin only a decade before. The British flag also flew at Kaskaskia, on the Mississippi, and at Sandusky. This fringe of British forts on the North were separated from the American metropolis of the West, Pittsburg, and from the first fortresses built in Kentucky, by leagues of forests, dark as when Bouquet pierced them, and filled with sullen Indian nations awed for the time being by Dunmore's invasion, but silently abiding their time to avenge themselves for the loss of the meadow lands of Ken-ta-Kee.

Such was the condition of affairs when, in April, 1775, the open struggle for independence of the American colonies was roughly precipitated at Lexington. It might seem to the casual observer that the colonists who were now hastening by way of the Wilderness Road or the Ohio River into the Virginian Kentucky could not feel the intense jealousy for American interests which was felt by the patriots in the East. On the very contrary, there is evidence that these first pioneers into the West had a profound knowledge of the situation and a sympathy for the struggling patriots which was enhanced, even, by the distance which separated them and the hardships they had endured. Not a few of them too had known personally of the plundering British officials and the obnoxious taxes. It is the proud boast of Kentuckians that in the center of their beautiful blue-grass country was erected the first monument to the first dead of the Revolution. A party of pioneers heard the news of the battle of Lexington while sitting about their camp fire. Long into the night the rough men told and retold the electrifying news and before morning named the new settlement they were to make, "Lexington," in honor of New England's dead!

It was not at all evident at first what the war was going to amount to in the West. Scarcely more was known in the West of the Revolutionary War than had been known two decades before of the French and Indian War. But at the outset it was plain that there was to be a tremendous struggle on both sides to gain the allegiance, as the British desired, of the Indian nations which lay between the Ohio River and the Great Lakes. For two years the struggle in the East went on, engrossing the entire attention of both combatants. During 1776 and 1777 the history of the West is merely the continuation of the bloody story of the years which led up to Duman's campaign. Slowly the Indians forgot Lewis' crushing victory at Point Pleasant and their solemn pledges at Camp Charlotte, and were raiding the feeble Kentucky posts with undiminished relish, or giving the "Long Knives" of the Monongahela country plenty of provocation for the barbarities of which they are known to have been guilty.

And so, early in the struggle, far-sighted ones saw signs of the growing despicable alliance of the savages to British interests, and before the bloody year of 1778 opened, it was only a question of how much England wanted of the savage allies who were crowded about their forts along the lakes. It is a terrible blot on the history of British rule in America that when led to the same bitter trough, English officers in the West used every means of retaliation for the use of which they so roundly condemned French officials a quarter of a century before. American officers employed Indians as guides and scouts and were guilty of provoking inter-tribal war, but they did not pay Indians for bringing in British scalps, or praise them for their murderous successes and equip them for further service. As a brave American officer said, "Let this reproach remain on them"—and the people of the West will never forget the reproach nor forgive! They remember and always will the burning words of Washington written more than 10 years after the close of the Revolution, "All the difficulties we encounter with the Indians, their hostilities, the murder of helpless women and children along all our frontiers results from the conduct of the agents of Great Britain in this country." Around the hearths of hundreds of homes of descendants of the pioneers in the West will be found today memories of the inhuman barbarities of British officers during the Revolution, which will never be forgotten and which will never fail to prejudice generations yet unborn. The reproach will remain on them!

At the outbreak of the war, chiefs of the Indian nations were invited to Pittsburg where the nature of the struggle was explained to them in the following parable:

"Suppose a father had a little son whom he loved and indulged while young, but, growing up to be a youth, began to think of having some help from him; and making up a small pack, he bid him carry it for him. The boy cheerfully takes this pack up, following his father with it. The father finding the boy willing and obedient, continues in this way; and as the boy grows stronger, so the father makes the pack in proportion larger; yet as long as the boy is able to carry the pack, he does so without grumbling. At length, however, the boy having arrived at manhood, while the father is making up the pack for him, in comes a person of an evil disposition, and, learning who was to be the carrier of the pack, advises the father to make it heavier, for surely the son is able to carry a larger pack. The father listening rather to the bad adviser than consulting his own judgment and the feelings of tenderness, follows the advice of the hard-hearted adviser, and makes up a heavy load for his son to carry. The son, now grown up, examining the weight of the load he is to carry, addresses the father in these words: 'Dear father, this pack is too heavy for me to carry, do pray lighten it; I am willing to do what I can, but am unable to carry this load.' The father's heart having by this time become hardened, and the bad adviser calling to him, 'Whip him if he disobeys,' and he refusing to carry the pack, the father orders his son to take up the pack and carry it off or he will whip him, and already takes up a stick to beat him. 'So,' says the son, 'am I to be served thus for not doing what I am unable to do? Well, if entreaties avail nothing with you, father, and it is to be decided by blows, whether or not I am able to carry a pack so heavy, then I have no other choice left me, but that of resisting your unreasonable demand by my strength, and thus, by striking each other, learn who is the strongest.'" in the struggle that was coming. Impossible as such a course would have been to men who loved war better than peace, certain tribes promised to maintain neutrality. In a few months, however, most of the nations were in open or secret alliance with British officers. Even the better element of the Delaware nation, led by Captain White Eyes, eventually sacrificed their lives in attempting to play the impossible role. England was always handicapped in her use of the American Indian because of the want of men who could successfully exert control over him. Even when the forts of the French in the West passed into British possession, Frenchmen were retained in control since no Englishman could so well rule the savages who made the forts their rendezvous. The beginning of the successful employment of the Indians against the growing Virginian empire south of the Ohio and against the multiplying cabins and forts of the "Long Knives" may loosely be said to have begun in the spring of 1778, when three Northern renegades Simon Girty, Matthew Elliott and Alexander McKee eluded the Continental general, Hand, at Pittsburg, and took service under Lieutenant-Governor Hamilton at Detroit. Bred to border warfare and well known among the Indians from the Susquehanna to the Missouri, these three men were the "most effective tools for the purpose of border warfare" that the British could have secured. Hamilton immediately began to plan the invasion of Pennsylvania and the conquest of Pittsburg. The campaign was condemned by his superiors in the East and was forgotten by its originator when the news of a bold invasion of his own territory by a Virginian army suddenly reached his ears!

The Transylvania Company, which had erected a proprietary government south of the Ohio, came suddenly to an end when the Kentuckians elected George Rogers Clarke and Gabriel John Jones members of the Virginian Assembly, as the assembly erected the county of Kentucky out of the land purchased by Henderson at Fort Watauga in 1775. Upon bringing this about, Clarke, a native of Virginia and a hero of Dunmore's War, returned to Kentucky nourishing greater plans. With clear eyes he saw the increasing affiliation of Indian and British interests meant that England, even though she might be unsuccessful in the East, could keep up an interminable and disastrous warfare "along the rear of the colonies" so long as she held forts on the Northern edge of the Black Forest. Clarke sent spies northward who gained information confirming his suspicions and then he hurried eastward with his bold plan of conquering the "strongholds of British and Indian barbarity," Kaskaskia, Vincennes and Detroit. He came at a fortunate time. The colonies were rejoicing over the first great victory of the early war, Saratoga. Hope, everywhere, was high. From Patrick Henry, Governor of Virginia, Clarke received two orders, one to attack the British post Kaskaskia. He at once set out for Pittsburg, to raise, in the West (where both Dunmore and Lewis raised their armies) troops for the most brilliant military achievement in Western history. Descending the Ohio to Kentucky, where he received reinforcements, Clarke marched silently through the forests with 135 chosen men to Kaskaskia, which he took in utter surprise July 4, 1778. "Keep on with your merriment," he said to revellers whom he surprised at a dance, "but remember you dance under Virginia, not under Great Britain." Clarke brought the news of the recently made alliance between France and the United States into the Illinois country and used it with telling effect. A French priest at Vincennes ran up a Virginian flag over that fort, telling the inhabitants and the Indians that their "French Father" had come to life. In October Virginia incorporated the "County of Illinois" within her Western empire—the first portion of the land north of the Ohio River to come under the administration of one of the States of the Union.

Contemporaneously with Clarke's stirring conquest, an expedition was raised at Pittsburg to march against the Indians in the neighborhood of the British fort at Sandusky—possibly to counteract the rumored attempt to invade Pennsylvania by Hamilton at Detroit. Troops and supplies were to be assembled at Fort Pitt where the famous route of Bouquet was to be followed toward the lakes. The expedition was put in charge of Gen. Lachlan McIntosh. Distressing delays made the half-hearted Indians who were to guide the army staff and McIntosh started before his stores arrived, fearing longer delay would alienate his friendly Indians, among whom was the Delaware, White Eyes, now turned from a neutral course. At the mouth of the Beaver River, McIntosh built the fort which bore his name—the first fort built by the Americans on the Northern side of the Ohio. Advancing westward over Bouquet's track with 1,200 men he reached the Muskingum (Tuscarawas) River in 14 days, arriving November 19, 1778. The result of this attempted invasion is best described perhaps by General McIntosh himself in a letter written to General Washington the year following:

"A letter by express from Lieutenant-Colonel Campbell, a little afterward, informed me that no supplies came yet, and we had very little to expect during the winter, nor could he get the staff to account for, or give any reasons for their neglect and deficiencies, which disappointed all my flattering prospects and schemes, and left me no other alternative than either to march back as I came without effecting any valuable purpose, for which the world would justly reflect upon me after so much expense, and confirm the savages in the opinion the enemy inculcates of our weakness, and unite all of them to a man against us, or to build a strong stockade fort upon the Muskingum, and leave as many men as our provisions would allow to secure it until the next season, and to serve as a bridle upon the savages in the heart of their own country; which last I chose with the unanimous approbation of my principal officers and we were employed upon it while our provisions lasted."

But Lieutenant-Governor Hamilton, learning of Clarke's seizure of Kaskaskia and the treachery of the fickle inhabitants of Vincennes, set about to reconquer Illinois. Departing from Detroit on a beautiful October day the expedition descended the Detroit River and entered the Maumee. The weather changed and it was 71 days before the American captain Helm at Vincennes surrendered his wretched fort, and became a prisoner of war. Hamilton was unable to push on to Kaskaskia because of the lack of provisions, and sat down to watch the winter out where he was. Thus the spectacular year of 1778 closed—Clarke at Kaskaskia watching his antagonist feasting at Vincennes; McIntosh's little guard at Fort Laurens undergoing continual harrassing and siege. In the East the evacuation of Philadelphia, the battle of Monmouth and the terrible Wyoming Massacre were the events of the year.

But the year 1779 was to witness as brilliant a military achievement in the West as the East was to witness in the capture of Stony Point. This was the recapture of Vincennes by Clarke. Joined by an experienced adventurer, Col. Francis Vigo, formerly of the Spanish service, Clarke was persuaded that he must capture Hamilton or Hamilton would capture him. Accordingly, on the 5th of February, Clarke set out for Vincennes with 170 trusty men. In 12 days they reached the Embarras River, which was crossed on the 21st with great bravery, the men wading in the water to their shoulders. On the 25th, Hamilton, the most surprised man in the world, was compelled to surrender. Within two weeks he was on his way to Virginia where, being found guilty of buying Virginian scalps of the Indians, he was imprisoned but was exchanged the year following.

In July, while returning from New Orleans with supplies, Colonel Rogers and party of Kentuckians were overwhelmed by Indians under Girty and Elliott on the Ohio River. In a terrible running battle, 60 Kentuckians were killed. The sad news spread quickly throughout Kentucky and a thousand tongues called loudly for revenge. In response Major Bowman led 300 volunteers up the Scioto Valley and attacked the Shawanese capital. There was bungling somewhere and a retreat was ordered before victory was achieved.

During this summer the conqueror of Illinois expected to complete his triumph by the capture of Detroit. A messenger from Thomas Jefferson, Governor of Virginia, brought tidings that troops for this expedition would be forthcoming from Virginia and Kentucky and would rendezvous at Vincennes in July. When the time came, Clarke found only a few soldiers from Kentucky and none at all from Virginia. The Detroit expedition fell through because of Virginia's poverty in money and in men, though artillery, ammunition and tools had been secured for the campaign from Fort Pitt, at Washington's command. But with masterly foresight Governor Jefferson secured the establishment of a fort on the Mississippi River in the Illinois country. During this summer the little garrison which General McIntosh left buried in the Black Forest at Fort Laurens fled back over the "Great Trail" to Pittsburgh. Nowhere north of the Ohio were the scenes, frequently enacted in Kentucky, reproduced so vividly as at little Fort Laurens on the upper Muskingum. At one time 14 of the garrison were decoyed and slaughtered. At another time an army numbering 700 warriors invested the little half-forgotten fortress and its intrepid defenders. A slight embankment may be seen today near Bolivar, Ohio, which marks one side of the first fort erected in what is now Ohio, those near the lake shore excepted. Thus closed the year 1779—Clarke again in possession of Vincennes, as well as Kaskaskia and Cahokia, but disappointed in the failure of the Detroit expedition; Hamilton languishing in a Virginia dungeon, 1,200 miles from his capital-fort, Detroit; Fort Laurens abandoned, and the Kentucky country covered with gloom over Rogers' terrible loss and Bowman's inglorious retreat from the valley of the Scioto. On the other hand, the East was glorying in "Mad Anthony"

Wayne's capture of Stony Point, Sullivan's rebuke to the Indians and Paul Jones' electrifying victory on the sea.

Four expeditions set forth in 1780, all of them singular in character and noteworthy. The year before, 1779, Spain had declared war upon England. The new commander at Detroit took immediate occasion to regain control of the Mississippi by attacking the Spanish town of St. Louis. This expedition, under Captain Sinclair, descended the Mississippi from Prairie du Chien. The attack on St. Louis did not succeed, but six whites were killed and 18 taken prisoners.

At the time of Bowman's expedition against the Shawanese, the year previous, a British officer, Colonel Bird, had assembled a noteworthy array at Sandusky preparatory to the invasion of Kentucky. News of the Kentucky raid up the Scioto Valley set Bird's Indians to "cooking and counselling" again, instead of acting. This year Bird's invasion materialized and the fate of the Kentucky settlements trembled in the balance. The invading army of 600 Indians and Canadians was armed with two pieces of artillery. There is little doubt that this army could have battered down every "station" in Kentucky and swept victoriously through the new settlements. Ruddles' station on the Licking was first menaced and surrendered quickly. Martin's fort also capitulated. But here Bird paused in his conquest and withdrew northward, the barbarity of the Indian allies, for once, at least, shocking a British commander. The real secret of the abrupt retreat lay no doubt in the fact that the increasing immigration had brought such vast numbers of people into Kentucky that Bird feared to penetrate further into the land for fear of a surprise. The gross carelessness of the newly arrived inhabitants in not taking the precaution to build proper defenses against the Indians undoubtedly appeared to the British commander as a sign of strength and fortitude which he did not have the courage to put to the test. As a matter of fact, he could probably have annihilated every settlement between the Ohio and Cumberland Gap.

In turn Kentucky sent an immense army north of the Ohio in retaliation, a thousand men volunteering under Clarke, the hero of Vincennes. A large Indian army was routed near the Shawanese town, Pickaway. Many towns with standing crops were burned. A similar expedition from Pittsburg under General Brodhead burned crops and villages on the upper Muskingum.

In retaliation for the attack on St. Louis, the Spanish commander at that point sent an expedition against the deserted British post of St. Joseph. Upon declaring war against England in the year previous, Spain had occupied Natchez, Baton Rouge and Mobile, which, with St. Louis, gave her command of the Mississippi. But His Catholic Majesty was building other Spanish castles in America. He desired the conquest of the British Northwest to offset the British capture of Gibraltar. This "capture" of St. Joseph led to an amusing but ominous claim on the part of Spain at the Treaty of Paris when, with it for a pretext, the Spanish crown claimed all lands west of a line drawn from St. Joseph southward through what is now Ohio, Kentucky, Tennessee, Georgia, Alabama and Mississippi! The Mississippi River boundary was, however, stoutly contended for and obtained by the American commissioners.

In this year the first "gunboat" to ply Western waters was built under direction of Brigadier-General Clarke. It was a galley armed with light artillery. This queer looking craft soon fell into disuse, though it became a terror to the Indians who continually infested the lower Ohio. It was relished little better by the militia, who disliked service on water. But it stands as a typical illustration of the enterprise and devotion of the "Father of Kentucky" to the cause for which he had done so much.

The year following, 1781, saw the termination of the Revolution in the East when Cornwallis' army marched down the files of French and American troops at Yorktown to the melancholy tune—"The World's Turned Upside Down." The Treaty of Paris was not signed until 1783, and in the meantime the bloodiest year of all the war, 1782, was adding its horrors to all that have gone before.

MASSACRE OF GNADENHUTTEN.

While the East was rejoicing, the Central West saw the terrible massacre of Gnadenhutzen, the more terrible because committed by white men themselves.

Half a decade before the Revolutionary War, the heroic Moravian missionary, David Zeisberger, had located three Christian Indian towns on the upper Muskingum in what once was Washington county. To these towns a number of Christian Indians had been deported from their former homes in Pennsylvania by the Moravian Church. Throughout the war the situation of these towns was most desperate, located as they were in the center of the forests between Fort Pitt and Fort Detroit and near the bloody "Great Trail," the highway through the Central West. Before long, the Delawares, among whom the Christian Indians were permitted to settle, became affiliated with the British or Americans. The Moravians still attempted the impossible role of neutrality.

Before long, they became suspected by both British and Americans. This suspicion gained ground rapidly, but at last, in 1781, 300 warriors under command of Captain Pipe and the British captain Elliott, appeared on the Muskingum and ordered the removal of the Christian village to the Sandusky River, as a measure of safety. With a broken heart the venerable Zeisberger, now in his 60th year, put himself at the head of his persecuted flock and led them from their homes to the wilderness of the Sandusky.

Here in their new habitation the greatest hardships overtook the Moravians. In the midst of this terrible experience, the missionaries were summoned to Detroit to answer the charges brought against them. In the court martial held there, they were acquitted honorably of all charges, and the British government treated them with marked kindness. They were allowed to return to their converts on the Sandusky. When the year of 1782 came, the food supply was exhausted and a party of 100 converts was permitted to return to the Muskingum to gather a crop of corn which had been left standing.

In recounting the awful massacre which followed, one cannot refrain from accepting a charitable explanation of it. Undoubtedly the borderers of the Monongahela, always suffering from the savage inroads of the Ohio Indians, looked with deep suspicion upon this returning band of Indians; and there seems to be little doubt that Indian brigands, through trickery, succeeded in bringing upon these innocent wayfarers strong circumstantial evidence of participation in the border raids, by concealing in their homes plunder taken from the borderland. While the Christian Indians were collecting their supply of corn, a posse of enraged borderers appeared among them. Plain evidences of their guilt were found in their homes. The leader of the expedition put the question: "Shall the Moravian Indians be taken prisoners to Pittsburg or be put to death?" A small fraction of the posse favored the former course, but a large proportion voted for the latter. The women and children were placed in one building, the men in another, and the awful tragedy was enacted.

"My arm fails me," said the leader as he knocked his 14th bound victim on the head, "to go on in the same way; I think I have done pretty well." And that night, as the moon arose, its weird light shone down upon 96 corpses of murdered Christian Indians—40 men, 22 women and 34 children—and upon the carnival of bears and panthers, fighting in the ghastly light for the bodies. The Gnadenhutten Massacre took place March 8, 1782.

In May, 1782, the atrocities of the British-encouraged savages along the Pennsylv-vania and Virginian border becoming unbearable, an expedition was raised in the Monongahela country to penetrate to the Indian infested country on the Sandusky River. Volunteers, 400 in number, all mounted, rendezvoused on the Ohio, near Mingo Bottom, and elected as commander Col. William Crawford, an experienced officer in the Revolutionary War, following his friend Washington faithfully through the hard Long Island and Delaware campaigns. Crawford struck straight through the forests, even avoiding Indian trails, at first, in the hope of taking his foe utterly by surprise. But his wily foe completely outwitted him and the Indians and British new well each day's progress. The battle was fought in a prairie land near the Sandusky River in what is now Crawford County, Ohio and though not a victory for either side, an American retreat was ordered during the night following. Colonel Crawford was captured, among others, and suffered a terrible death at the stake, perhaps the saddest single atrocity committed by the red men in Western history. This gray-haired veteran of the Revolution gave his life to appease the Indians for a massacre of Christian Indians perpetrated by savage borderers from the Monongahela country the year previous.

Kentucky had witnessed minor activities of the savages during the spring. In August a grand Indian army assembled on the lower Scioto for the purpose of invading Kentucky. The assembly was harangued by Simon Girty and moved southward and invested Bryant's station, one of the strongest forts in Kentucky. After a terrible day during which re-inforcements kept arriving, only to be compelled to fight their way into the fort or flee, Girty attempted to secure capitulation. Outwitted, the renegade resorted to a stratagem as cunningly devised as it was terribly successful. In the night the entire Indian army vanished as if panic stricken. Meat was left upon the spits. Garments lay strewn about the encampment and along the route of the fugitive army. The more experienced of the border army which was soon in full cry on the trail scented the deception, but the headstrong hurried onward in the hope of revenge. At the crossing of the Licking, near the lower Blue Licks, the Indian ambush received the witless pursuers with a frightful burst of flame, and the battle of Blue Licks became a running fire, a headlong rout and a massacre.

A thousand men joined Clark for a retaliatory invasion of the North and the usual destruction of villages and crops was accomplished. This may be considered the last military event in the Revolutionary War in the West. And here it is proper to call particular attention to this and the preceding similar invasions from south of the Ohio River.

Though judged by ordinary military standards the numerous invasions from Virginia and Kentucky amounted to little, such was not the case. The Indians could ever retreat helter-skelter into the forests and avoid more than a skirmish with an advancing army. But they could not take their crops and the destruction of every maize and corn field was a victory for the invaders as it compelled the Indians to live more largely upon game. As game grew scarcer the hunters were compelled to go further and further away. Thus by doing nothing more than burning villages and crops, the whites were sure in time of conquering the trans-Ohio land. And this was just what was happening, almost without the knowledge of the conquerors of the West. Each invasion which left a smoking land behind it helped to complete the conquest—though it had retired in disgrace. By this process one river valley after another in the West, north of the Ohio, came out of the sphere of Indian and British influence. Before the end of the Revolutionary War, the Muskingum Valley was practically abandoned by the Delawares. In 1782 Crawford was not opposed until he struck the Sandusky River. The depredations of the Indians on the Ohio continued through the decade 1780-1790, but were confined almost exclusively to the lower Ohio, or below the mouth of the Scioto. Traveling on the Ohio between the Scioto and the Monongahela was comparatively safe, compared with the dangers between the Scioto and the Wabash. This shows the western movement of the Indians. As will be seen, there was a corresponding northward movement of the tribes. By the end of the decade 1790-1800, the Scioto and Sandusky valleys were practically abandoned by the Shawanese and Wyandots. And when the final blow was to be struck, it was struck due northwest from the first great battle-field in the west, where the blundering Braddock fell.

NOTE.

The plate buried by Celeron at the mouth of the Muskingum was discovered after the freshet of 1798, projecting from the river bank in front of the spot where the Fort School now stands. Before its value was known, part of its lead had been cut up and molded into bullets. Paul Fearing rescued it and William Woodbridge translated what remained of the inscription. It was sent to Governor DeWitt Clinton who presented it to the Antiquarian Society of Massachusetts.—See Pioneer History, Page 20.

CHAPTER III.

MOVEMENTS OF THE PIONEERS.

DEPRECIATED CURRENCY AND IMPOVERISHED PUBLIC CREDIT—BOUNTY LANDS—OHIO COMPANY OF ASSOCIATES—WORK OF GENERAL RUFUS PUTNAM AND REV. MANASSEH CUTLER—ORDINANCE OF 1787—LANDING AT THE MOUTH OF THE MUSKINGUM—INDUSTRY AND COURAGE OF THE PIONEERS—OTHER NEAR-BY SETTLEMENTS—NOTES.

The settlement of Ohio differs from that of Kentucky, West Virginia, and Tennessee in this important particular, that the government of the territory and the tenure of land were provided for before the first party of settlers landed on the banks of the Ohio. Hence not only the date of the first settlement but the record of the negotiations which led to that settlement have been carefully preserved. The beginning may be found in the consultations among the officers and soldiers of the American Army in that long period of waiting between the surrender of Cornwallis and the final departure of the British from New York.

DEPRECIATED CURRENCY AND IMPOVERISHED PUBLIC CREDIT.

After the Continental currency had depreciated until it was not received for more than two and a half cents on a dollar, the step to final repudiation was easy. The Congress of the Confederation had neither money nor credit. All they could give the officers and soldiers were certificates of final settlement. These certificates were soon in the market at the rate of eight dollars of the face for one dollar of Spanish silver. At this rate there was little chance for those who had been many years in the army to return to their old homes and go into business. Naturally they began to look to that vast region west of the Alleghanies which had been wrested from the British possession by the valor and endurance of American soldiers. Some of the colonies held shadowy claims to portions of this territory and Congress was too weak to resist. That these claims had no good legal foundation is evident from this,—that all the territory between the Ohio and Mississippi had by Act of Parliament, in 1774, been annexed to Canada. It was legally a part of that province until captured by the forces of the United States. This temporary title by virtue of conquest was confirmed, thanks to the wise forethought of Franklin, by the treaty of peace with Great Britain. Thus the legal title to this vast empire, from which five States have been formed, passed to the United States in their collective capacity. Unfortunately, however, these States were then held together by a mere rope of sand; Congress had no power to resist the absurd claims of different States, nor to enforce the treaty against the British who for many years continued to hold the territory south of the Great Lakes.

BOUNTY LANDS.

As a result of these deliberations, 285 officers, nearly all of whom were from England, signed a petition bearing date of June 16, 1783, praying the Honorable Congress that the bounty lands promised to officers and soldiers of the Revolutionary Army be located in the territory between the Ohio River and Lake Erie and extending westward 24 miles beyond the mouth of the Scioto. It seems strange that Congress did not at once grant a request which carried with it the assurance of protection on the exposed frontier. But there were many excuses for delay, the chief one being that different States laid claim to parts of the territory. Nearly a year later (April 5, 1784), General Rufus Putnam, impatient of the delay, wrote from Rutland, Massachusetts, to General Washington and requested him to name some member of Congress who would favor the movement. He confesses that he dared not expect aid from the Massachusetts or New York delegates, since these States had land of their own to sell. He urges haste because the poverty of the returned soldiers would force them to settle in some place without delay.

ENGLAND, April the 5th, 1784.

DEAR SIR: Being unavoidably prevented from attending the general meeting of the Cincinnati at Philadelphia as I had intended, where I once more expected the opportunity in person to pay my respects to your Excellency, I can not deny myself the honor of addressing you by letter, to acknowledge with gratitude the ten thousand obligations I feel myself under to your goodness, and most sincerely to congratulate you on your return to domestic happiness, to enquire after your health, and wish the best of heaven's blessing may attend you and your dear lady.

The settlement of the Ohio country, Sir, engrosses many of my thoughts; and much of my time, since I left camp, has been employed in information and advice with respect to the nature, situation and circumstances of that country and the probability of removing ourselves there, and if I am to form an opinion on what I have seen and heard of this subject there are thousands in this quarter will emigrate to that country as soon as the honorable Congress makes provision for granting land there, and location and settlement can be made with safety, unless such provision is too long delayed, I mean till (a) majority turn their views another way, which is the case with many more.

You are sensible of the necessity as well as the propriety of both officers and soldiers fixing themselves in business somewhere as soon as possible, as many of them are unable to lie longer on their ears waiting the decision of Congress on our petition, and therefore must unavoidably fix themselves in some other quarter, which when done, the idea of removing to the Ohio country will probably be at an end with respect to most of them. Besides, the Commonwealth of Massachusetts have come to a resolution to sell their Eastern Country for public securities, and should their plan be formed and their proposition be made public before we hear anything from Congress respecting our petition, and the terms on which the lands petitioned for are obtained, it will undoubtedly be much against us by greatly lessening the number of Ohio associates.

Another reason why we wish to know as soon as possible what the intentions of Congress are respecting our petition is the effect such knowledge will probably have on the credit of the certificates we have received in settlement of accounts. Those securities are now selling at no more than three shillings and six pence and four shillings on the pound, which in all probability might double, if no more, the moment it was known that government would receive them for land in the Ohio country. From these circumstances and many others which might be mentioned, we are growing quite impatient and the general inquiry now is, when are we going to Ohio? Among others, Brigadier-general Tupper, Lieutenant-colonel Oliver, and Major Ashley have agreed to accompany me to that country the moment the way is opened for such an undertaking.

I should have hinted these things to some members of Congress, but the delegates from Massachusetts, although exceeding worthy men and in general would wish to promote the Ohio scheme, yet if it should militate with the particular interest of this State, by draining her of inhabitants especially when she is forming the plan of selling the Eastern Country, I thought they would not be very warm advocates in our favor, and I dare not trust myself with any of the New York delegates with whom I am acquainted, because that government are wisely inviting the Eastern people to settle in that State, and as to the delegates of other States, I have no acquaintance with any of them.

These circumstances must apologize for my troubling you on this subject; and requesting the favor of a line to inform us in this quarter what the prospects are with respect to our petition and what measures have or are likely to be taken with respect to settling the Ohio country.

I shall take it as a very particular favor, Sir, if you will be kind enough to recommend me to some character in Congress acquainted with and attached to the Ohio cause with whom I may presume to open a correspondence.

I am, Sir, with the highest respect, your humble servant.

RUFUS PUTNAM

General Washington's reply to these inquiries of his old comrade is one of the most precious autographs preserved at Marietta. It contains so many points of interest that we give all the letter that concerns this subject.

ARLINGTON, VA., NOV. 22<sup>d</sup> 1784.

DEAR SIR, I could not allow a note to leave the 5th of April from Philadelphia because General Knox, having insisted, only postponed the letter to me at the moment of my departure from that place. The sentiments of esteem and friendship which breathe in it are exceedingly pleasing and interesting to me, and you may rest assured they are reciprocated.

I wish it was in my power to give you a more favorable acct of the officers' petition for lands on the Ohio and its waters than I am about to do. After this matter and information respecting the establishment for Peace were my inquiries as I went through Annapolis solely directed, but I could not learn that anything decisive had been done in either. On the latter I hear Congress are differing about their powers, but as they have accepted of cessions from Virginia and have resolved to lay out ten new States bounded by latitudes and longitudes, it should be supposed that they would determine something respecting the former before they adjourned; and yet I am much question as to the matter is to happen on the subject that is to-morrow.

As the Congress who are to meet in November next by the adjournment will be composed from an entire new choice of Delegates in each State, it is not in my power at this time to direct you to a proper correspondent in that body. I wish I could—for persuaded I am that to some such cause as you have assigned may be ascribed the delay the petition has encountered, for surely if justice and gratitude to the army—and general policy of the Union were to govern in this case there would not be the smallest interruption in granting its request. I really feel for these gentlemen who by these unaccountable delays (by any other means than those you have suggested) are held in such an awkward and disagreeable state of suspense and I wish my endeavors could remove the obstacles. At Princeton (before Congress left that place) I exerted every power I was master of, and dwelt upon the argument you have used to show the propriety of a speedy decision. Every member with whom I conversed acquiesced in the reasonableness of the petition—all yielded, or seemed to yield to the policy of it, but plead the want of cession of the land to act upon. This is made and accepted and yet matters (as far as they have come to my knowledge) re-

OHIO COMPANY OF ASSOCIATES.

Even in that early day there were patriots more ready to look after personal or local interests than the general good; there were representatives from Massachusetts who would starve their own soldiers in the hope of compelling them to settle in the "Eastern Country"—that is, the District of Maine—and there were other members from New York who were equally selfish in their desire to hasten the settlement of the Western part of their own State. Hence the soldiers who wished to begin a settlement northwest of the Ohio could not obtain land on favorable terms. After much negotiation continued for three years, a bond was signed October 27, 1787, between Samuel Osgood, Walter Livingston, and Arthur Lee the "Bond of Treasury" for Congress and Manasseh Cutler and Winthrop Sargent for the "Ohio Company of Associates," in which the payment of $500,000 by the company was acknowledged and promise was given that when as much more should be paid a deed should be given for 1,500,000 acres of land. This tract was to extend along the Ohio River from the western boundary line of the 7th range to the western boundary of the 17th range and thence northward far enough to include the specified amount.

That this was for the times a very hard bargain is evident from the subsequent action. The land was yet in dispute, still claimed by Indians who were incited by British agents to prevent any settlement north of the Ohio; the first movement, even if there were no enemy, must have been the most expensive for the emigrants; yet after this time the land on which Cincinnati now stands was sold at about 17 cents an acre and even after Wayne's victory and the treaty of peace, a township of better land was sold in New Connecticut at 15 cents an acre. In 1790 it was proposed in Congress to sell land in Ohio at 20 cents an acre. The certificates which the Ohio Company used in paying for their land were the hard earnings of the soldier and Congress should therefore have received them at face value.

But among the people there were many who were actually jealous of the veterans who had fought for independence; they denounced the Order of the Cincinnati as something dangerous and through their representatives forced the soldiers who had spent many years in the thankless task of defending the country to accept a hard bargain. Congress actually bought up its own promises to pay at 80 per cent. below par, and the soldiers were compelled to bear the loss.

It may be asked,—Why did the pioneers select a tract about the mouth of the Muskingum? We must remember that in the wilderness the large streams were the only highways. From the point they selected, the Ohio, Muskingum, Little Muskingum, Duck Creek and the Little Hocking formed the radii of two-thirds of a circle. Besides, the pioneers knew something of the land they were buying. John Mathews, a nephew of Gen. Rufus Putnam, had been a surveyor engaged in laying out the first seven ranges from the Pennsylvania boundary. His letters and journal show that he had also learned much about the land along the Muskingum and Hocking rivers. (Note A.) Captain Hutchins, Geographer General of the United States, who had gone through the Eastern part of this territory, also advised a selection of land on the Muskingum.

There was yet another reason: Fort Harmar had been erected in 1785 by United States troops under Major Doughty on the west bank of the Muskingum at its junction with the Ohio. Part of this spot is now occupied by what is known as the "Fort School" where five or six hundred children of Marietta are trained to be intelligent and useful citizens. Thus this sacred ground still serves as a defense of the republic. The school teacher has taken the place of the soldier and assumed some of his duties.

So much of the land once covered by the fort has been washed away that even the well which is supposed to have stood near the middle is now marked by a heap of stones that lie far out in the river and are only visible in very low water.

But let us return to New England and learn what this Ohio Company of Associates was, and what steps had been taken to organize a settlement. On the 25th of January, 1786, there was published an article signed by General Rufus Putnam and Benjamin Tupper "to inform all officers and soldiers who have served in the late war and who are by an ordinance of the Honorable Congress to receive certain tracts of land in the Ohio Country, and also all other good citizens who wish to become adventurers in that delightful region; that from personal inspection, together with other incontestable evidences, they are fully satisfied that the lands in that quarter are of a much better quality than any other known to New England people." (Note B.)

The suggestion was made that delegates from each county of Massachusetts meet to form an association. Accordingly on the 1st of March, 1786, 11 men,—Winthrop Sargent, John Mills, Manasseh Cutler, John Brooks, Thomas Cushing, Benjamin Tupper, Crocker Sampson, Rufus Putnam, John Patterson, Jahlaliel Woodbridge and Abraham Williams,—met at the Bunch of Grapes tavern in the town of Boston. General Putnam was elected chairman and Major Sargent, secretary. Thus in true American fashion the meeting was organized and the original record written in a neat legible hand remains to this day in the library of Marietta College.

Arrangements were made for organizing a company of 1,000 shares. Each share was to represent a paid-up capital of $1,000 in soldiers' certificates and $10 in gold or silver. The certificates were to be used in the purchase of land; the specie, in meeting current expenses.

ORDINANCE OF 1787.

Business moved slowly in those days. One year later, March 8, 1787, there was a meeting of the Ohio Company at Bracket's tavern in Boston, at which time it was reported that 250 shares had been subscribed. Of the five directors provided by the articles of agreement, three were then elected: Gen. Samuel H. Parsons, Gen. Rufus Putnam and Rev. Manasseh Cutler. The most important work of that board of directors was left with Rev. Mr. Cutler. In the summer of 1787 he went to New York, where he met the members of Congress and had many conferences about the business of the company. On the 13th of July, Congress passed that celebrated "Ordinance for the Government of the Territory of the United States Northwest of the River Ohio." There have been many hot disputes concerning the authorship of this historic paper. It contains provisions suggested long before by Jefferson; it was presented by Nathan Dane, with whom Dr. Cutler was in conference the first day after reaching New York, and the bill before it was passed was shown to Cutler who suggested many amendments. All but one of these amendments were adopted. In its final form this great ordinance secured this territory forever to the Union; it provided that the land should be free from the contaminating touch of slavery, and that there should be religious freedom. It also contained these words which should be familiar to every pupil in Ohio: "Religion, morality and knowledge being necessary to good government and the happiness of mankind, schools and the means of education shall forever be encouraged." The same month an ordinance was passed, authorizing the sale of a large tract of land which, if full payments had been made as originally contemplated, would have been bounded by a line beginning on the Ohio River about seven miles above Marietta, thence northward almost to the northeast corner of Guernsey County, thence west to the Scioto River in Delaware County, thence down the Scioto and up the Ohio to the place of beginning. In fact only about one-fifth of this tract was sold to the Ohio Company, the northwest corner of whose purchase is a little to the east of Logan, Ohio, including all of Athens and Meigs counties, the greater part of Washington and Gallia and small portions of adjacent counties. From this tract, two townships, six miles square, were reserved for the support of a university, section 16 in each township was devoted to the maintenance of schools, and section 29 was "to be appropriated for the purposes of religion." Three sections in each township were reserved for the future disposal by Congress.

Many insinuations against Rev. Manasseh Cutler have been made because he consented to the proposed ordinance for the purchase of nearly 6,000,000 acres when the organization of the Ohio Company provided for the investment of but $1,000,000 in land. The most that can be charged against him from the evidence is a case of "log-rolling," which has not yet been proved a criminal act in itself. He found it impossible to secure the consent of Congress to the purchase about the Muskingum unless his company would nominally assume the purchase of a much larger tract, the greater part of which was really to be bought by another organization, afterward called the Scioto Company, in which he says in his diary "many of the principal characters in America are concerned." At that time when the Ohio Company was making the purchase of a million and a half acres about the Muskingum, it seemed good policy for them to encourage another settlement near their own. It also seemed equally advantageous to the poverty-stricken general government to take this ready way of paying off a part of its debt by the sale of a larger tract of waste land. The subsequent disasters which befell the Scioto Company cast a reproach upon all its transactions, but its early history gives no proof of intent to defraud the government.

The records of the Ohio Company show that the general plan of a city to be located at the mouth of the Muskingum had been adopted before the pioneers left Massachusetts. But the direction and position of the streets and squares were evidently modified by the discovery that another city lay buried beneath the dense forest. Rectangular and circular mounds, long lines of earthworks, proved that a race well advanced in civilization and numerous enough to co-operate in vast undertakings had once lived about the Muskingum. With something of awe, the hardy surveyors looked at these relics of a people whose very name had been forgotten and when they laid out the new city, they so arranged the streets as to leave the largest mounds untouched. Three of these yet remain in lots reserved for the public; the circular mound gives its name to the cemetery in which General Putnam, Commodore Whipple and many other heroes now rest; the two platform mounds have been reserved as parks. About a mile from the Ohio, there were two parallel lines of earthwork, apparently constructed to protect the passage from the fortified town to the Muskingum. This has been called in modern times the Sacra Via, but it has not been held sacred enough to save the old walls of earth from the shovel of the vandal.

LANDING AT THE MOUTH OF THE MUSKINGUM.

In the fall of 1787, Gen. Rufus Putnam was selected to lead the first party from Massachusetts to Muskingum, as the new country was then called. The task was no easy one. First, he must collect a hardy band who could be builders, boatmen, surveyors, woodmen, hunters, farmers, or soldiers, as occasion demanded. These must go by land to the headwaters of the Ohio, there build their own boats and then proceed down the river to their destination. (Note C.) No wonder, then, that the trip and the building took the entire winter and that the pioneers did not reach their new home until the 7th of April, 1788. (Note D.) This day is celebrated year by year at Marietta, and the very spot where the first party of 48 men landed has been marked by a neat monument, the patriotic work of the New Century Historical Society. No women or children came until July, 1788.

The list of the first party has been preserved in the handwriting of Gen. Rufus Putnam and the names have been carved on the monument erected where they landed. General Putnam has also left the record of the men who came within the first year—89 in all—a few of whom brought their families. The next year the whole number of men who came to settle was 153 and in 1790 there were 165 men and 31 families. (Notes E and F.) For the next four or five years there was little increase in the number of permanent settlers. The total population, scattered for 30 miles along the Muskingum and Ohio, from Waterford to Belpre, probably did not, at the end of seven years, exceed 1,000. It was a hard task to transplant New England to what was then the far West.

Of these settlers General Washington said, "No colony in America was ever founded under such favorable auspices as that which has just commenced at the Muskingum. Information, property and strength will be its characteristics. I know many of the settlers personally, and there never were men better calculated to promote the welfare of such a community."

At least 50 of these pioneers had been soldiers in the Revolution. First among them was Rufus Putnam, one of the junior officers, who by faithful service from Bunker Hill to the close of the war had risen from the rank of lieutenant-colonel to that of brigadier-general. For nearly 40 years he was the most prominent figure in local history. Hither came also a son and grandsons of Maj.-Gen. Israel Putnam, whose descendants have borne an honorable part in the history of our State and country.

Next among the leaders was Commodore Whipple, the first naval commander of the Revolution and the first to sail a ship down the Ohio and Mississippi. Rev. Manasseh Cutler also sent a son to this Western campaign, among whose descendants are many who have honorably served the State and the nation.

INDUSTRY AND COURAGE OF THE PIONEERS.

As the leaders of this party were soldiers, some of them well acquainted with the treacherous character of the Indians, it was natural that they would seek a suitable spot and fortify it. Such a place they found where the high ground approaches the Muskingum River at what is now the corner of Washington and Second streets in Marietta. Here they erected the Campus Martius, a stockade or parallelogram of vertical logs set so deep in the earth that some of the pieces have been dug up in recent years and preserved as relics. Veterans have seen such defenses around Knoxville, Tennessee, and in Alexandria, Virginia. The position chosen could not have been defended against artillery from the towering hill on the other side of the Muskingum but the pioneers knew what kind of an enemy they had to meet; so they selected a position close to the river, their only highway. Within this stockade they built cabins and offices. Here Rev. Manasseh Cutler in August and September of that year conducted divine services; here the first court was opened September 2, 1788; here also the first school was taught by Maj. Anselm Tupper and the first Sunday-school, by Mrs. Mary B. Lake, whose grave at Rainbow was covered a few years ago by a mound of flowers placed there by the Sunday-school Association of Ohio. A monument, the gift of the Sunday-schools of this State, now marks her grave and commemorates her work.

A task of equal importance with that of preparing for defense, was the providing of the means of subsistence. With three utensils the pioneers could provide for their wants in the wilderness: with the rifle they could find game; with the axe they could construct their houses, fortifications, and boats, with it they could also girdle the large forest trees, and with the hoe they could dig out the smaller bushes and prepare the soil for planting corn. Their diligence in this work was often mentioned by the officers and soldiers at Fort Harmar. Before many weeks a hundred acres had been cleared and planted in what was then known as the "big cornfield" and which lay in the bottom land between the Campus Martius and the Ohio. A triangular piece of land on the east side of the Muskingum at its mouth was also protected by a log fence or stockade and thus the New Athens had its New Piræus but there were no long walls to connect them—nothing in fact but the Muskingum River and a rough path along its bank.

For more than six years there was no mail route and no post-office. Letters could only be sent by private messenger. One settler, who had made so much progress in farming that he wished to have a yoke of oxen, could find no other way of procuring them than to buy them in New England and have them driven all the way to Ohio. At first the new region was known as Muskingum, and the little town as Adelphi, but in the summer of 1788 the officers of the Ohio Company adopted the name of Marietta in honor of "Her Majesty of France" Marie Antoinette. (Note G.)

The long road through the wilderness did not deter the pioneers from transplanting the best they could find in New England. We have seen how they brought the school and the church with them. They also brought law and order, for the Ordinance of 1787 provided for a temporary government which had power to adopt laws from any State, and Governor St. Clair was sent as the highest executive officer. (Note H.)

Many officers and soldiers who came to Marietta had been members of a traveling lodge of Freemasons which, chartered in Massachusetts in 1775, had kept up its organization to the close of the war. Work was resumed at Marietta and so it happens that American Union Lodge of Marietta is No. 1 in Ohio.

A few years ago George Dana showed the writer a hardy old apple tree which, he said, was the parent of all the Putnam or Roxbury russets found in Ohio. This hardy variety has proved to be one of the strongest to resist the ravages of the pests which have destroyed many of the more rapid growers.

The settlers also brought with them the old-fashioned method of account in pounds, shillings, and pence, which they continued to use in book accounts, at least, until the beginning of the next century. These pounds, shillings, and pence were not the sterling kind, but the money of account used in the colonies and a shilling in one colony meant a very different thing from what it did in another; thus to know whether it was one-sixth, one-eighth or two-fifteenths of a dollar, we must first learn from what one of the old colonies the account comes. Usually the Pennsylvania rate prevailed in the new settlement; that is, a Spanish dollar was counted at seven shillings and six pence, or 90 pence. Hence as the pioneers began to translate their accounts into Jefferson's new-fangled money they would reduce the bill to pence and divide by 90. Thus a workman charged General Putnam one dollar and thirty-five ninetieths a hundred for some lumber, and in 1796 the Ohio Company paid John Matthews one hundred and twenty-one dollars and eighteen ninetieths. It took the people a long while to learn the new way of counting by the decimal system. (Note I.) In fact, it made very little difference to the pioneers whether they wrote dollar or shilling for they rarely saw either. The most of their trading was done by barter. The first library bought by the settlers on Federal Creek was called the "Coonskin Library," because it was purchased with the furs which the young men had collected for that purpose.

In our day when even in the country districts the neighboring store can furnish us articles of necessity or luxury from every quarter of the globe, when car-loads of tropical fruits are as common as wheat or corn, it is hard to realize how destitute the pioneers were of some of the simplest necessities of life. At first the salt, which was brought over the mountains on pack-horses and then by boat down the Ohio, was sold to those who could afford to buy it, at $8 a bushel. After a few years a salt spring near Chandlersville, in Muskingum County, was discovered, and a company was formed to purchase kettles and convey them to the place. These the shareholders could use in rotation and the surrounding forest furnished an abundance of fuel. Even then it was a long, tedious process to boil down the weak solution, so that salt was still worth $4 a hundred. At these primitive salt-works the Duke of Orleans, afterward known as Louis Philipp, spent a night, as the guest of Ephraim Cutler. This same Mr. Cutler gives a vivid picture of his mode of travel in 1799 from what is now Ames township of Athens County to Wolf Creek Mills.

"By the first of May we had cut down the trees standing on about one acre, and had the logs ready for a cabin, when a rain fell sufficient to raise Federal Creek so as to admit large pirogues to come within two miles of my place. I started at once with my two men and Samuel Brown for Waterford, with the purpose of having our goods brought round by water. When we came to Wolf Creek on our way, it was so swelled by the late rains as to be impassable. We found a large bitter-nut hickory tree standing near the creek, which we cut down, and peeled off the bark from about thirty feet of the trunk; and with the bark of the leather wood, which grew there in abundance, we sewed up the two ends; then smeared the slippery inside with earth, so that we could stand up in it, and launched it into the creek. We made some paddles of the wood of the hickory tree, and went aboard our craft. Finding it a better boat than we expected, instead of crossing the stream, as we at first intended, we concluded to use it to convey us down to Wolf Creek Mills, fifteen miles below. The current bore us on at a good speed. Presently we saw a bear on the bank about to swim the creek. Having a rifle on board, we shot him and, landing, carefully placed our prize in our frail canoe. This, with four persons, was rather too heavy a load, and the leatherwood strings threatened to give out. I laid myself down and, grasping my hands around the bow of our boat, remained in that position, holding it firmly together, until we arrived with our cargo safely at the mills.*

These times of suffering often brought out the nobler traits of humanity.

As long as they lived, the first settlers used to recall with gratitude the kindness of Isaac Williams, who settled in Virginia opposite Fort Harmar, in the site that now bears the name of Williamstown. In the fall of 1789 an early frost had so injured the corn that the next spring was a time of great privation. Mr. Williams had a surplus. This he refused to sell to speculators who were eager to buy up his corn at $1 a bushel, but to each family he would sell a few bushels at half the price he had been offered.

OTHER NEAR-BY SETTLEMENTS.

Following close upon the settlement on the Muskingum was another between the Great and the Little Miami. In 1787 John Cleves Symmes made a contract with Congress for the purchase of 1,000,000 acres between these two rivers. He failed to pay for the whole, and therefore secured patents for a little less than one-third of the proposed amount. The first party to occupy land in this purchase was led by Maj. Benjamin Stiles. They landed at the mouth of the Little Miami in November, 1788, and founded the town of Columbia. A second party, under Matthias Denman and Robert Patterson, landed opposite to the mouth of the Licking in December, 1788, and some one proposed the name of Losanteville for a town which was never laid out. The etymology of the name is variously interpreted.

The third party was led by John Cleves

Symmes. He landed at North Bend. The name Symmes was proposed for the town about to be built there but it has ever since been known as North Bend. In June, 1789, a detachment of soldiers under the same Major Doughty who had built Fort Harmar came to the "land opposite the mouth of the Licking" and built Fort Washington. Around this fort grew up the town which soon bore the name of Cincinnati in honor of that order of "embattled farmers" founded by the officers of the Revolutionary Army. It has been asserted that the name was suggested by Governor St. Clair. For nine years the two towns Marietta and Cincinnati were the only county-seats in what is now Ohio, and the only counties were Washington and Hamilton. In the Northwest Territory there were two others: Knox, now the State of Indiana, with seat of justice at Vincennes; and St. Clair or Illinois, with Kaskaskia for its county town.

Almost from the beginning of the settlement between the Miamis, the settlers were harassed by Indians. Within the first year the savages made three attacks, killed four men, wounded others, captured one prisoner and carried off much plunder.

The next settlement was made at Gallipolis, a name suggested in France before the colonists started from their fair home. The misfortunes of these colonists, enticed into the wilderness by the roseate pictures of the wily promoter Joel Barlow, demand for their vivid portrayal the genius of another Longfellow. To understand the history of Gallipolis we must go back to the Scioto Company. This company had in 1788 sent Barlow to Paris to sell 3,000,000 acres of land and induce French settlers to come over. In February, 1790, about 600 emigrants sailed from Havre for Alexandria, Virginia. Thence their route lay through Winchester, Virginia, and Brownsville, Pennsylvania. When their vessels arrived at Alexandria, they learned a little of the perils which confronted them and that even the title to the lands they had purchased was not good.

*From "Life and Times of Ephraim Graham" by his granddaughter, Miss Julia Perkins Cline.

In despair some gave up the journey and settled in the East. About 400 crossed the mountains and found quarters at Gallipolis in the cabins, prepared under the direction of Maj. John Burnham, who had been sent thither by General Putnam. The centennial anniversary of that event was fittingly celebrated at Gallipolis, October 19, 1890. Among the French settlers were many workmen whose skill excited the wonder of the hardy frontiersman. There were goldsmiths and watchmakers, sculptors and glassblowers. Some of their work went down the river to New Orleans and other choice pieces were brought up the Ohio. The beautiful gardens and vineyards were greatly admired by General Putnam and John Heckewelder, who visited Gallipolis in 1792. But there was an accumulation of disasters to blight the fair prospects of the settlement. First, the Indian war disturbed it as had also happened on the Miami and the Muskingum. Then the French Revolution, the greatest of all political and social revolutions, had destroyed the property of some who had promoted the French emigration, and their losses hastened the financial failure of the Scioto Company. Many of the settlers at Gallipolis moved away. A few came to Marietta where their descendants still live. So many French settlers had deserted Gallipolis before 1795, that when General Putnam was called to divide and allot the 24,000 acres of land of the "French Grant,"—a tract on the Ohio above the mouth of the Scioto,—only 93 persons over 18 years of age reported to draw their share. A very interesting history of the Gallipolis settlement has recently been published by Hon. William G. Sibley.

A little later, General Putnam was directed to survey and locate another settlement—one which had been begun in 1773 but which had been destroyed in 1782, and remained utterly destroyed for about 16 years.

At a time when some cold-blooded and weak-headed people are so ready to sneer at the labors of the missionary, it is worth while to recall the heroism of the Moravians who came to the upper waters of the Muskingum long before the settlement was begun at Marietta. As early as 1762 John Heckewelder commenced his missionary career about the heads of the Tuscarawas. In the spring of 1773 he came down the Ohio with a party of Christian Indians, who in 22 canoes were seeking a peaceful home beyond the reach of the savage frontiersman. They went up the Muskingum beyond the present site of Coshocton and founded Gnadenhutzen (The Tents of Grace). Unfortunately they were between the British and Americans in time of a bitter war—a war in which many Indians were taking part on one side or the other. Hence the poor Christian Indians were persecuted by all parties, and at last in 1782, at the very time when a British officer was sending orders for them to leave their pleasant corn-fields, the crowning atrocity of the war was consummated, by a party of Americans from Mingo who murdered 93 unresisting prisoners.

In 1798 the self-sacrificing missionary Zeisberger returned with a little band of Christian Indians to the banks of the Tuscarawas, where Congress had granted them 12,000 acres of land. About the same time Heckewelder and many Moravians from Pennsylvania returned and made new homes at Gnadenhutzen, where on the 12th of August, 1900, the Moravian Church of that place celebrated its 100th anniversary. Tuscarawas is a good Indian name; yet when we recall the noble heroism of missionaries and martyrs, we regret that the legislature did not adopt for that country the name first proposed, Moravia. ## NOTES.

Note A.—

SURVEYING IN OHIO IN 1786-87.

(Extracts from the journal of John Matthews. The manuscript is in the private collection of K. M. Stevenson, of Marietta, Ohio.)

General Rufus Putnam, was sent by his uncle
The writer of this journal, a nephew of in the summer of 1786 to assist in the survey of the lands lying west and north of the Ohio River. Mr. Mathews was to receive for his services two shillings—about 25 cents—daily and rations. Evidently he was not there for the wages alone. He had a keen eye for good farming land and he noted very carefully where it could be found as he tramped across the territory that now forms Carroll, Columbiana, Harrison, Jefferson and Belmont counties.

Saturday, July 29th. Arrived at the camp about 8 o'clock P. M. Found the surveyors were on the way to Ohio to Little Bear Creek. Received directions from Gen'l Tupper by Col. Shairman to go down the river, Col. Shairman being to set out immediately for Beaver Creek. We crossed the Muscogee river and went about a mile and a half and put up for the night.

Sunday, 30th. Proceeded down S. E. side of the Ohio river for Beaver Creek, put up at within 4 miles of camp.

Monday, 31st. Arrived at camp on the E. bank of the Ohio this morning where the surveyors are waiting for the troops from Mingo who are to assist them on their survey.

Tuesday, 1st. Crossed the river this day with Capt. Hoops to begin the 2nd raing of townships. Camp'd 5 miles from the river—on the E. and W. line. On coming the line I found the land hilly and uneven except near the Ohio and of an excellent quality many of the side hills most fit for grazing and the tops of the ridges level and excellent for wheat.

On the 25th of August their line leads them across the "N fork of Yellow Creek."

Sept. 1st, 1786. Major Hoops having been for some time in a bad state of health and growing more unwell, concluded this morning to leave the line and return to camp at Little Beaver. Accordingly decamped at 9 a. m. and got as far as the 5th mile post on the N. boundary of the 2nd raing.

Saturday, Sept. 2nd. Arrived at Little Beaver at 3 o'clock P. M. Found the surveyors had all left camp except Gen'l. Tupper, Capt. Morris and Mr. Duffie.

On the 6th he started westward with General Tupper and passed north of the present site of Carrollton.

Monday, 11th. The second mile is through a large swamp coming from the S. E. and running north-westwardly. The soil deep and mirey in many places but when cleared it will make excellent low meadow.

and he and myself carry the chain.

Tuesday, 3 o'clock A. M. Mr. Tupper and myself with a hunter left Major Sargent's camp in order to fall in with Gen'l. Tupper on the geographers' line who we found encamped near the end of the 6th raing.

Wednesday, 14th. We found the geographers' camp on Sandy creek, a large branch of the Tuskarawas.

16th. The north bounds of the 7th raing not being completed, Gen'l. Tupper could not enter upon business this day.

Sunday, 17th. I went to a camp of Indians who were returning from Fort McIntosh to their town. They were encamped 80 rods above us on the creek. They were about eighteen in number, men and women. They had rum with them and had a drunken frolic the night before, but appeared decent and friendly.

Monday, 18th. 10 o'clock Gen'l. Tupper began his raing and our camp moved to west about 3 miles to another large branch of the Tuskarawas, called Nime-hilling. After we had run  $\frac{3}{4}$  of a mile an express arrived from Major Hantranck's camp at Little Beaver and brought information that the Indians were assembling at the Shawanees towns and intended making a general attack on the surveyors. Capt. Hutchens and Gen'l. Tupper thought it unsafe to proceed any further. Information was immediately sent to Capt. Morris who had got about one mile and a half on the west boundary of the 7th raing.

19th. Decamped and marched for Little Beaver. Our whole party consisted of about fifty men about  $\frac{3}{8}$  of which was troops.

On the 25th and 26th Mr. Mathews was going down the Ohio to see his friend, Wm. Greathouse, who seems to have lived on the Virginia side, not far from Mingo.

27th. Arrived at Mr. Greathouses about one o'clock P. M. He has a good farm and lives decently. The country through which I came is hilly except on the river and creek bottoms but in general rich and capable of producing Indian corn, hemp, flax, wheat, rye, oats, barley, etc., likewise large quantities of excellent good mowing. It is considerably settled and though the inhabitants do not yet live in affluence they have a great plenty of the immediate necessities of life.

Oct. 3rd, 1786. This day I had an offer of teaching a school the ensuing winter and considering the improbability of the surveyors going to business again this year I thought best to accept it.

5th. I went to Esqr. McMachans (which is about six miles below Mr. Greathouses) and found that the surveyors were principally collected there and were determined to continue part of the rainges and was to be escorted by the whole of Maj. Hantranck's detachment. Having an inclination to take another tour in the woods and a school house not being ready, I engaged to go with Major Sargent to the 5th raing.

11th, 10 o'clock A. M., crossed the Ohio one mile below the old Mingo town and took the route of Crofford's trail which leaves the river at the upper end of the Mingo bottom. Encamped at night about 2 miles from Mingo town. Our party consisted of the surveyor and his assistants and a captain and 24 men as escort. The Mingo bottom contains some thousands of acres and is very fine land. Indian Cross Creek runs through it. After ascending the point of the ridge from the bottom the land is exceedingly rich, and forms gentle inequalities and most beautiful situations for farms.

12th. Proceeded still by the route of Crofford's trail in nearly a N. W. direction.

For the next two weeks they were surveying on the branches of the Stillwater and slowly working southward.

30th. About noon our packhorsesmen returned from looking after their horses and informed that they were not to be found and that the Indians had stolen them (except one poor horse) which was evident from several corroborating circumstances. The Indians who stole our horses were about six in number. They lay part of the night within about 80 rods of camp and we suppose took our horses about eleven o'clock in the evening. They likewise stole a buckskin out of a brook within one hundred yards of camp. It was evident they had been lurking round us for several days. On information of our horses being stolen, Capt. Heart immediately began building a blockhouse on the most advantageous ground in the vicinity of our camp.

31st. We dispatched a man this morning for Major Hamtramck on Indian Weeling rivulet informing of our situation and requesting more horses so that we might proceed on our range.

Nov. 3d. The man who was sent to Major Hamtramck's camp arrived with only three horses, which will not be sufficient to move our baggage without going twice. Major Sargent proposes proceeding on the south boundary of the township on the morrow.

4th. Major Sargent this morning concludes to leave the wood as soon as he has run the south boundary of the 7th township. The land we run this day is level and excellent wheat land, principally timbered with white oak. The waters are the branches of McMachan's rivulet which empties into the Ohio below Weeling.

Nov. 7th. After dinner I left Weeling in company with Capt. Hutchens to go to Esqr. McMachans which is about 16 miles above Weeling.

8th. At sundown we arrived at the mouth of Buffalo one mile from Esqr. McMachan's. Capt. Hutchens camped at the river and I went to Esqr. McMachan's where I tarried all night.

11th. I went to Mr. Harmon Greathouses, father of my good friend Mr. Wm. Greathouse, where I found a number of the neighbors seated in social glee round a heap of corn. The inspiring juice of rye had enlivened their imaginations and had given their tongues such an exact balance that they moved with the greatest alacrity, while relating scenes of boxing, wrestling, hunting, etc. At dusk of evening the corn was threshed and the company retired to the house where many of them took such hearty draughts of the generous liquor as quite deprived them of the use of their limbs. Some quarreled, some sung, and others laughed, and the whole displayed a scene more diverting than edifying. At 11 o'clock all that could walk went home and left three or four round the fire hugging the whiskey bottle and arguing very obstinately on religion, at which I left them and went to bed.

Nov. 22nd. This day Gen. Tupper left this place for Massachusetts, by whom I had the pleasure of sending a number of letters to my friends.

On February 4th, 1787, Mr. Mathews went to Fort Steuben, to act as commissary. He had to issue supplies to about 100 men and this duty seems to have left him little time to keep a journal, but there are brief entries, chiefly about the weather, until April 21st, when the record closes abruptly. In April, 1788, he was one of the pioneers to begin the settlement at the mouth of the Muskingum and in 1796 he removed to what is now Muskingum county.

"On the 25th day of January, 1786, appeared in the public prints a piece styled "Information," with signatures of the Generals Putnam and Tupper, of the late American army, in substance, as follows:

INFORMATION.

The subscribers take this method to inform all officers and soldiers who have served in the late war, and who are by an ordinance of the Honorable Congress to receive certain tracts of land in the Ohio Country, and also all other good citizens who wish to become adventurers in that delightful region; that from personal inspection, together with other incontestable evidences, they are fully satisfied that the lands in that quarter are of much better quality than any other known to New England people. That the climate, seasons, produce, etc., are, in fact, equal to the most flattering accounts which have ever been published of them. That being determined to become purchasers, and to prosecute a settlement in this country; and desirous of forming a general association with those who entertain the same ideas, they have to propose the following plan, viz.: That an association by the name of the Ohio Company be formed of all such as wish to become purchasers, etc., in that country (who reside in the commonwealth of Massachusetts only, or to extend to the inhabitants of other States, as shall be agreed on).

That in order to bring such a company into existence, the subscribers propose, that all persons who wish to promote the scheme should meet within their respective counties (except in two instances hereinafter mentioned), at ten o'clock A. M. on Wednesday the 15th of February next, and that each county meeting, there assembled, choose delegates, on the 1st day of March, 1786, to meet at the Bunch of Grapes tavern in Boston, Essex; at Captain Webb's, in Salem, Middlesex; at Bradish's, in Cambridge, Hampshire; at Temperley's, in North Hampton, Plymouth; at Bartlett's, in Plymouth, Barnstable, Dukes and Nantucket counties; at Howland's, in Barnstable, Bristol; at Crocker's, in Tammonton, York; at Woodbridge's in N. York, Worcester; at Patch's, in Worcester, Cumberland and Lincoln; at Shattuck's, in Falmouth, Berkshire; at Dibble's, in Lenox.

RUFUS PUTNAM
BENJAMIN TUPPER

RUTLAND, January 10, 1786.

"In consequence of the foregoing, on the 1st day of March, 1786, convened at the Bunch of Grapes tavern, in Boston, as delegates from several of the counties of the Commonwealth of Massachusetts, to consider of the expediency of forming an association or company to purchase lands and make a settlement in the western country, the gentlemen whose names are underwritten:

County of Suffolk—Winthrop Sargent, John Mills.
County of Essex—Manassah Cutler.
County of Middlesex—John Brooks, Thomas Cushing.
County of Hampshire—Benjamin Tupper.
County of Plymouth—Crocker Sanborn.
County of Worcester—Rufus Putnam.
County of Berkshire—John Patterson, Jadedel Woodbridge.
County of Barnstable—Abraham Williams.

"Elected General Rufus Putnam, chairman of the convention, and Major Winthrop Sargent, clerk.

"From the very pleasing description of the western country given by Generals Putnam and Tupper and others, it appearing expedient to form a settlement there, a motion was made for choosing a committee to prepare the draught or plan of an association into a company to the said purpose, for the inspection and approbation of this convention. Resolved in the affirmative.

"Also, resolved, That this committee shall consist of five. General Putnam, Mr. Cutler, Colonel Brooks, Major Sargent, and Captain Cushing were elected.

"On Friday, the 3d of March, the convention met, and the committee reported as follows:

Articles of agreement entered into by the subscribers for constituting an association by the name of the Ohio Company.

The design of this association is to raise a fund in Continental certificates, for the sole purpose, and to be appropriated to the entire use of purchasing lands in the Western Territory (belonging to the United States), for the benefit of the company, and to promote a settlement in that country.

Article 1st.—That the fund shall not exceed one million of dollars, in Continental specie certificates, exclusive of one year's interest due thereon (except as hereafter provided), and that such share or subscription shall consist of one thousand dollars, as aforesaid, and also ten dollars in gold or silver, to be paid into the hands of such agents as the subscribers may select.

Article 2d.—That the whole fund of certificates raised by this association, except one year's interest due thereon, mentioned under the first article, shall be applied to the purchase of lands in some one of the proposed States, northwesterly of the river Ohio, as soon as those lands are surveyed, and exposed for sale by the commissioners of Congress, according to the ordinance of that honorable body, passed the 20th of May, 1784; or on any other plan that may be adopted by Congress, not less advantageous to the company. The one year's interest shall be applied to the purpose of making a settlement in the country, and assisting those who may be otherwise unable to remove themselves thither. The gold and silver is for defraying the expenses of those persons employed as agents in purchasing the lands, and other contingent charges that may arise in the prosecution of the business. The surplus, if any, to be appropriated as the one year's interest on the certificates.

Article 3d.—That there shall be five directors, a treasurer and secretary appointed, in manner and for the purposes hereafter provided.

Article 4th.—That the prosecution of the company's designs may be the least expensive, and at the same time, the subscribers and agents as secure as possible, the proprietors of twenty shares shall constitute one grand division of the company, appoint their agent, and in case of vacancy by death, resignation, or otherwise, shall fill it up as immediately as can be.

Article 5th.—That the agent shall make himself accountable to each subscriber for certificates and moneys received by duplicate receipts (one of which shall be lodged with the secretary); that the whole shall be appropriated according to those articles of association, and that the subscriber shall receive his just divided according to quality and quantity of lands purchased, as near as possibly may be, by lot drawn in person or through proxy; and that deeds of conveyance shall be executed to individual subscribers, by the agents, similar to those he shall receive from the directors.

Article 6th.—That no person shall be permitted to hold more than five shares in the company's funds, and no subscriber more than a full share will be admitted, but this is not meant to prevent those who can not, or choose not, to acquire a full share from associating among themselves, and by one of their number subscribing the sum required.

Article 7th.—That the directors shall have the sole disposal of the company's fund, for the purposes before mentioned; that they shall, by themselves, or such person or persons as they may think proper to entrust with the business, purchase lands for the benefit of the company, where, and in such way, either at public or private sale, as they shall judge will be most advantageous to the company. They shall also direct the application of the one year's interest, and gold and silver mentioned in the first article, to the purposes mentioned under the second article, in such way and manner as they shall think proper. For those purposes, the directors shall draw on the treasurer from time to time, making themselves accountable for the application of the moneys, agreeably to this association.

Article 8th.—That the agents, being accountable to the subscribers for their respective divisions, shall appoint the directors, treasurer and secretary, and fill up all the vacancies which may happen in these offices respectively.

Article 9th.—That the agents shall pay all the certificates and moneys received from subscribers into the hands of the treasurer, who shall give bonds to the agents, jointly and severally, for the faithful discharge of his trust; and also, on his receiving certificates or moneys from any particular agent, shall make himself accountable therefor, according to the condition of his bonds.

Article 10th.—That the directors shall give bonds, jointly and severally, to each of the agents, conditioned that the certificates and moneys they shall draw out of the treasury shall be applied to the purposes stipulated in these articles; and that the lands purchased for the company shall be divided among them within three months, from the completion of the purchase, by lot, in such manner as the agents or a majority of them shall agree; and that, on such divisions being made, the directors shall execute deeds to the agents, respectively, for the proportions which fall to their divisions, correspondent to those the directors may receive from the commissioners of Congress.

Article 11th.—Provided, that whereas a sufficient number of subscribers may not appear to raise the fund, to the sums proposed in the first article, and thereby the number of divisions may not be completed, it is therefore agreed that the agents of divisions of twenty shares each shall, after the 17th day of October next, proceed in the same manner as if the whole fund proposed had been raised.

Article 12th.—Provided, also, that whereas it will be for the common interest of the company, to obtain an ordinance of incorporation from the Honorable Congress, or an act of incorporation from some one of the States of the Union (for which the directors shall make application), it is therefore agreed, that in case such incorporation is obtained, the fund of the company (and, consequently, the shares and divisions thereof) may be extended to any sum, for which provision shall be made in said ordinance or act of incorporation, any thing in this association to the contrary notwithstanding.

Article 13th.—That all votes under this association may be given in person, or by proxy, and in numbers justly proportionate to the stock holden, or interest represented.

After adopting the articles of association, which constituted the Ohio Company, a committee of three was appointed, "to transact the necessary business of the company until the directors are chosen."

Note C.—

At a meeting of the agents and directors of the Ohio Company, held at "Cromwell's Head" tavern, in Boston, the 21st day of November, 1787, it was resolved, among other things, "That the house lots shall consist of ninety feet front and one hundred and eighty feet in depth," and "that the centre street crossing the city be one hundred and fifty feet wide." At this meeting it was ordered "That no more subscriptions for shares be received after the first of January; and that they adjourn to the first Wednesday in March next, to meet at Providence, Rhode Island, for the purpose of drawing the eight-acre lots, which are directed to be surveyed by that time."

At a meeting of the directors of the Ohio Company, at Bracket's tavern in Boston, November 23, 1787, it was ordered, "that four surveyors be employed, under the direction of the superintendent, hereinafter named; that twenty-two men shall attend the surveyors; that there be added to this number twenty men, including six boat builders, four house carpenters, one blacksmith, and nine common workmen, in all forty-eight men. That the boat builders shall proceed, on Monday next, and the surveyors rendezvous at Hartford, the 1st day of January next, on their way to the Muskingum; that the boat builders and men, with the surveyors, be proprietors in the company; that their tools, one axe and one hoe to each man, and thirty pounds weight of baggage, shall be carried in the company's wagons, and that the subsistence of the men on their journey be furnished by the company; that upon their arrival at the place of destination, and entering upon the business of their employment, the men shall be subsisted by the company, and allowed wages at the rate of four dollars (each) per month, until discharged; that they be held in the company's service until the 1st day of July next, unless sooner discharged; and if any of the persons employed shall leave the service, or wilfully injure the same, or disobey the orders of the superintendent, or others acting under him, the person so offending shall forfeit all claim to wages; that their wages shall be paid the next autumn in cash, or lands, upon the same terms as the company purchased them; that each man furnish himself with a good small arm, bayonet, six flints, a powder horn and pouch, priming wire and brush, half a pound of powder, one pound of balls, and one pound of buckshot. The men so engaged shall be subject to the orders of the superintendent, and those he may appoint as aforesaid, in any kinds of business they shall be employed in, as well for boat building and surveying, as for building houses, erecting defenses, clearing land, and planting or otherwise, for promoting the settlement. And as there is a possibility of interruption from enemies, they shall also be subject to orders as aforesaid in military command, during the time of their employment. That the surveyors shall be allowed twenty-seven dollars per month and subsistence, while in actual service, to commence upon their arrival at the Muskingum; that Colonel Ebenezer Sproat, from Rhode Island, Mr. Anselm Tupper, and Mr. John Mathews, from Massachusetts, and Colonel R. J. Meigs from Connecticut, be the surveyors; that General Rufus Putnam be the superintendent of all the business aforesaid, and he is to be obeyed and respected accordingly; that he be allowed for his services forty dollars per month and his expenses, to commence from the time of his leaving home."

To enable General Putnam to execute the business of the company, the directors furnished him with a commission, embracing full power to do and transact all matters necessary for the progress of the settlement. A meeting of the directors and agents was held on the 5th day of March, 1788, at Rice's tavern, in Providence, Rhode Island.

The agents then present represented 1,000 shares and they proceeded to draw for the eight-acre lots which had been surveyed in the vicinity of the new city, at the mouth of the Muskingum River. At this meeting it was resolved, that a committee, composed of Rev. Mr. Cutler, General Varnum and Colonel May, "consider and report upon the expediency of employing some suitable person as a public teacher, at the settlement now making by the Ohio Company." They reported—"That the directors be requested to pay as early attention as possible to the education of youth, and the promotion of public worship, among the first settlers; and that for these important purposes, they employ, if practicable, an instructor eminent for literary accomplishments, and the virtue of his character, who shall also superintend the first scholastic institutions, and direct the manner of instruction, and to enable the directors to carry into execution the intentions expressed in this resolution, the proprietors, and others of benevolent and liberal minds, are earnestly requested to contribute by voluntary donation to the forming a fund to be solely appropriated thereto."

Under this resolution the directors authorized Mr. Cutler to search out and employ some suitable person to fulfill the intentions of the company. He engaged Rev. Daniel Story, then a young man who had been but a short time in the ministry, to go on to Marietta, as a preacher of the gospel, where he arrived in the course of the next year.

Shall ascend the Alleghany to-morrow, in order to part of the Ohio Company. Be assured, Sir, that every assistance and protection that is in our power shall doubt but a flourishing settlement will soon take place, as they are industrious, and quite a different set of people from these frontier men. I waited with great impatience for the arrival of General Putnam, and it would have afforded me peculiar pleasure to have been personally present with him, but Major Doughty, who commands during my absence, will (agreeably to your letter of instructions) give them every necessary assistance.

I have the honor, etc.,

JOS. HARMAR.

General Putnam to Rev. Manassah Cutler

ADRIATH, May 16, 1788.

Your favor of the 20th of February came to hand a few days since, and I find by its contents that Mr. Plumer has alarmed the people with respect to the Indians very much, and perhaps he is not to blame, for had I given heed to the opinion, at least pretended opinion, of people at Pittsburgh and its vicinity, I certainly should not have come down without an army for my protection. However, we made no delay on that account; that the Indians are dissatisfied on account of Congress or the Commissioners of Congress at the several treaties which have been held considering these lands as the property of the United States in consequence of the part the Indians took in the war and the treaty of peace with Great Britain is true; they have told Congress so in a spirited, manly letter addressed to that honorable body by Joseph Brant, in which he assures them that unless the wrongs are redressed and the lands fairly purchased, the Indians will certainly go to war (and I believe they will be as good as their word).

In consequence of this application of Brant's, Congress has promised them a treaty which was to have been holden about this time, but I am told that the Indians have informed Governor St. Clair that they are to hold a great council among themselves about the middle of June near St. Dusky. From these circumstances it is probable Governor St. Clair will not be able to see them till July, when I have no doubt everything will be settled to general satisfaction.

At present we do not think ourselves perfectly secure from them on account of a few lawless banditti made up of Mingoes, Shawnees and Cherokees who reside at present on the waters of the Scioto. They are a set of thieves and murdering rascals, but from any other quarter we are under no apprehension at present. The Delawares and Wyandots visit us almost every day and appear very friendly; relying on it, as I believe, that Governor St. Clair at the treaty will have power and inclination to do them complete justice.

You wish to be informed if it will be prudent for families to move on in the spring and summer. I answer, by all means; for let the treaty end how it may, the sooner they get in the way of cultivating their land and raising provisions the better. The constant coming in of new settlers and the troops which will be kept in the country by Congress will give us a good market for many years. The little scouting parties of Indians, if they are never won to be our friends, can never do any considerable injury; on the other hand, should there be a general Indian war this will be a place of general rendezvous for an army. So that in all human probability the settlement can never fail of the protection of government.

It will give you pain and me no pleasure to detail our march over the mountains or our delays afterward on account of the bad weather or other misfortunes. I shall only observe that I arrived at Major White's on the Youghiogheny River the 14th of February, no boats built, no boards or plank in readiness, no person capable of building a house, much less a boat, among the party, mill froze up and no boards to be had. He had, however, three canoes, such as they were, on the stocks and five of his men sick with the smallpox, which they took by inoculation.

On the first day of April in the afternoon we left the Youghiogheny, and arrived at Fort Harmar the 7th, being obliged to [ ] at Harmar and Buffalo Creek on our way to take in provisions, etc. Our whole fleet consisted of the Union Galley of 45 tons burthen designed to pass and repass from between this and Buffalo or Cross Creek to bring down letters, the Adelphi ferry boat, burthen 3 tons, for the use of the settlers at the port, and three log canoes of different sizes.

On our arrival here the surveys commenced immediately, but a series of rainy weather and being obliged to survey so much more than we expected in order to obtain lands suitable to our purpose, prevented our completing our plans till yesterday. The city lots will be ready to draw by the first Wednesday of July, as proposed, but the others will not. It was Genl. Knox's advice and I shall not presume to survey any more till after the treaty.

The men have most of them been employed these odd days in clearing land for themselves, which they will plant next week. The rest have been doing the same for the company. The whole quantity of corn planted I expect will be about 100 acres. As soon as this work is over we shall turn our attention to building houses, and boats suitable to prosecute the survey with.

As to the mode of conveying letters, I have hit on none yet to convey from this to Philadelphia or from thence to this place that could be depended on. Perhaps we may find out some in the course of the summer.

The expense has rose much beyond our calculation and if the treaty concludes favorably the survey must no doubt be pushed till late in the fall. Of consequence more money will be wanted, but I expect Generals Parsons and Varnum will be on soon; will therefore not propose anything on the subject.

The men are generally in good health and, I believe, much pleased with the country; that I am so myself you may rest assured.

The winter in this quarter was severe, indeed, the most so known for many years. But I can only add the situation of the city plat is the most delightful of any I ever saw, and those traces of ancient walls, mounds, etc., are truly surprising. Mr. Sargent's painting gives but a faint idea of what is to be seen when on the spot.

The letter of General Putnam is dated from Adelphi, the proposed name of the town at the mouth of the Muskingum. In some printed copies of this letter as well as in some local histories the name is spelled Adelphia, and this is said to be the form which had been suggested by Manasseh Cutler, but General Putnam writes it very distinctly in a number of places "Adelphi." For a long time the settlements in what is now Washington County were known by the general name of Muskingum. This name often appears on the dates and superscriptions of old letters and was occasionally used by writers in the East, well on into the present century.

The total number of families who in 1794 left for Ohio, and who left the borders of Indiana for Ohio, was 1,100. The first of these people, 38 men and 100 women, arrived at Marietta.

NOTE F.

FROM RUTLAND, MASSACHUSETTES, TO MARIETTA, OHIO.

From Rutland, Vermont, to Marietta, Ohio, 1791-1793.

I remember the morning of our starting for Ohio. Mr. Burlingame's family (and I was one of them) went to General (Rufus) Putnam's the evening before. This was in September, 1790.

It seemed, even to the old folks, a vast enterprise to go 800 miles into a savage country, as it was then called. There were three ox-wagons with two yoke of oxen to each, and General Putnam's two-horse carriage and one saddle horse.

We were eight weeks on the journey. I was then eight years old—too young to remember much about the journey. I think we did not travel on the Sabbath, for I distinctly remember that we tarried at Bethlehem, Pennsylvania, and attended public worship. This was a settlement of people of the Moravian Church.

Near Simrell's Ferry, on the Youghiogheny River, we waited a few days till the boats were finished, which General Putnam had engaged the summer previous when he was returning from Ohio to New England.

It was slow tedious work on the river—often getting aground, when all the men from both boats had to unite to shove the boat over the shoal place.

At length we arrived at Marietta about nine o'clock in the morning—I cannot tell the day. The first resident of Marietta that I knew was Colonel Bent. He came into the boat to welcome us. His house was on Front street, though the streets were not distinguished from other parts of the great cornfield which covered most of the town. Large girdled trees were standing all along from the Point to the Campus Martius.

Note G.—

The records of the Ohio Company show when and where the official name Marietta was given in honor of Queen Marie Antoinette. "At a meeting of the Directors of the Ohio Company on the 2nd day of July, 1788, and continued by adjournment to the 14th day of August, on the banks of the Muskingum and near the confluence of that river with the Ohio," among many other resolutions passed was the following:

Resolved, That hereafter the name of the City of Muskingum be called Marietta. That the Directors write to His Excellency, Comte Moustiers, informing him of their motives in naming the city, and requesting his opinion whether it will be advisable to present Her Majesty of France a public square.

Note H.—

On the 9th day of July, Governor St. Clair arrived at Fort Harmar, escorted by a detachment of troops under Major Doughty, who had gone up to Pittsburg some days before for that purpose. He was received with military honors, and a salute of 14 guns. The 15th of July, as appears from the journal of Paul Fearing, was agreed upon for his first appearance before the citizens of the territory. At five o'clock, P. M., he came over from Fort Harmar in the government barge, escorted by the officers of the garrison, and the secretary, Winthrop Sargent, Esq. He was received in the bowery by General Putnam, the judges of the Territory, and the principal inhabitants of the new colony. The secretary read the ordinance of Congress forming the Northwest Territory, the governor's commission, the judges', and his own. He was then congratulated on his welcome arrival at the seat of government by General Putnam, and three cheers closed the ceremonies of the day.

ORDINANCE OF CONGRESS.

Whereas, Section 8 of the original Ordinance of 1787, entitled "An Ordinance for the Government of the Territory of the United States, Northwest of the River Ohio,"

Which said section is as follows: "We, therefore, the Representatives of the United States in Congress assembled, do hereby give and grant to you, the said Arthur St. Clair, all the powers, authorities, and prerogatives assigned to the governor of the said territory in and by the said ordinance. And we do strictly enjoin all persons to pay due obedience to this, our commission. This commission to take effect from the 1st day of February, 1788, and to continue in force for the term of three years thereafter, unless sooner revoked by Congress. In testimony, &c."

COMMISSION TO ONE OF THE JUDGES.

The United States in Congress assembled to Samuel Holden Parsons, Esq.

We, yoursing, speed trust and confidence in your wisdom, uprightness and integrity, have constituted and appoint, and by these presents do constitute and appointed you, the said Samuel Holden Parsons, one of the judges in and over the territory of the United States northwest of the river Ohio, with full power and authority, in conjunction with one or more of the judges of said territory, to form a court, with all the powers and authorities incident to a court having a common law jurisdiction, and to exercise all such powers, and perform and execute all the duties directed by the ordinance of the 13th July, 1787, entitled, "an Ordinance for the Government of the Territory Northwest of the River Ohio," which is hereto affixed; giving to you, the said S. H. P., all the powers and authorities assigned to a judge of the said territory, in and by the ordinance aforesaid; and we do enjoin all persons to pay due obedience to this our commission. This commission to continue and be in force, during good behavior, or during the existence of the government established by the ordinance aforesaid. You residing within the said territory. In testimony, &c.

The two other judges were James Mitchell Varnum, from Philadelphia, and John Cleves Symmes, of New Jersey. Mr. Symmes had not arrived, but was expected on soon. Winthrop Sargent, secretary of the territory, was a native of Boston, but latterly a citizen of New Hampshire.

The judges who succeeded these in the Territory, were S. H. Parsons and J. C. Symmes, re-appointed by the President, with the advice and consent of the senate, and William Barton, in place of J. M. Varnum, deceased, August 20, 1789. In September, 1789, George Turner was appointed, Mr. Barton having declined the office. On March 31, 1790, Gen. Rufus Putnam succeeded S. H. Parsons, deceased. Joseph Gilman was made a judge in place of General Putnam, who had received the office of surveyor general of United States lands, December 22, 1796; February 12, 1798, R. J. Meigs, Jr., in the place of G. Turner, resigned. Judges Symmes, Gilman and Meigs were in office when the General Assembly of the Territory convened in September, 1799. (Chase's Stat. of Ohio.)

judges at Marietta. The more important of these early acts were: "A law regulating and establishing the militia," July 25, 1788; also "a law for establishing general Courts of Quarter Session of the peace (and therein of the powers of single justices), and for establishing County Courts of Common Pleas (and therein of the powers of single judges, to hear and determine upon small debts and contracts);" also a law for the establishing of the office of sheriff, and the appointment of sheriffs. The Court of Quarter Session was held four times a year in each county, and was composed of the justices of the peace, nominated and commissioned by the governor. Not less than three, nor more than five of these justices were especially named in a general commission, for holding the said Courts of Quarter Session. Three of them might hold special courts when required, one of them being of the quorum. In the year 1790, the number of justices was increased to nine in a county, and it received authority to divide the counties into townships, to appoint constables, overseers of the poor, clerks of townships, and to establish public roads.

The County Courts of Common Pleas were composed of not less than three nor more than five persons, commissioned by the governor, and authorized to hold and keep a court of record. This court convened twice a year, in each county, at the place where the Quarter Sessions were held. In 1790 the periods were increased to four in a year and the judges to seven. A sheriff was appointed by the governor for each county, who took the oath of allegiance to the United States, and of office, and gave a bond of $4,000. He had ample authority to suppress riots, keep the peace, arrest criminals, &c. (Pub. Aug. 23, 1788.) A Court of Probate was established, composed of a single judge for the settlements of estates, recording of wills, &c. This court was opened four times in a year, and oftener if necessary. (Pub. Aug. 30, 1788.)

final suits, at such courts as the judges deemed most conducive to the public good, they giving timely notice of their sitting. The periods were the first Mondays of February, May, October, and December. Process, both civil and criminal, could be returned to this court at any place in the territory, where they might be convened. They were not obliged to hold more than one court a year, in any one county. (Pub. at Marietta, Aug. 30, 1788; Chase's Stat. of Ohio.)

The law respecting crimes and their punishment, published on the 6th of September, 1788, shows that the principles of justice, morality and good order, were deeply impressed on the hearts and minds of the Governor and judges. The section for the suppression and prevention of profanity, irreverent and obscene language, with the closing one for the sacred observance of the Christian Sabbath, are worthy of all praise, and the particular motive of modern law makers. In accordance with the usage of that period, the punishment for theft and minor offenses consisted of fines, whipping, confinement in the stocks, and binding out to hard labor for a limited time, where the offense had been often repeated and the offender unable or refused to make restitution. For this purpose every county was provided with a pillory, whipping post, and stocks, in addition to the jail. These emblems of justice were continued in Marietta, as a terror to evil-doers, as late as the year 1812, or until the period of the introduction of the present penitentiary system.

Note I.—

OLD-TIME CURRENCY.

Bundles of bills and receipts written more than a hundred years ago do not seem very inviting to the general reader, but a little careful study of these old papers will help us to understand the confusion of currency prevailing in the United States before the decimal system came into general use. This system was recommended by Jefferson as early as 1783 and in July, 1785, the (Spanish) dollar was adopted as the unit. That this dollar was familiar to the pioneers, in both their old home and their new, is evident from many papers, of which the following is a fair example:

Received of _____ the sum of _____ Dollars for _____ Silver, Spanish Mill Dollars on demand with interest till paid.
Witness my hand,
GRIFFIN GREENE.

In the new settlement in Ohio, Arnold Clarke and John Tracy enter into a contract January 31, 1789. Clarke agrees to clear lots 123 and 136, plant them as specified, and hoe the crop. For this service Tracy promises to pay "twenty Spanish mill dollars," to find the seed, and to "pay the customary rate for hoeing and weeding."

A few other coins were brought with the emigrants. In an inventory of the property left by Gen. James Varnum taken at Marietta, January 24, 1789, under the item "Cash" we find

1 half Johannes
3 English Guineas
Eight Dollars.

About the same time, probably a few days later, the following note was sent to Mr. Greene, who had charge of the estate, by an Indian trader, Thomas Gibson:

DEAR SIR: I have much pressed this morning for some hard cash and if you would be so good as to lend me three half loes for a few days I will be much obliged to you and have sent by the bearer some Ohio Orders as a deposit until I pay you.

I am, Dear Sir,

Your Obedient Serv't.

G. GREENE, Esq.

THO. GIBSON.

The Johannes, an old Portuguese coin, was worth at that time about eight dollars, but in the inventory quoted above, a "half Johannes" is estimated at that amount. Perhaps they were really half-doubloons.

It was a long time, however, before private accounts in Ohio were kept in dollars and cents. Until the close of the century, the usual "money of account" was in pounds, shillings and pence. For example, here is a bill presented by General Varnum's physician:

MARIETTA, NOV. 28th, 1788.
HON. JAS. M. VARNUM, To SOLOMON DROWN, DR.
To attendance and medicine .....	0 3 0
20th. To attendance, powders, &c.....	0 2 9
Dec. 4th. To attendance in consultation with Dr. Farley .....	0 2 0
Dec. 12th. To attendance, and plasters several times .....	0 2 6

Jan. 23d. Received of Mr. Griffin Greene ½ bushel corn .....	4 8
Feb. 17th. Received of do. ½ bushel. ....	5 9
Mar. 4th. Received ½ bushel. ....
Received payment in full, SOLOMON DROWN.

In January, 1792, Griffin Greene charges Daniel Mayo for boarding 52 weeks, 19 pounds and 10 shillings. The bill is paid in flour at 30 shillings per barrel, in labor at 3 shillings per day, in corn at 2 shillings per bushel, and in wheat at 4 shillings 6 pence. In these two accounts, pounds, shillings, and pence merely served on paper as a convenient and familiar form of memorandum, while the real exchanges were made by barter. When it came to the settlement of accounts with merchants in the Eastern cities, the process was not so simple. For example, John Mathews receives a bill from William Duer of New York, October 11, 1791, amounting to 89 pounds, 2 shillings, which is translated, since Mr. Mathews is a public officer, into United States currency, as $222.74—at the rate of eight shillings for a dollar. On November 29th of the same year a bill from Mr. Frank of Philadelphia, calling for 19 pounds, 13 shillings, is translated $52.46—at the rate of 7 shillings 6 pence for a dollar.

A bill of D. Woodbridge, Jun., & Co., for 5 pounds 13 shillings is paid February 11, 1800, by Griffin Greene with a county order for $18.84—at the rate of six shillings for a dollar. To understand this seeming confusion we must go back to colonial history. Through the abuse of credit, the accounts kept in pounds, shillings, and pence had depreciated at different rates.

Thus it happened that—

In New York and North Carolina 8 shillings were one dollar.

In Pennsylvania, 7 shillings 6 pence were one dollar.

In New England and Virginia, 6 shillings were one dollar.

In South Carolina, 32 shillings 6 pence were one dollar.

Hence, when an account was received from an Eastern market, it was necessary to translate the pounds, shillings, and pence according to the standard of the State from which it came. Fifty years ago the arithmetics used in this State still contained rules for translating this State money of account into United States currency.

Although the official accounts were made out in the newly devised decimal system, the writers continued to think in pounds, shillings and pence, not of the sterling kind, but in the New York, Pennsylvania or Virginia money of account. This can be proved by the form of many old records, but a few will serve as illustrations:

At a Justice's Court held in Marietta the first day of October, 1780, Benjamin Tupper and others as supervisors of highways complainants against Josiah White and Lake Webster for not working on the highways a warrant being granted, the said White and Webster were brought before Griffin Greene and Isaac Pierce, two of the Justices for the County of Washington in the Western Territory—and after hearing the parties with their evidence, do adjudge that the said White and Webster pay sixty-ninetieths of a dollar each as a fine to be laid out in work on the highways, and Cost of Court Taxed at three dollars and thirty-six ninetieths to be paid equally between them and to stand committed until costs is paid.

Why ninetieths of a dollar? Evidently the worthy justices mentally placed the fine at five shillings Pennsylvania currency, in which 7 shillings 6 pence, or 90 pence, are equal to one dollar. This is no conjecture. On the back of a bill for hauling goods in 1795, at the rate of 16 shillings a hundred, the "full solution," as the examiners say, still appears. The shillings are multiplied by 12, the result divided by 90 and the quotient is given as dollars.

In February, 1789, Hezekiah Flint presents a mill for "Two hundred and fifty-seven feet of boards at One Dollar and thirty-five ninetieths per hundred feet."

In a letter written by Gen. Rufus Putnam to his nephew, John Mathews, March 10, 1796, he says the agents of the Ohio Company had resolved, "That the balance due from John Mathews, being one hundred and twenty-one dollars and eighteen ninetieths, be remitted as some compensation for losses by the Indians while surveying for the Ohio Company."

Even when the translation was made, our grandfathers found the decimal system puzzling and vexatious.

Hence, in an inventory of January, 1789, the items are thus recorded:

	E. D. d. c. m.
Cash	5 1
A Bald Eagle on order of Cincinnati	2 5
A purse	3 3 3
360 lbs of Beef at 4 d per lb	1 4 7 6

Thus by slow steps the grown-up boys of the last century learned to use our decimal currency. We need not wonder at this when we see how easy and simple metric system is neglected by the English-speaking nations, who will not give up the antiquated methods of weighing and measuring inherited from the dark ages. Even now the English supremacy in trade is threatened in some places on account of this ultra conservatism.

Note J.—

Among the papers left by General Putnam is a "Plan of a Tract containing 4,155 acres, viz.: 4,000 acres being a Grant to the Society of United Brethren for propagating the Gospel among the heathen, and 155 acres being the waters of the river Muskingum, within which tract is included the old and the new towns of Schoenbrun with the cornfield and so forth, formerly inhabited and occupied by Christian Indians."

The field notes of the survey are in the handwriting of General Putnam and prove that he laid out the land in person.

See also the letter of Gen. Rufus Putnam

PHILADELPHIA, March 17, 1797.

DEAR SIR: Bishop Ettwein, President of the incorporated Society of Brethren in the United States, associated for propagating the Gospel among the Heathen, has written me on the 11th instant, that the Directors of the Society, being very desirous to have surveyed the lands granted to the Society on the Muskingum, comprehending the Christian Indian towns of Salem, Gnadenhutten and Schoenbrun, that those Indians may resume their settlements there without delay, have appointed Messrs. John Heckewelder (whom you know) and William Henry, Esq. (a member of the Society and a very worthy man), their deputies to attend the survey of those lands and the subdivision thereof to accommodate the settlers.

About the same time Bishop Ettwein wrote to General Putnam: "The said Society having some material concerns in the locating of the lands on the Muskingum, I beg leave to inform you of some few facts respecting the same. In the year 1788 the Honorable Congress then assembled gave to the United Brethren, by their ordinance, in trust for the Christian Indian Congregations, the three desolated Indian towns, viz.: Schoenbrun, Gnadenhutten and Salem, with a certain quantity of land to each of them, as by the said ordinance, of which you will receive a copy per Mr. Heckewelder, will appear. At the same time the proper officers of Congress informed me and some other gentlemen then with me, that, in behalf of the said Christian Indian Congregations, we had not only a prior right, but indeed a positive right by former possession to locate the lands so allotted by Congress to each of the said towns, as we thought proper, provided it was run in straight lines."

BETHLEHEM, Oct. 26th, 1796.

DEAR SIR: I accidentally met this moment a Mr. Wilson on his way home to Muskingum, with whom I wish to inform you that our society here are desirous of commencing a settlement on their lands on said river as speedily as possible. A few weeks ago I men-and Mr. to the Society of State Col. Pickens, requesting him to advise us unto whom we were to apply to get these lands surveyed. His answer (yet confidentially) was, that a Commission of General Surveyor of the western and military lands was now on the way to Gen. Putnam at Marietta.

As we are in such a hurry, and as we have accepted the appointment, we wish you to let us know at what time and place I and such as are to attend the survey may set out and meet you. I do not expect that we need leave home during the winter, neither could my constitution admit me to endure winter fatigues. But at any time in the spring I should be ready. My nearest way would be from Wheeling, where I would need but encamp one night in the woods between that and Gnadenhutten, it being no more than 50 miles.

The Ordinance of Congress of 1788 directs the three Moravian towns to be first surveyed before the military grants, and the intention of that Congress was (and so they directed it to be done) that we should have the lands surveyed so as it suited us best for settlement, even in Parallelograms, with the river running through each tract, but the lines were all to be north, east, south, and west. It was also understood by Congress last session that the river was to run through each tract, and we wish upon the whole to have it surveyed to best advantage.

Letter from Heckewelder to Gen. Rufus Putnam.

[Extract.]

BETHLEHEM, Jan. 7, 1797.

I entertain some hopes that Gnadenhutten and Salem may be joined together. I fear we shall not get one good mill site on the three tracts; those streams falling within the tracts being small and nearly dry half the summer. Sugar Creek above the upper town is an excellent mill stream. White Water, though a large stream, is too deep and dead. I shall await your further orders respecting setting out and meeting you.

BETHLEHEM, Feb. 16th, 1797.

Having understood of Mr. Carey from Marietta, who passed through this place yesterday, that it was possible Gen. Putnam would be in Philadelphia soon, and having a great desire to meet the General in Philadelphia in order to consult him with respect to some matters respecting our Muskingum grants, I would take it as a kindness if you would inform him of this and request him to send me a line by post from Philadelphia on his arrival; as also the place he lodges at. Our people are anxious to commence a settlement on the Lands on Muskingum, and I hope the dissatisfaction prevailing at present among the Indians on account of the bad goods they received (as related to me by Mr. Carey) will soon be done away.

CHAPTER IV.

WAR WITH THE INDIANS.

ST. CLAIR'S DEFEAT—MASSACRE AT BIG BOTTOM—BELPRE AND BEVERLY—FORTS AT MARIETTA AND HARMAR—FARMERS' CASTLE AND FORT FRYE—OHIO COMPANY AFFAIRS AT LOW EBB—JOSEPH KELLY—GENERAL WAYNE'S SUCCESSFUL CAMPAIGN—DAWNING OF A BRIGHTER ERA FOR OHIO COLONISTS—CAPTURE AND ESCAPE—REMINISCENCES OF WAR TIMES AND OF LATER YEARS—THE INDIANS IN OHIO—LETTERS OF GENERAL PUTNAM—LIST OF THE PIONEERS AT THE FORTS DURING THE INDIAN TROUBLES—PIONEERS KILLED BY THE INDIANS.

ST. CLAIR'S DEFEAT.

The second year of the Muskingum settlement was one of extreme want; the third was the beginning of a long and bloody war. In the fall of 1790 General Harmar led an expedition against the Indians at the head of the Wabash River. He destroyed their towns and cornfields but accomplished little. The next year General St. Clair advanced with an ill-disciplined crowd that hardly deserved the name of army, although it contained many true soldiers. In what is now Mercer County the Indians attacked him and won the greatest victory ever achieved by them. On the 18th of November, Capt. George Ingersoll wrote to General Putnam and gave some account of the battle. He wrote of the ill health of the aged commander, General St. Clair, who was evidently physically unfit to command an army or to perform active service.

We quote from the manuscript of Captain Ingersoll's letter, which we have not seen in print:

"Colonel Darke, who was in Braddock's defeat, and has been in many other actions, declares on his honor they are but faint in description compared to what may be (said) of this campaign, if justice be done."

The Colonel (or General) Darke here mentioned is the one in whose honor Darke County was named.

St. Clair's army had some good officers, but the men had been hastily gathered together, were poorly equipped and without discipline.

MASSACRE AT BIG BOTTOM.

Meanwhile the settlement on the Muskingum had suffered. The little band at Big Bottom, 40 miles above Marietta, was attacked on the 2nd of January, 1791, and 12 of them were killed. There was great alarm at Marietta, but no general attack was made by the Indians, who lurked about the forts, killed one man, and drove away the cattle. At this time there were only 20 soldiers at Fort Harmar and in all the settlements near it there were but 287 settlers capable of bearing arms. Many of these were very poorly equipped for service. From the letters written by the pioneers in that year, it is evident that they felt themselves neglected by the general government; but in truth that government was too weak to give much help.

BELPRE AND BEVERLY.

The majority of the pioneers who came to Marietta were farmers and good judges of land. Hence, we observe that they selected for their first settlements the wide bottoms. In making their assignment to individual settlers, the section lines of the original survey were disregarded and the land was laid out in long strips, giving each settler a frontage on the river, which was then the highway, and, what was still more important giving to each a fair share of hill and bottom land. Hence, it happened that the settlers at Marietta were soon attracted by the advantages of the "Beautiful Meadow," lying opposite the mouth of the Little Kanawha. About 40 of the pioneers made a settlement on this land in the winter of 1788-89, drawing lots for their portion. This settlement was distributed along the Ohio River in three parts, known as the Upper Settlement, the Middle Settlement and Newberry. On account of the beauty of the land it was called Belle Prairie—Belleprie—and at last Belpre or "Beautiful Meadow."

They suffered severely from the famine, caused by the early frost of October, 1789, which almost destroyed their corn crop and that winter they also shared in the kindness of Isaac Williams, from whom Williamstown derives its name. Nearly all the men who settled at Belpre had been soldiers in the Revolutionary Army and the majority had been officers, but all were shrewd, intelligent farmers.

In the winter of 1789 a second association of 39 members moved 20 miles up the Muskingum and occupied the wide plain in the vicinity of the present site of Beverly, but a few went to the west side of the river to build a mill on Wolf Creek, a description of which is found elsewhere. This settlement was first called Painfield, afterward Waterford, a name still borne by the township, and later the town received the name of Beverly. This settlement was more fortunate than the one at Belpre in that it had a fair crop of corn in the fall of 1789.

In the winter of 1790, 36 men went to Big Bottom and began a block-house on the east side of the Muskingum, about a mile below the present site of the Stockport bridge. The remains of the block-house have been discovered in recent years and the site marked by a stone. The block-house was never finished, for here the first attack upon the pioneers was made by the Indians and 12 men were killed, as mentioned in another place. The settlement at this place was then abandoned until the close of the war.

FORTS AT MARIETTA AND HARMAR.

St. Clair's defeat and the attack on the advance post at Big Bottom warned the settlers that they must for the time concentrate their forces and prepare for defense. At Marietta there was the Campus Martius, already begun and now hastily strengthened, and the "Stockade," at what was known as the "Upper Point," that is the territory bounded by the Ohio River, the lower part of Front Street, a line running to the Muskingum, about half way between Butler and Green streets, and the Muskingum River. This was protected by a stockade of logs and by the cabin walls. On the opposite side of the Muskingum River was Fort Harmar, still garrisoned with a few soldiers, but at times during the war almost deserted.

FARMERS' CASTLE AND FORT FRYE.

The old soldiers in the Belpre settlement concentrated at a point on the Ohio below the bluff, nearly opposite the middle of what is now called Blennerhassett's Island, and there built a fort which was known as "Farmers' Castle." The settlers at Painfield built a stockade near the Muskingum River, a short distance below the point where the Beverly bridge now stands. They also built a small block-house on the west side to protect farmers at work. The mill, mentioned elsewhere, on Wolf Creek was unprotected but was not destroyed, although visited at different times by the Indians.

It is said that Jabez Barlow, who had lived a few months in the trunk of a hollow sycamore and who had afterward built a cabin, persisted in remaining on his farm after the war had begun, saying that he had "never harmed the Indians," but he was finally chased into the fort.

It is hard for us to appreciate the trials and privations of the settlers thus gathered together in the garrison. For the next four years, farming, trading and visiting could only be carried on at the risk of capture or death.

OHIO COMPANY AFFAIRS AT LOW EBB.

In the midst of the Indian war, the colonists were so discouraged that many were ready to abandon the settlement. The Ohio Company had in the first four years spent $30,000 in specie for the general welfare and defense; no more land could be sold and even those who had received donation tracts of 100 acres were thinking of removing to safer quarters; the payment of the other half million dollars was due and the company had no means of meeting their engagement.

In these straits they sent a petition to Congress on the 2nd of March, 1792, asking for better terms than those extorted by the Congress of the Confederation. In this petition they said:

"The resident proprietors sensibly feel the great loss of men and property which they have sustained as well as the extreme distress and suffering they endured the last year. There is every reason to believe that, unless they are relieved from that state of suspense and uncertainty respecting their title with which their minds have so long exercised, they will make no further exertions to defend a settlement from which they are at any time liable to be driven, that if the tomahawk and scalping knife do not prevent an escape, they will immediately retreat to some place of greater security."

In 1792 the Indians on the Wabash were detached from the other tribes by the labors of General Putnam who made a treaty with them, after a great deal of ceremony and the judicious distribution of trinkets. The letters received by him while on this mission give pathetic glimpses of the darker scenes in pioneer life. A wife seeks a husband and a son captured in what is now Jefferson County. A husband seeks a wife who had been carried off from the mouth of Harding Creek. Many parents seek their lost children, and one poor Kentuckian asks for the return of three slaves.

JOSEPH KELLY.

Thirty years ago there lived in Marietta an old man, Joseph Kelly, who, when about six years of age, was captured by the Indians, tied on the back of a stolen cow, and thus conveyed to their village on the Maumee. Here he was kept for five years, long enough to forget his mother tongue and to become thoroughly accustomed to the savage life. After Wayne's treaty, he was rescued through the exertions of Colonel Meigs and brought back to Marietta. But the widowed mother could not again see the face of her boy. The awful spectacle of a husband murdered and a child snatched away by savages had actually blinded her eyes.

When Mr. Kelly grew to manhood some of his Indian playmates visited him. They remembered that he was a fleet runner. So they picked one of their own number and calling Mr. Kelly by his Indian name said, "Lala run." He did run a race and beat their champion. He always defended the Indians and said they were more sinned against than sinning.

GENERAL WAYNE'S SUCCESSFUL CAMPAIGN.

As soon as possible President Washington sent the hero of Stony Point, General Wayne, to repair the disaster and restore confidence in the settlements. He had the task of creating an army and transporting it through a wilderness. Hence his movements seem very slow, but he protected the settlements as he advanced, and made no mistakes. In the summer of 1792 he collected his army near Pittsburg; in the spring of 1793 he moved to Fort Washington; thence he proceeded northward and in December of that year he built Fort Greenville in what is now Darke County. The next year (1794) he built Fort Recovery and here in June, 1795, he was attacked by the Indians under Little Turtle. The red men were defeated and in August of the same year Wayne himself advanced to the attack and chased the Indians to the shadow of the fort of their British allies. Wayne then rested at Greenville, where in 1795 the representatives of 13 tribes, or the "thirteen fires," as they were called, made a treaty which had a great influence upon the subsequent history of Ohio. If we return to a county map of this State we may observe that the northern boundaries of Tuscarawas and Knox counties do not extend in a line due east and west but that a part of their boundary falls on a line extending from near Lorain to Shelby County. Tuscarawas and Knox counties have thus preserved in their northern boundaries a part of the treaty line agreed upon in 1795 between General Wayne and the Indians, all land south of this line being ceded to the whites.

DAWNING OF A BRIGHTER ERA FOR OHIO COLONISTS.

This treaty marks the beginning of a new era in the settlement of the Northwest. The settlers no longer remained clustered about a few military posts, but pushed forward to select the best tracts of land wherever they could be found. Hence, the year 1796 marks the beginning of permanent settlements in many places. Two deserve special mention. When Connecticut pretended to surrender her fictitious claim to Western lands—a claim already disallowed by parliamentary action in England and by judicial decisions both in England and America—she retained what was for a time known as New Connecticut and is now called the Western Reserve. In this tract, now rescued a second time from the British, Moses Cleaveland settled in 1796, at the mouth of the Cuyahoga.

The State of Virginia had also reserved the tract between the Scioto and Little Miami. To this region Col. Nathaniel Massie led a large party in 1796 and in the fertile plain on the Scioto founded the town of Chillicothe. The settlements grew rapidly and from them came the men who were destined in a great measure to manage the affairs of the new State for the first half century of its existence. Thus, with courage and fidelity the group of pioneers at the mouth of the Muskingum had laid a foundation cemented by religion and morality. It remained for another group of soldiers and statesmen, those on the Scioto and Miami, to erect the superstructure; but in every line from floor to pinnacle of the fair edifice we can see evidence of the wisdom and strength of the first builders.

CAPTURE AND ESCAPE.

In 1792, Moses Hewitt, a young man of Neal's Station, one mile up the Little Kanawha, was taken prisoner by the Indians. They kept him closely tied or closely watched; but one day, on the way, when they were letting him walk untied, they discovered a bee-tree and stopped to take the honey. There were three Indians. One started off some distance to fetch some water, leaving his gun at the bee-tree; one climbed the tree with his tomahawk to cut away an opening to the honey; the third stood by the guns.

Hewitt pretended to be very anxious about getting the honey, but he had high hopes that the time of his escape was drawing near. He thought that the Indian would have to climb up to hand the tin pail to the other to put the honey in. In that case he thought he could easily shoot both, and have a loaded gun left with which he could kill the other as he should return with the water. But as soon as the Indian on the tree wanted the bucket, he took from his pouch a long string and, holding one end, let the other down to be fastened to the pail. So all Hewitt's hopes were crossed.

Continuing their march, the party met some Indians and stopped and talked awhile. Hewitt lay down and pretended to be asleep. Drawing one hand over his face he could hear some words and see their gestures, as they pointed to him. He was convinced they meant to burn him when they should arrive at their towns.

They left him at their camp, safely tied, as they thought. As soon as they were out of sight he commenced struggling to get his hands loose. After several hours he succeeded. They had left a small piece of jerked meat in the camp. He took that and started, shaping his course as well as he could for the left branch of the Muskingum.

He traveled all that day and night and till dark next night. He then lay down, fell asleep and when he awoke the sun was an hour high. When he had reached the left branch of the Muskingum, he made a little raft of dry sticks on which he hastened down stream till within sight of Fort Frye at Waterford. He went ashore, and carefully advanced till he was within speaking distance of the sentry. He was supplied with clothing and food and as soon as he was sufficiently recruited he returned to his friends at Little Kanawha. I remember seeing him soon after at our garrison (in Belpre) and hearing him relate the whole story.

Early in the spring I was transferred from the artillery and made orderly sergeant of the company of infantry, and it became my duty to keep a roll of every person amenable to military service; to attend at the place of public worship with my roll; call every man's name; examine his arms and ammunition, and see that he was equipped according to law. I had also to note down and report all delinquencies.

The territorial militia law made it the duty of the troops to assemble on Sunday morning at 10 o'clock for inspection. Those who attended public worship, and there were few who did not, after inspection marched from the parade ground to the room where service was held, preceded by the clergyman and Colonel Sproat, the commandant at the Point garrison, with his Revolutionary sword drawn, and by General Putnam and General Tupper at the Campus Martius. The citizens generally fell into the ranks, and the procession moved in military array, to wait on divine service; the fife and drum supplying the place of the church-going bell in the Eastern States.

In case of an alarm on the Sabbath that portion of the congregation who were armed rushed out of the meeting to face the danger, or pursue the Indians, which several times happened.

Before the arrival of Rev. Daniel Story, who was the stated pastor, Thomas Lord, Esq. of Connecticut, who had been educated at Yale College, and studied theology preparatory to the ministry, officiated as clergyman for the settlement, but Dr. Story arrived in 1789 and was the regular clergyman after that time. Col. Ebenezer Battelle officiated and held reading meetings at Belpre and at Waterford.

Previous to the commencement of hostilities, by this weekly inspection (when most of the citizens were at home on Sunday, who were away during the week) the commandant was informed what proportion were armed and equipped to defend the settlement; emigrants frequently arrived without arms, so that the number of guns fell short of the number of men and the deficiency could not be made up in the settlement, and those persons only, who were known to have arms, were proceeded against as delinquents. A short time previous to the war, Colonel Sproat had been authorized by the Secretary of War to enlist a company of men into the United States service, out of the settlers, to be employed in guarding and defending the settlements, and to superintend and distribute them to those points, which most needed their assistance, and to appoint a committee to furnish subsistence for these troops. William Fearing was appointed such a committee. Colonel Sproat was considered commander-in-chief of the military and his aid was solicited to procure arms for the citizens, who were deficient; he sent immediately to Pittsburgh to the commander of the old United States fort, who sent down about 30 old soldier's muskets, which had been thrown by as unfit for use, and very rusty and more or less damaged. The blacksmith was set to repair them, which were then distributed where the service most required; powder and lead were furnished and cartridges fixed to suit each caliber, and deposited in the block-house, ready to be distributed in the first emergency.

REMINISCENCES OF WAR TIMES AND OF LATER YEARS.

In January, 1790, a new arrangement was made in the militia. A company of artillery was formed, commanded by Capt. William Mills, of Marietta, Lieut. George Ingersoll, of Belpre, and the late Gen. Joseph Buck, orderly sergeant. The infantry company was commanded by Maj. Nathan Goodale, of Belpre, and Lieut. Anselm Tupper, of Marietta.

It was not until June, 1792, that Colonel Sproat received two boxes, containing 25 stand each, of United States muskets, with bayonets, new from the factory, which were dealt out to the soldiers and inhabitants, on their signing a receipt to return them, when called for, to Colonel Sproat. These arms were never called for and are now extant in the county.

The county was now considered well armed, many rifles were procured and brought into the county. Most of the Northern men previous to coming here were unacquainted with the rifles and the woods; but by practicing upon the example of those who had been educated among the woods and the Indians, they soon became good hunters and expert woodmen; those who were well armed and were good marksmen were commonly selected as sentinels for the working parties, and were always ready to start upon any discovery or pursue an Indian trail. Thus by being familiar with danger and inured to the hazard of a re-encounter with their enemy, they had gained that confidence in themselves which promised, in case of meeting an Indian, the odds of battle in their own favor. Many followed hunting continually, others were out with the spies, or in small parties, so that it was difficult for an Indian to make a track within five miles of a garrison without being detected. Now a large portion of the inhabitants become fearless of danger from the Indians, and preferred some employment or some enterprise outside of to being confined in and about the garrisons. Which is evident from the fact that nearly the whole of the 100,000 acres of donation land had been surveyed and deeded away, and improvements made—cabins, girdling and clearings—previous to Wayne's treaty, and of those whose lands bordered on large streams, many had moved and many more had been ready to move on to their farms ere the news of peace. Esquire Putnam had built a block-house opposite me, the fall before the treaty, and kept hands at work there. I cleared and fenced two and a half acres of land and set out 50 apple trees. Six months previous to the peace, a block-house was built at Cat's Creek, and another at the south branch of Wolf Creek, where Sherman Waterman was killed. The word that land was to be given for settlement on the Muskingum had spread through the upper country and had induced many persons to come into the settlement, and to gain a residence, which would entitle them to a 100-acre lot. After old residents were supplied, those who had families, and those who could furnish some evidence of becoming permanent settlers, had the first choice, then a month's residence would entitle one to a lot. Finally, anyone who would pay $5, the price of surveying, got a deed for 100 acres. Any actual settler by paying the expense, could obtain any lot not given away, by getting any person who had not taken a lot in his own name, to take a lot and convey it to the settler. All the lots along the Ohio River below the Muskingum belonged to the Ohio Company's purchase.

It is an axiom with military men, that spies are the eyes of an army. It proved true with respect to our settlements. The measure of employing spies was adopted previous to the commencement of hostilities. Spies were stationed at Marietta and Waterford, three months before the massacre at Big Bottom.

The necessary number of spies for the different settlements were taken into the service and paid by the United States—$1 per day; and as not only the safety of the property, but the lives of the inhabitants, depended on the faithfulness and vigilance of the spies, none were selected whose characters were not filled out with these qualifications:

Hamilton Kerr, afterward Major Kerr of Meigs County, was about 25 years of age, a native of Pennsylvania. His person a little above the average size (his physical and mental powers far above his contour), was strong, athletic and beautiful, and his countenance, the index of candor, penetration and manly dignity. His faithfulness and vigilance in guarding the settlements commanded the esteem and confidence of all who knew him.

Edward Henderson, a native of Rutland, Massachusetts, about 30 years of age, almost six feet in height, strong, athletic and brave. He also was a vigilant and faithful spy.

Capt. Joseph Rogers, a native of Pennsylvania, age about fifty, above the middle size. He was a gentlemanly, brave and humane old soldier. He was an officer in General Morgan's rifle company, at the taking of Burgoyne, having served honorably through the Revolution. He resided some time with his friends, but having cast his bread upon the waters of the Revolution, he with many an old soldier marched toward the setting sun in hopes to find it in the West. Temperate and brave, his heart was the fountain of human kindness.

Neil McGuffey, a native of New Hampshire, about 50 years old, large and robust. He had been a subaltern in the Revolution, an ardent and reputable soldier, and left the land of granite for the alluvial plains of the West to find a home, better suited to the wants of a growing family. A faithful and vigilant spy.

Peter Neiswanger, a strong athlete, six feet tall. A Pennsylvania Dutchman, formidable not only to his enemies but sometimes to his friends, but a pretty good spy.

Capt. William McCulloch, of Wheeling, was for some time a spy at Marietta, but left the service before the conclusion of the war. A most excellent spy and an amiable man.

Andrew McClure, from Rhode Island, 25 years of age. A fine, straight, six-foot, enterprising, faithful, persevering spy—at Waterford.

The spies were not always stationary. They were frequently shifted from one garrison to another by their own request. Sometimes, one retired and another was employed.

William Halbert, from Pennsylvania, landed with his family, who afterward removed to Belpre, and was killed by the Indians at the mouth of the Little Hocking, early in the settlement. He was an elderly man and employed as a spy, when killed.

Two men, Benjamin Patterson and John Shepherd, from the State of New York, were employed as spies, three of the first years in Belpre and then moved down the river.

At the time of the controversy between Pennsylvania and Connecticut, relative to their conflicting land claims, on the Susquehanna, the State of Pennsylvania appointed Timothy Pickering, at Salem, Massachusetts, the old honest Federalist, to go upon the ground and meet others and try to adjust the difference. While there, this same Ben Patterson was one of two or three who took Pickering from his bed in the night, and conveyed him three miles into the woods and bound him fast to a white oak sapling and left him there to starve to death. But after two or three days, Patterson relented and went and unbound him and set him at liberty, from which place he fled to the State of New York, and from there to Marietta. It was not infrequent that similar characters called upon our settlements, but finding neither plunder nor speculation, and finding their victims pursuing, they floated down the river. Likewise Cornelius Delano, Joel Oaks were early employed as spies at Belpre and continued to do service during the war. They were industrious and faithful Yankees and gave security and satisfaction to the settlements. Their route was from the mouth of the Little Kanawha to the Little Hocking.

When the Ohio Company first came out, every person found in this region was a woodsman, a hunter of game and Indians, knew their customs and habits of warfare, and was always ready and proud of imparting his information to whoever would listen to his teaching. The Yankees placed in the school for hunting and fighting Indians were apt scholars and soon became able to practice, with skill acquired, upon the precepts and examples, and compete with their monitors, and before the close of the war we had rarely any other rangers or hunters for the surveying parties but Yankees.

To the plan early adopted of employing rangers, may be attributed the general safety and success of the first settlement of this county. It was first adopted by General Putnam and the Ohio Company and afterward pursued by the United States. The Indians finding themselves so closely watched by men who were their compeers in their own arts of warfare, and more vigilant and untiring soldiers, become indifferent to enterprises where they were likely to meet with more kicks than coppers, and which probably might result in disasters far exceeding any benefits likely to be obtained.

The hope of reward is the great spring of human action. Men who are not paid and fed and clothed may make good citizens for a short emergency, but never make good soldiers. Their patriotism soon cools and their "courage oozes out of the ends of their fingers." The hope of plunder is the main stimulus with the Indians, therefore they crossed the Ohio below and above and passed by us, and went a hundred miles onto the waters of the Monongahela, where there was more plunder and less watchfulness. Revenge is sweet, but must not be sought too dear; small parties of from 50 to 100 braves, who came in to attack us, seldom hung about more than a week. And the large parties of a thousand or more, such as defeated General St. Clair and attacked Fort Recovery, could not keep together but four or five days.

The Turks could not repulse the Russians, nor the Arabs the French, because they had no financial system to provide for the family of the soldier while he fights the battles of his country.

It is estimated that in seven years previous to our war in 1791, the Indians on the frontier south of the Ohio River killed and took prisoners 1,500 persons, stole 2,000 horses and other property to the amount of $50,000. This was the declared object of the party that killed Colonel Carpenter and, subsequently, the family of Armstrong.

The first physician who came to settle in Marietta was Dr. Thomas Farley, a son of General Farley, of old Ipswich, Massachusetts. He had been educated for a physician and studied with old Dr. Holyoke, and walked with him (as his friends said) three years in the streets of Salem. He was a modest, amiable young man, always ready to obey the calls of humanity and had the good will and confidence of all who knew him. But as there were few people, and those young and healthy (except the disease of an empty purse), his practice must have been very limited, and he was not prepared for any other business; his medium exhausted, he tarried until the fall of 1790, when he returned home and did not return. I have been particular because he was from old Ipswich, where I had some acquaintances, and being acquainted with the Manning family, of which my mother was one, born in Needham, 15 miles from Boston.

Dr. True was here in 1789 and Dr. McIntosh in 1791. They were both appointed assistant surgeons in the spring of 1791; Dr. True at Marietta, Dr. McIntosh at Waterford, at $22 per month, for three months, as new appointments took place every three months. These appointments were made in contemplation that an attack might be made upon some of the garrisons and to provide timely aid for such an event.

To get the appointment of a subaltern and surgeon's mate at $22 per month were berths to be sought after in those dry times for cash, when Ohio Company paper was worth about a title as much as ship-plasters, and the precious metal as scarce as snow in harvest. Even a sergeant at $8 and a soldier at $2 per month were sought for and in fact, as they created credit to that amount, constituted for the greater part the floating capital in the settlement.

Dr. Sumner, from Connecticut, and Dr. Scott, from Pennsylvania, who were surgeons with General Harmar, were said to be men of ability in their profession; and were amiable, kind and diligent men. They were always ready and cheerful to render their aid and professional services to any of the citizens, who required their assistance, without pay, saying they felt it their duty to be always ready to alleviate and relieve all those cases of sickness and distress incident to a new country, isolated as we were. I have known them to jump into a canoe and go to Belpre to administer to sick persons they had not known before.

Dr. Samuel Barnes, of Massachusetts, came in 1792 and was employed as a surgeon at Belpre and Marietta several times. He was surgeon for the United States troops in the winter of 1792. In 1793 he married Cynthia Goodale, daughter of Major Goodale, and resided in Marietta until the close of the war. In the winter of 1792-93, a general inoculation took place in consequence of the smallpox being brought into some of the settlements, but the infection did not take in any instance. A second inoculation succeeded; but many persons continued a severe dieting for two weeks, reduced the system too far, and had the disease very severely; while others who made little alteration in their diet had it light and moderate.

After the war Dr. Barnes moved to Athens, where he died leaving a wife and three daughters. The family moved to Franklinton. Mrs. Barnes later married Col. James Kilbourn. One daughter is the wife of William Joel Butler, and one the wife of Mr. Demus Adonis, of Columbus—all reputable and wealthy.

In January, 1790, a boat on the way to Kentucky put on shore a very sick man and his family by the name of Welch. He was taken to the house of James Owen, called the "Boston House." It was built by some half dozen young men from Boston. Some were gentlemen and some artisans; but as there were no arts absolutely necessary, but the art of handling an arrow, ax, and no employment but clearing land, the contrast was too great between those employments which are necessary and lucrative in the commercial and manufacturing city of Boston, and the wild, wilderness city of Marietta. The purse got empty, and they returned and left their house, which was a long, narrow cabin, and stood on that corner where the bank now stands (I then lived on the opposite corner of Market Square, where the Post Office now stands); it was occupied by a family brought on by General Harmar (and I think where he died) by the name of Owen. Mr. Welch's disorder proved to be the smallpox. As the smallpox had not been in Marietta, a town meeting was called; a small house was built not far from where Marietta College now stands, to which he was removed with necessary attendants, but he lived only a few days.

A town meeting was called, and held in the northwest block-house at the Campus Martius, at which it was decided that all persons who had not had the smallpox should accommodate themselves with houses back on the plain and there be inoculated. Dr. Farley procured matter and inoculated and tended the whole. One house at the upper end of the big cornfield had 23 cases. Other houses were strung along down the plain. Colonel Stacy had a house near the creek below Mr. Printers, occupied by his two sons and son-in-law and families—nearly 20 persons. Old Mrs. Stacy, aged about 70, and an elderly lady, Mrs. Winsor from the Campus Martius, were the only two lost by inoculation.

A number of families had not left Marietta, who soon after moved out to Belpre and Waterford.

The intermittent, or the fever ague, was the fashionable disorder among all classes along the streams the first, second or third year after their arrival. It commenced about the first of August and continued with variations until the sap run in the spring. Maple sugar in the first settlement formed a valuable constituent in many families, where solid food was scarce and dear, and in fact not to be had (in particular where there was no money), and sugar was a substitute for many things. It was used freely and sometimes profusely, and when the humid sultry season arrived the sugar was gone; and the fever and ague set in. Remitting fevers were occasional but by no means prevalent; they were not prevalent until a long time after the war. Until the close of the war, the emigrants who came into the settlements were mostly young or middle aged. Industry and temperance were the precaution of most disorders, and a remedy for many more.

Dr. Jewett, who resided at Belpre about the beginning of the 19th century, became famous for curing the fever and ague. He first cleansed the stomach, and succeeded this with a diet of light food; on the approach of the chill, he gave large doses of laudanum; when the fever wore off he gave the most stimulating and nourishing food the stomach would bear, and so repeated until the fits subsided, which commonly occurred in about four or five days.

General Putnam was in the habit of relating an anecdote of his own experience in the fever and ague. After concluding a treaty of peace with the Wabash and Illinois Indians in September, 1792, he was attacked with the fever and ague, in his superb barge, rowed by United States soldiers. He had a surgeon on board, who undertook to prescribe for his disorder. The latter debarred the General from all kinds of stimulating food and drink. When they got this side of Gallipolis, they landed at night-fall at a camp of hunters on the banks of the Ohio. They had a profusion of bear meat, venison and turkey, and feasted themselves and made every person welcome, but General Putnam was interdicted from the camp kettle (the many fumes of which were a feast) by his physician, but he lay down as peaceably as the craving of hunger would admit and when the party were all asleep he crept to the camp kettle and feasted his appetite on the fat bear meat and venison as long as he dared indulge and after that he experienced nothing of the fever and ague.

Our settlements so far as I recollect were considered healthy, and nothing like an epidemic prevailed (the fever and ague excepted) until that of 1807, of which you are acquainted.

The reasons: It is the opinion of most people with whom I have conversed on the subject, that our winters, generally, were more moist and mild before the land was cleared than they have been since, and our summers more humid and sultry. I never knew the ground to freeze in the bottoms in winter, where it was covered with leaves. All the alluvial lands were covered with a dense forest which kept off the wind and sun. The moisture was retained much longer than in cleared land. An exhalation was generally seen rising from those forests in winter, when not prevented by hard frosts or snow. These vapors, when it was not too cold, seemed to ameliorate the air, and render it more mild. The banks of the streams being lined with a heavy forest of trees prevented the wind from sweeping over the bottoms and carrying off the warm vapors. There were, uniformly, more or less back of the bottoms, strips of wet land called slashes or swamps, which were kept open the greater part of the winter, and which retained the warmth of the earth or gave it out moderately and prevented those sudden and violent changes such as we have experienced within a month past. We had very cold weather and deep snows, but they were steadier and lasted longer. In the fore part of January, 1796, we had a severe cold turn, the ice froze nine inches, and immediately the snow fell two feet deep. We had a good solid road over the Muskingum, over which we hauled walnut logs to General Putnam's mill for two or three weeks (as we could make a team) and, as there were no roads without crossing the river at every bend, the snow path was improved from Waterford to Marietta for nearly a month, and in 1799 we had a similar winter. The cold set in and the snow fell early in January, and we had good sledding across the waters until the 23rd of February. On the 22nd, the late Governor

Meigs delivered an oration on the death of Washington (who died the December before), and nearly all of the people along the river, from Waterford down, passed down and up, across the river, on sleds and sleighs.

But we had an early spring. In the winter of 1801-02, Captain Devol finished the ship "Muskingum." On the 1st of November the snow fell three inches, and there was a very hard frost; after that the winter was so open, that a frost hard enough to bear a man was rarely seen through the winter and spring. When the earth is cloaked with a forest, the sun and wind are measurably shut out from the surface and prevented from carrying off the warm vapors that arise, which diminish the tendency to sudden and violent changes. While the constant exhalation from the valley furnishes material for snow and rain, the snow falls more copious and lays longer upon the ground, and keeps the temperature steadier, milder, and free from so many vicissitudes.

This has been the case in New England; they have but but about half as much good sledding now as they had 50 years ago. It is said that it was so in Italy, when the Romans first redeemed that country from the barbarians, and before the earth was scoured of its forests, that they had deep snows and steady winters; now they have little snow and much changeable weather. They are a little north of us.

I have attributed our former warm and sultry weather in summer to the great humidity of the atmosphere, which was occasioned by the moisture retained by the trees, shrubs and high weeds in the night and given out in the daytime, along the bottoms. Not so on the hills, there being little or no underbrush, the air had a free passage, but so soon as the field got up in the range, the dews were heavy and retained until about 10 o'clock. My theory may be very erroneous, but it probably will be very harmless, except giving you the trouble to read the reasons.

The first flood after I came was in March, 1790. It was about six feet deep in my house, where the Post Office now stands. There was no other high flood for several years. It was not until 1804 that the water came over my bottom land.

Our rivers were plentifully stored with fish, while the banks were covered with trees, and perishing vegetables, and insects, and were easily caught by a proper mode, the single hook and trot-line in deep water, or the spear in clear shoal water. Judge Gilbert Devol, of Waterford, late in the fall, when the water had got very cold and clear, found a deep hole in the river, in which he judged there must be fish. He made some very long gig poles, and went to the place and by striking down promiscuously, soon loaded his canoe. This was practiced with some success in after years.

The black cat and the pike were the largest, fish, the yellow cat next, the salmon, the buffalo, the perch and sturgeon, next, the sucker, last. I saw a black cat, caught by James Patterson, in 1790, which weighed 96 pounds. He fished for a living. He anchored his canoe out in the river, in the evening, threw out his hooks, and wrapped his blanket and laid down and slept. This fish got fast to his line, and had power to drag his light anchor down into deep water, and then floated down to near the island, where he found himself when he awoke. The yellow cat attains the size of 50 pounds, but a 20-pounder is the best size for eating. They were very fat, and if a little corned and smoked were almost equal to salmon and would keep dry a long time. The sturgeon, which were plenty, if cured a little were esteemed a good fish.

But the pike is the king of fish in our waters. Judge Gilbert Devol took a pike from the Muskingum which weighed 96 pounds, on the 2nd of July, 1790. He was a tall man, and when he had the pike on his gig pole and the pole on his shoulder, the pike dragged on the ground. This fish was cooked for the Fourth of July dinner (1790), which was celebrated with an oration by Judge Varnum and attended by all the inhabitants and General Harmar and many of his garrison. This large fish was taken with a gig, or spear. The Ohio Company's boat "Mayflower" was lying in the mouth of the Muskingum, and was used as a sort of store boat, and particularly for keeping fish. The offal being thrown over alongside, the fish were seen to come and feed on the offal of the small fish—shy at first, but becoming more tame and accustomed to seeing and hearing people about the boat. Judge Devol and his son Gilbert prepared themselves with a proper canoe and gigs and, when informed, started the pike up the Muskingum and pursued him by his wake (meaning to tire him down) above the Campus Martius; they then got above him and drove him back, as the fish are very short-winded and soon tire when pursued. They were able to press him and, before he could reach deep water in the Ohio, he flagged and they came up and got him.

This practice is followed by all our lads who understand gigging fish. In New Jersey they ride the fish down in shoal water and gig them. Most of our fish were caught upon the trot-line. I have known half a barrel to be caught of a night. They baited with all kinds of worms, fresh meat, crawfish, minnows and small fish kept in a gourd in which they had asafetida, tobacco or any strongly scented substance, which would be carried down with the stream and induce the fish to follow up to the bait.

The Indians had a mode of catching large pike, which is now practiced by our sportsman along the banks on both sides of the Ohio. They catch small fish, say of one or two pounds; then they fasten with a stick a strong hook—with a line that can not easily be bitten off—into the mouth and through the body and out near the tail. They go to the mouth of a creek, where the pike are waiting for small fish to come out, and throw this bait as far as possible out into the river, and haul it in suddenly so as keep the bait jumping on top of the water, as if in the act of running from an enemy. If there is a pike near, he will dart out and swallow the small fish and is sure to be hooked.

Previous to the landing of the Ohio Company, wild game had been very plenty in the neighborhood of Marietta; deer and turkeys, and occasionally elk and buffalo. In the winter of 1792, Mr. Kerr and Mr. Neiswanger killed six or seven buffaloes on Duck Creek about Cedar Narrows. They were fat and a fine quality of beef, Judge Gilman said, better than any beef he ever ate.

It is admitted by beef-eaters that beef fattened on the range is higher flavored and juicier than if fattened in a pasture, and beef fattened on our pastures is much better than that raised upon the prairies of the West. The Indians who were in at the treaty concluded on the 9th of January, 1789, had destroyed, wasted and drove back the deer so that they were very scarce for a year or two.

But in the fall of 1790, the beech and other mast were plenty on the bottoms, which brought in turkeys in abundance, so many that people were obliged to secure their corn before it was ripe, and, if there were any shocks of oats or wheat, they were obliged to cover them thick with brush, to prevent their being destroyed. The turkeys were killed in all ways. One man killed 40 with a rifle one day. They were trapped, killed with clubs and dogs until a turkey would not sell for a fip, because the people were cloyed and they could not be used. In the winter of 1792-93 Messrs. Kerr, Henderson and Neiswanger started from Marietta, went to the White Oak settlement, and killed 45 deer and hung them up; they came home next morning and got some horses they kept in garrison, and brought all the deer in.

In a few years the deer got back to our neighborhood and I presume we have been better supplied with venison in the hills than in the more level country.

That the turkeys should beat in in search of beech mast, is not surprising; but that the squirrels by millions should, simultaneously, become itinerant, taking their course, swimming large waters, without apparently seeking for food, but, like the locust in Africa, stopping long enough to destroy everything they could eat, which fell in their way, and perhaps before cold weather would turn and come back is not so easy for me to account for.

They would get in, and before people were aware the side of the cornfields west of the woods would be destroyed, and the field must be immediately gathered. When I was at Belpre, Captain Dana had got about two bushels of uncleaned hemp seed and wheat a few rods from the house; when we came back from dinner it was so completely covered with squirrels that nothing could be seen of the hemp seed. No one who had not seen them could have any correct idea of the numbers.

There were bears and panthers through the hills, but not so plenty, daring, or impudent as the wolves and wild cats. They all liked hogs and pigs, but the bears and panthers were more shy and did not repeat their visits like the wolves.

A panther killed a hog belonging to Isaac Barker, at the Upper Settlement, Belpre, and carried him 60 rods through a snow nine inches deep, leaving the trail of the hog, and buried him by the side of a log. The panther was followed in the morning about two or three miles found on a hill and killed.

The wolves were very troublesome, where they became well acquainted. To preserve your hogs a fence must be built, so high they could not get over, or you must cover your pen with logs, so large as not to be thrown off. Large lots of hogs could defend themselves.

There were some few beaver, after the Indian left their waters; Isaac Williams used to go trapping for them up the Muskingum and Duck Creek. There were a few small families, after we came up the Muskingum, one at Captain Devol's Island, and some at the mouth of the Rainbow, opposite me.

THE INDIANS IN OHIO.

From the letters and reports of the soldiers and pioneers, it appears there were two sources of trouble with the Indians—the lawless character of many of the hunters on the frontier, and the constant plotting of British agents from Detroit.

In 1787 John Mathews, the commissary at Fort Steuben (Steubenville), wrote to his brother-in-law, Captain Stone, of Massachusetts:

"I am as much enamoured with this country as ever. I have watched vegetation with considerable attention and have observed everything flourish with the greatest luxuriance. I still entertain some hope of seeing you agreeably settled in this country. Should a number of families form a compact settlement, I do not apprehend any danger from the Indians.

"The Indians have lately murdered two families in this quarter, one family about 20 miles below this, the other, 40. From the best accounts I can get this action was the result of personal resentment.

"The present inhabitants of this country and the Indians will ever be at variance. The truth is, they are both savages. Though there are many good people, yet the number of worthless fellows that flock to the frontiers, and who live by hunting, will ever keep them in a broil. These will kill an Indian if they can get the advantage, will steal his horses and plunder his camp. The Indians will always retaliate without discrimination and an innocent family fall victims to their revenge.

"The troops at this garrison are mostly gone to the mouth of the Muskingum, and the remainder are to go soon. It is supposed they are going further down, but their destination is not known."

The Delawares who lived on the upper part of the Muskingum were at first regarded as friends by the pioneers. General Harmar had quite a high opinion of their chief, Captain Pipe. Some other officers seem to have formed a very different opinion about this noble savage, even before he took part in the war of 1791. The following letter, written by Gen. Rufus Putnam to Fisher Ames, who was the first member of Congress from the Boston district of Massachusetts, after the adoption of the Constitution, gives a vivid picture of the bloody beginning of that war:

MARIETTA, Jan. 6th, 1791.

DEAR SIR:

Our prospects are much changed. Instead of peace and friendship with our Indian neighbors, a horrid savage war stares us in the face. The Indians, instead of being humbled by the destruction of the Shawnee towns and brought to beg for peace, appear determined on a general war in which our settlements are already involved. On the evening of the 2nd inst. they fell on a new settlement about 40 miles up the Muskingum, surprised a block-house, killed 12 persons and carried off three others. The persons killed are John and Philip Stacy, sons of Col. Wm. Stacy, from New Salem, Ezra Putnam, son of Major Ezra Putnam, from Middletown, in Massachusetts, John Camp from the same place, Jonathan Farewell from N. Hampshire, Zebulon Troop from Berne, William James from Connecticut, Joseph Clark from Rhode Island, a man by the name of Meeks with his wife and 2 children from Virginia; these were all killed in and at the block-house.

What number of Indians were concerned in this mischief or from what tribes we know not, but from those Indians who till lately used to visit our settlements every day withdrawing themselves entirely from our sight ever since the expedition against the Shawnees, there is little reason to doubt but the Delawares and Wyandots as well as others have had a hand in the business.

It is impossible for me to give you a just idea of the distress into which the event has thrown the inhabitants, especially those of the settlements.

For my own part I have for some time been of the opinion that the spring would open with a general attack on the frontier, in which event I did not expect we should escape unless government should timely send troops for our protection.

We purchased our lands under an idea that they had been fairly obtained from the natives, for government told us so by their public acts. This, however, the Indians on our own arrival in the country told us was not true, and if the treaties with them prior to our coming are consulted, I believe it will appear the Indians are right, and that the lands were rather wrested than fairly purchased from them—at least the Indians considered it in this light. The treaty made by Governor St. Clair at Ft. Harmar wears a different form and by it the business seems pretty well patched up and I had hope that we should have had little or no trouble with them on that account, notwithstanding that some of their chiefs discovered that they were not very well satisfied and that several chiefs among the tribes who treated with Governor St. Clair were not present and never consented to what was done.

It was afterward learned that Philip Stacy had been captured by the Indians, and not killed.

Letter to General Putnam from Fisher Ames.

PHILADELPHIA, Feb. 22, 1791.

DEAR SIR: It was impossible to read your letter giving an account of the attack of the savages on the settlement at Big Bottom without feeling a strong sympathy with you under the peculiar distress of your situation. However your fears may have interpreted the sense of the country towards you, I am happy to perceive that they are not indisposed to giving you effectual protection, though it will cost money. That circumstance too often throws cold water on the natural emotions of the public towards their distressed brethren.

You know that my opinion of the proper policy of Congress is, to manifest a fixed resolution to protect the most remote parts of the Union, to nurse the weak and to console the suffering remote settlements with a degree of tender solicitude proportioned to their defenseless condition. Congress has little occasion to make itself known to them except by acts of protection.

The most successful way to banish the ruinous idea of the future independence of the Western country is by doing good to the settlers, to gain their hearts. Our sun will set whenever the Union shall be divided. But it is not necessary to notice the idea further. The measures of the present session of Congress, I think, will satisfy you that because you are remote you are not forgotten, and will not be abandoned to the savages. I enclose a letter to my old school-fellow and townsman, Mr. Battelle. Will you please to convey it to him?

Please to accept my sincere wishes for your health and prosperity.

Samuel H. Parsons, in December, 1785, wrote from "Fort Finney," at the mouth of the Miami, to Capt. Jonathan Hart, in which he made this report about Indian affairs:

"The Miami is a large fine river on which the Shawnees and other nations live.

"Since we have been here every means has been taken to bring in the Indians. The Wyandots and Delawares are here; the other nations were coming.

"The British agents, our own traders, and the inhabitants of Kentucky, I am convinced, are all opposed to a treaty and are using every means to prevent it. Strange as this may seem, I have very convincing proof of its reality.

"Parties of Cherokees are now out to war. These Cherokees are but a name for all rascals of every tribe. We are informed by the Shawanese that they have driven these people from among them and they have settled on Paint Creek up to the Scioto and are about one hundred in number."

At a later date General Putnam expressed the same opinion as Judge Parsons of the Indians on the Scioto, and urged the government to build a fort and station a small garrison near the mouth of that river.

In these letters there is abundant evidence of the conscious weakness of the general government. The administration was beset with dangers not only from the Indians and the almost open hostility of British and Spaniards, but also from the indiscreet zeal of the settlers south of the Ohio. In 1787 General Harmer made this report to the Secretary of War:

"It is a mortifying circumstance that, while under the sanction of the Federal authority, negotiations and treaties are holding with the Indians, there should be such presumption in the people of Kentucky as to be forming expeditions against them."

Even after the adoption of the Constitution and the inauguration of Washington, there was doubt and perplexity in dealing with the Indians. In 1792 General Putnam was sent to Vincennes on a mission which is explained in his private notes of a letter written to General Knox from Fort Washington, July 22nd:

[It is] "highly probable that the principal chiefs from nearly all the western tribes with a great number of warriors and others may be collected at Vincennes. * * By a proper management they may be detached from the tribes which have originated the war."

A few days later he wrote from the same place: "I am in some hopes of being admitted to speak with their high mightinesses, the Shawanese and other hostile tribes." With the Western tribes he concluded a treaty, but the Indians within the present limits of Ohio were bent on war. On his return from Vincennes to Marietta he made this report to General Wayne:

"On the 7th of October I sent a speech to the Delaware and other hostile tribes inviting them to send some of their wise men to this place to speak with me on the subject of peace, but I hear nothing from them yet nor have I ever had much expectation that they would hearken to the invitation. I shall however wait to the 10th or 15th of January [1793] and then set out for Philadelphia and endeavor to convince, as far as my opinion and influence extends, all the advocates for treaties that nothing but a severe whipping will bring these proud savages to a sense of their interest."

From these letters it is evident that the officers of the general government were conscious of their weakness. The States, no less than hostile British, Spaniards or Indians, resented any display of Federal power. Hence it was impossible to act with vigor in repressing the Indians in Ohio. Even after the attack on the settlement at Big Bottom, January 2, 1791, General Putnam complains that they had received no assistance from the United States forces "until the middle of July." Even when the troops were sent, the poverty of the government so restricted their numbers that the war dragged on for many years. If we bear in mind the position of Washington and his cabinet we can more easily understand the following letter of the Secretary of War, General Knox to General Putnam:

SIR—I beg leave to request to be informed by you in what sense the Fourth Article of the Treaty made by you with the Wabash Indians, on the 27th day of September, 1792, was understood by you and by them at the time of forming the same.—That is, whether it was understood that any other power than the United States had the right of purchasing when the Indians should be disposed to sell their lands?

The same question arose with reference to treaties made with the Cherokees. Can we conceive it possible that a Secretary of War within the last 40 years would seriously ask whether the Sioux or Dakotas, for example, had reserved any right to sell their lands to the British government, or whether the Utes could sell to Mexico? Indeed our general government, through the personal influence of Washington and the genius of Hamilton, grew from such small beginnings that it is hard for us to realize how weak and almost helpless it was in those early years.

PHILADELPHIA, February 11th, 1793.

SIR:—In answer to your question of this day, I reply that it was never contemplated by me nor the Indians who met me in council at Vincennes that the United States conceded to them the right to sell their lands to any other power than the Government of the Union, under whose protection they then freely acknowledged themselves to be.

Even after many defeats the executive was eager to lessen the military force and thus reduce expenses, as is shown by an extract of a letter written by Secretary Pickering to Governor St. Clair:

WAR OFFICE, March 26th, 1793.

UPON the whole, considering the change of disposition in the Indian tribes and that in consequence of our negotiations with Great Britain, they will no longer be stimulated by British Agents to continue their hostilities, I am inclined to think the services of your militia may be dispensed with.

LETTERS OF GENERAL PUTNAM

Gen. Rufus Putnam to General Knox.

SIR: My last letter was of the 5th instant. On the 11th early in the morning, the Indians fired on two lads near Lieut. Gray's post (20 miles up the Muskingum), one of which is badly wounded. Twenty-five of the enemy appeared in view and in insulting manner invited the people to come out and fight them—they killed eleven cattle and drove off as many more—the same morning two men were fired on near the post at Belleprie but they made their escape unhurt.

Yesterday evening as Capt. Rogers and Mr. Henderson (two persons employed as spies for this town) were returning from a tour in the woods, about one mile from Campus Martius, they were fired on by the Indians. Rogers was killed and a ball went through Henderson's shirt and grazed his groin. Two other Indians fired on him as he ran off, and on his way in he met four others, but he happily made his escape from them all. We are taking every means in our power for a vigorous defense but I fear our cattle will be all killed or driven off, for we are too weak to detach parties to oppose them out of our works, especially as we can never ascertain their numbers; have all the reason in the world to fear a decoy and ambush, and the loss of a small party from any of our posts would expose the place to almost certain destruction. You will readily perceive that our situation with respect to carrying on our farming business is little better than if we were closely besieged; nor can it be better till the government shall release us, which we flatter ourselves will be soon, by detachments pushed forward for our immediate protection till such times as the general operations of our army shall take place.

Gen. Rufus Putnam to General Knox.

MARIETTA, Aug. 22nd, 1791.

DEAR SIR

I embrace the present opportunity to thank you for your letters of the 24th of March and 7th of April last and I also thank you that notwithstanding we have no assistance but our own people till the middle of July, and the Indians in small parties continually harassing of us, yet since the death of Capt. Rogers we have lost but one man killed and one taken prisoner and we have lost a number of horses and upward of fifty head of cattle. On our part we have killed one Indian, whose body we recovered, and have reason to believe some others were killed or wounded.

We have collected most of our English grain without loss and we have a prospect of a sufficient crop of corn for the support of the inhabitants of the coming year.

Gen. Rufus Putnam to Gen'l Knox. (Extract.)

FORT WASHINGTON, July 26th, 1792.

SIR:

I herewith enclose a duplicate of my letter of the 22nd instant, with the copy of some speeches, which is connected with the business mentioned in that letter. Dispatches to Major Hamtramck on the subject went off yesterday by express. I have requested him to forward the speech to the Wabash chiefs and similar ones to as many other tribes as he shall think proper. I have considerable expectation from this business. Mr. Wells, the interpreter, tells me that the chief to whom my speech is directed on the Eel River is a very sensible man. That the British account him the best speaker among all the Indian nation, that he is the greatest chief and has more influence than all the chiefs in the Wabash country, that when he (Mr. Wells) left Eel River in June last, this chief was gone to the council on the Omeo, but Mr. Wells thinks he is disposed to peace and as he has two sisters who are prisoners here and some other relations, Mr. Wells has no doubt but on my message he will come to the treaty, although he declined last winter on Major Hamtramck's invitation.

Through the influence of this man, I am yet in some hopes of being admitted to speak with their high mightinesses the Shawanese and other hostile chiefs.

Gen. Rufus Putnam to General Knox. (Extracts.)

FORT WASHINGTON, July 22, 1792.

I think there is the highest reason to believe that Freeman, Truman and Harden are all murdered and all the people who went with them except one whom they considered as a servant or person of no consequence and for that reason spared his life.

It is highly probable that the principal chiefs from nearly all the western tribes with a great number of warriors and others may be collected at Vincennes.

By a proper management they may be detached from the tribes which have organized the war.

Published January 1, 1877.

Mr. William Wells, who I met with some Port Creek Indians to the hostile tribes with a speech dated at Port Vincent, the 6th of October, I fear has shared the fate of poor Truman, otherwise he would have been at Muskingum before I left. The only hope is that he may have made his escape back to Port Vincent.

But whether he be dead or alive, confident I am that the tribes to whom he was sent will never be brought to the voice of peace nor do I believe they ever will until they get a good whipping.

I know they are under the influence of the greatest villains in the world.

MARSHALL, Mass. 17th 1767

Sir: Please to deliver the Delaware woman, widow of the murdered Indian, such goods as she shall choose to wipe away her tears to the amount of five dollars.

RUFUS PUTNAM.

To
 GREEN, GREEN, Esq.,
 CHARLES GREEN.

This Indian was killed by a white man in revenge for some old injury.

September—Jonas Davis, about three miles above Belpre, near the Ohio River.

CHAPTER V.

POLITICS IN EARLY TIMES.

WASHINGTON COUNTY CREATED—GOVERNOR ST. CLAIR WITH A LEGISLATURE ON HIS HANDS—CHILlicothe vs. Marietta—A STATE CONSTITUTION—SLAVERY—DESPAIR OF THE FEDERALISTS AND EXULTATION OF THE REPUBLICANS—HARMAN BLENNERHASSETT—LOCAL QUESTIONS CEASE TO BE THE POINT OF DIFFERENCE BETWEEN POLITICAL PARTIES—THE ERA OF GOOD FEELING—NEW QUESTIONS.

WASHINGTON COUNTY CREATED.

On Saturday, July 26, 1788, Arthur St. Clair, who had recently come to Marietta and entered upon his duties as Governor of the Northwest Territory, created the first county in this region and fittingly named it Washington. At first it included more than one-half of what is now Ohio. Its northern boundary was Lake Erie from the Pennsylvania line to the mouth of the Cuyahoga, its southern boundary extended to the mouth of the Sciota, and its western followed that river far north of the present site of Columbus. By the erection of Jefferson County in 1797, of Fairfield in 1800 and of Belmont in 1801, Washington County had lost at least half of her original territory, but it still contained, until the State Constitution was adopted, the most of the Tuscarawas and Muskingum valleys and extended along the Ohio almost to the Scioto.

To the Territorial Legislature it sent two representatives, or one-eleventh of the whole number; to the Constitutional Convention which consisted of 34 members, it sent four.

The government of the "Territory Northwest of the River Ohio" from 1788 to 1798 had been simple. The governor and the three judges enacted such laws as they deemed necessary, giving meanwhile the scattered settlements a measure of local self-government. The plan has been imitated since in Louisiana, in Hawaii, Porto Rico, and in the Philippines.

GOVERNOR ST. CLAIR WITH A LEGISLATURE ON HIS HANDS.

In 1798 it appeared that the Territory had 5,000 free male inhabitants. According to the Ordinance of 1787, it was then time to organize a representative government. Governor St. Clair ordered the election of 22 representatives, who met in Cincinnati September 16, 1799. Five of these members came from territory not within the present boundaries of Ohio. Then his troubles began in earnest.

The old soldier who had fought with Wolfe at Quebec, who had served his country through the Revolution and for the last 10 years in most arduous labor on the frontier, had very strict ideas of honor and duty. Perhaps his long military experience was not the very best kind of a training for civil service, but it can be truly said that it made him scorn all schemes that had the least appearance of dishonesty. The county seat boomer who had wished to speculate in new sites, selected not for public convenience but for his own profit, found the old Governor an obstacle in his path.

No other proof is needed of the sterling honesty of Governor St. Clair than the fact that after half a century of faithful service, much of the time in very responsible positions, he retired a poor man. Even the tardy pension given him in his old age was taken to pay debts contracted in the government service.

In the Washington County, represented in the first and second Territorial Legislature, the population was chiefly along the larger water courses. From Gnadenhutzen on the Tuscarawas to Marietta, and along the Ohio from Newport to Gallipolis, there were tiny settlements on the best bottoms, and a few openings in the wilderness on the Hocking and on Duck Creek. There had been little increase in population until after the close of the Indian war and Wayne's treaty of 1795; even in 1800 the population was only 5,427. This estimate of the enumeration probably did not include the squatters who had long ere this taken summary possession of many tracts which they sometimes held in defiance of the lawful owners.

In the beginning of the period between 1798 and 1803, the people in this country knew very little about politics. Gen. Rufus Putnam tells one of his eastern friends long before this time that some of the Kentucky settlers had the "maggot in their heads" of separation from the Eastern States, but he thought it had not troubled the people on the Muskingum.

The New England traditions had been transplanted to the new colony, and the old social order: first in rank were those who brought with them the military and naval titles they had won in the Revolution. Then there were a few professional men and the sons of the officers: These were reported in the Court of Quarter Sessions with "Esq." or "Gentleman" after their names, a distinction which some of them wore with honor. For example, Ephraim Cutler, a son of Manasseh Cutler, would come four times a year all the way from what is now Ames township of Athens County to attend his judicial duties at Marietta.

Often in his journey to and from the court, he was compelled to hobble his horse and pass a night in the woods with a tree for shelter. For this arduous labor he received no salary, and no other remuneration than his share of costs—frequently not enough to pay his board bill. These men, who were classed in the records as "Gentlemen," seem to have realized that their position brought with it certain responsibilities. There was another class known on the records as "yeomen," and it is worthy of note that some of those who were classed as "yeomen" in documents written in New England were enrolled as "gentlemen" in the Muskingum settlement. New occasions had taught them new duties and their duties well performed had given them new honors.

There were others classed as "yeomen" even here, who have borne an honorable part in our history. For example John Brough, "Yeoman," the father of the War Governor, in 1797 and again in 1798 gives a bond for $200 "to be of good behavior and observe all the laws and ordinances which are or shall be made, or be in force, relating to inn or tavern keepers." He seems to have borne a good reputation as inn-keeper and four years later he is enrolled in the "First Religious Society of Marietta as John Brough, Esq. James Mason, of Waterford, also a "yeoman," gives a bond about the same time to "keep a good tavern" and offers as security Daniel Converse, a young man who was then carrying the mail on horseback between Marietta and Zanesville. Mr. Converse was already well known in the settlements on account of his capture by the Indians and his subsequent escape through Canada.

For the first 10 years of our history, the choice of leaders did not vex the minds of the settlers. They were too busy in building up homes. In 1798, at the first election for representatives from Washington County to the Territorial Assembly, Paul Fearing was elected by almost unanimous vote, and his colleague was Return Jonathan Meigs, Jr., who a little later belonged to a different party. With the meeting of this Legislature at Cincinnati, in 1799, the disciples of Hamilton and the followers of Jefferson came into conflict.

The Legislative Council, consisting of five members appointed by President Adams, was of course in harmony with Governor St. Clair. Its duties were similar to those of our State Senate. In this Council sat Col. Robert Oliver until 1803. But in the House there were the representatives of a new order—men who were destined to be leaders of the new State. In the Ross County delegation were Nathaniel Massie, Edward Tiffin and Thomas Worthington. They were the champions of a "New Revolution." The friends of Jefferson looked to France rather than to Old or New England for their political models. For its second session this Legislature met at Chillicothe by the direction of Congress, which had then erected the Territory of Indiana.

Before the second Assembly of the Territory was called together, Paul Fearing had gone to Washington as delegate and Return Jonathan Meigs, Jr., had been appointed judge of the Supreme Court of the Territory. William Rufus Putnam, a son of Gen. Rufus Putnam, and Ephraim Cutler, whom we have already mentioned, were elected to fill the vacancies.

The writings of Mr. Cutler, which have been preserved in a very interesting book written by his grand-daughter, Miss Julia P. Cutler, give a pretty full account of the proceedings of this last session of the Territorial Legislature. Evidently Washington County had able representatives at this time.

If we look closely at a township map of Ohio we shall find two systems met at the Scioto. On the eastern side, the land is laid out in squares and rectangles with mathematical precision—an emblem of the Federalist love of order. On the western side the township and farm lines are zig-zag and crooked, suggesting the Republican love of freedom for the individual. Throughout Washington County the ideas of Hamilton prevailed; in Ross and Adams the Virginia settlers had brought with them Jefferson's ideas of personal liberty—at least for the white man. In Hamilton County the Federalists rallied about Governor St. Clair, but they were fighting a defensive battle and soon the Federalists of Washington County were left with none to help them but the representatives from Jefferson and Trumbull counties, in the north and east, and those from the district about Detroit, which was then known as Wayne County.

The Jeffersonians wished to get rid of the Wayne County delegation by assigning all its inhabited territory to Indiana. The counter movement of the Federalists was not exactly a secession, but the formation of a new State east of the Scioto, which would include about the original area of Washington County. Although this would have made a State larger than those once proposed by Jefferson for the Northwest Territory, we may now rejoice that the Buckeye State was not created with such restricted boundaries.

CHILLICOTHE VS. MARIETTA.

The proposal was especially distasteful to Chillicothe, which applied to become the permanent capital. The toast of William R. Putnam expressing the wish that "the Scioto may have the borders of two great and flourishing States" was especially displeasing, for it was apparent that neither of these prospective States would choose a town on the border for a capital. This proposal for a division of what is now Ohio seemed to meet the approval of all the leading citizens of Marietta, even of Judge Meigs and others who were afterwards considered Republicans. In Chillicothe the feeling was so bitter against the movement and also against Governor St. Clair and his friends that there were attempts to incite a riot. We will let some of the witnesses of these events describe in their own language the acts and feelings of those days. It was a period when parties were forming and political disputes were separating old friends.

Mr. Cutler says:

"A mob collected and attacked Gregg's house, where the Governor, Judges Burnet and Sibley, Colonel Oliver, General Schenk, and the Detroit and Washington County members boarded. An entrance was forced into Gregg's house, in the hall of which a citizen of Chillicothe (Michael Baldwin) met and struck Mr. Schieffelin, who immediately drew his dirk, and would assuredly have wounded the man, had not his arm been caught by some friends who were near."

DEAR SIR:

We have passed a law declaring the assent of the Territory to an alteration of the original boundary lines for States which I dare say you have had a particular account of. This has offended the counties of Ross, Adams and part of Fairfield and we had like to have brought an old house next our house. The grand jurors of the county of Adams have presented the Gov. and Council as nuisances in the Territory (a copy of which I am informed by Cutler he forwarded to you); however, that is not all, for on Christmas Eve, Mr. Baldwin was purposing to burn a barrel of tar before the house of Capt. Gregg where the Governor and a large number of the members of both Houses who gave their voice in favor of the above bill lodged, and to burn the Govr. in effigy and if any opposition was made to whip those that made it. However, by Col. Worthington and some others (they) were prevented, but on Saturday night (which you may recollect was the night after) a number of men being half drunk were, as we believe, determined to abuse some of the members down at their quarters, but three of them a little drunker than was necessary came down before the others (as we believe) were ready. Mr. Schieffelin, a member from Wayne, being some irritated from what had been heard, gave them some warm words so that one collared him but Schieffelin drew his dirk and, I have reason to believe, if it had not been for Capt. Gregg, he would have put it into him up to the hilt. They were immediately separated but all the arms in the house were soon loaded and we were determined to defend the house. It being a brick house we think we should have made a good defense. However, nothing further happened, but we hear they heave out now and then threats, but I think there is no danger except at the close of the session, when we are separated, the devil and whiskey may enter into them, but we shall keep a good lookout. I know not what will be the end of these things but am persuaded that the Assembly will never sit at this place again. The members from the county of Washington (William Rufus Putnam and Ephraim Cutler) have done themselves honor this session. When they speak (they) are always listened to. You who put them into office need not be ashamed of your choice.

Expect the session will close in about two weeks, therefore will not trouble you with any more of this matter,

But am with respect and esteem, your friend.

R. OLIVER.

James Fearing to Paul Fearing.

CHILLICOTHE, July 14th, 1862

DEAR SIR:

Saturday next is proposed as the day for closing the most turbulent session of the Legislature that we have yet had. It appears to me that popularity is the governing motive of many of the members of the House and that they calculate that the most effectual way of gaining their point is to make as much noise as possible, and to condemn everything that is attempted.

I rejoice that the hour is at hand, when I am to retire from this scene of confusion to the serene pleasure of my own family. Your friends here who have written you often are apprehensive that their letters have been suppressed, as they have not heard of your receiving them.

On account of this insult to its members, the Legislature resolved to hold the second session in Cincinnati. Although this session was never held, since a State Legislature took its place, the remembrance of the riot probably had much to do with the choice of another place for the seat of government. Even while waiting for permanent quarters at Columbus, the majority of the Legislature chose to meet for a time at Zanesville rather than in Chillicothe. The following extract from a letter of Gen. Rufus Putnam to "Paul Fearing, Esquire, Member of Congress, City of Washington," casts some light on the subject:

"One thing I will venture to suggest—Lancaster ought to be the place appointed for the meeting of the convention not only from its central position but because of the aversion which a great portion of the inhabitants have to Chillicothe on account of the treatment the Legislature met with there the last session. If we are to form a Constitution, let every obstacle to union and harmony be removed as far as possible. I think it not impossible to bring Col. Worthington into this measure—he owns the falls of the Hockhocking and is largely interested at Lancaster—he must be convinced that Chillicothe will not be agreed to by the great body of the people—that fixing upon Chillicothe will appear to be an act of power and revenge without any regard to justice.”

This “aversion” to Chillicothe and to the group of leaders who favored it had an influence upon the politics of Washington County for many years.

As late as October, 1811, the Western Spectator, a Federalist paper of Marietta, discussed the question of a State capital and very strongly favored Zanesville. The editor said, —“Let it remain at Zanesville until the progress of population and so forth shall render us able to judge more accurately on the subject. We think no place at present has better claims—nor do we think these claims will appear diminished after a lapse of several years.” In January, 1812, it has these significant words to say about its pet enemies, the Chillicothe clique: “The Senate (of Ohio) have notified the House that they are ready to receive proposals respecting the seat of government—in other words to sell it to the highest bidder.”

The accession of Thomas Jefferson to the Presidency gave the Republicans a new point from which to attack Governor St. Clair. They would secure his removal and if they could not succeed in this they would form a State and thus get rid of “Arthur the First,” as they called him.

The Federalists retaliated by dubbing Colonel Worthington “Sir Thomas” and tried to postpone the change from Territory to State. The letters passing to and from Washington tell of plots and counterplots.

CHILICOTHE, Jan. 12, 1802.

I am not surprised that the President has expressed his disapprobation of the Governor's communication to both Houses as his dislike of the man and of his principles would naturally be followed by such a consequence. The collection of persons of a particular sort from different parts of the Territory now in the Federal City induces me to think that various exertions are making to supplant the Old Gentleman.

Your friends in this place have too much reason to fear that their letters are all suppressed by the postmaster before they leave this place.

WASHINGTON CITY, 21st of January, 1802.

DEAR SIR:—There is much business at present before the President and before Congress respecting our N. W. Territory, for the reason of our own paltry squabbles and parties among ourselves in the Territory we make ourselves cheap and even ridiculous in the eyes of the general government. In my opinion the Governor may fairly be charged with all the blame. If he has not in a direct manner, like Samson, spread the flames of discontent and wrangling by means of his 300 mischievous animals sent through the Territory, yet he has never acted like a father to and friend of the Territory generally.

I believe the Governor will soon have his own hands full of contention and vexation. He pretends to be wise enough to dictate to others—let him see whether he be wise enough to acquit himself of crimes and malpractices in his office, of which he is now charged by Col. Worthington and Mr. Baldwin. The complaint is now before the President.

I think our territory will not be divided by Congress, a majority of whom are wishing us to become a free State, as they presume. If Governor St. Clair, the old aristocratic sinner, was once out of the way, we should all be honest and wise enough to make good Republicans. Nothing has presented since I came to this city whereby I could serve you, sir, but in recommending you to the Postmaster-general as a proper person to fill the office of postmaster at Marietta. In this I succeeded and Judge Meigs informs me you have received the appointment. I wish it may be of use to you. Mr. Granger asked of me whether your politics were Federal or Republican. I answered that I could not define your politics, but even supposing that you might have been Federal in times past, yet I had such an opinion of your honor and integrity that I would pledge myself to him for the faithful performance of every duty required from a postmaster.

“CHILICOTHEY,” 15th Jan., 1802.

SIR:

Whether any of those letters have got to your hands is not known, and whether they ever will, or any that may be sent to you thro' this postoffice is very uncertain. Many of us have long thought that many improper practices prevailed in it during the last session of the Legislature, for the communications between the delegates and me came to the hands of each very irregularly, as well as those of Mr. Burnet with them, and some of them were even suppressed.

Mr. Worthington and Mr. Baldwin must have been at Washington for some time. Mr. Miller will not set out to meet them till the 25th; and it seems to be uncertain whether Mr. Tod will go or not.

I have good reason to think that new efforts will be made by the agents from this place to secure my recan invent will be spared. I trust in the integrity of the Government, and in the ability of the Executive to execute the laws of the United States.

Yours, &c.
A. ST. CLAIR.

In the letter he gives an account of the mob at Chillicothe which does not differ materially from that found in the letter of Colonel Oliver. The Governor also gives credit to Colonel Worthington for earnest efforts to repress all violence.

Chillicothe, Jan. 14th, 1802.

MARIETTA, Jany. 14th, 1802.

I should not be the least surprised if the person you mentioned should be appointed Governor. He will be at Washington before this reaches you, ready to pay adulation at the Shrine of the Democratic Idol. You know that I was ever moderate in politics and wish I to see Mr. Jefferson unite all candid Republicans and Federalists throughout the United States. His inaugural speech promised it but since that time what a sad falling off. Some of the late measures of the present administration have destroyed all my confidence and hopes. Of the late alteration of postmaster at this place, I will only say, that it is the most pitiful, dirty measure that ever was undertaken and reflects disgrace on all concerned in the removal.

You will doubtless receive from Chillicothe ample details of the proceedings of our Legislature. In to-day's paper you will find two angry notes of Gov. St. Clair to Col. Findley. I fear the Govr. has shown

I am very anxious to have an office for the clearance of vessels at this place by the middle of March. A petition will be forwarded by next mail.

The person referred to as the probable successor of Governor St. Clair was Return Jonathan Meigs, Jr., whose defection was greatly resented by the Federalists.

Mr. Gilman grew more indignant against the new administration, as is evident from a letter written the next month.

Chillicothe, Feby. 4th, 1802.

MARIETTA, Feby. 4th, 1802.

Mr. Jefferson certainly had it in his power to have united the moderate and best men of the United States, but instead of pursuing that dignified line of conduct, we see him the head of a party and the patron of men who are despised by all good citizens. Nothing is wanting in my humble opinion to complete the climax of infamy but the return of Paine, the apostate Barlow, to our country under executive patronage.

* * * You will know that I thought favorably of Mr. Jefferson before he came into office. But when I see foreign minions, who deserve the gallows, enjoying posts of profit and Revolutionary characters neglected, my soul abhors the man who is instrumental in bringing such disgrace on the American character.

David Putnam is as well calculated for naval officer as any man in town—but other questions than "Is he fit to fill even the most trifling offices."

* * * Mr. Silliman is married to Miss Debby

Washington, Jan. 14th, 1802.

I am, dear sir,

Yours, &c.
J. DARLINGTON.

In justice to Mr. Gilman, it must be confessed that for some excuse or other Mr. Jefferson made a general removal of federal offices in Washington County, and in subsequent appointments the current of presidential favor flowed only on Republican lines and to those "persons of a particular sort" mentioned by Mr. Burnet. The change which especially disgusted the Federalists of Washington County was the removal of Rufus Putnam from the office of surveyor general.

No thorough-going Federalist of that day could be made to believe that the cause for this removal was anything else than Jefferson's bitter hatred of one who had been a friend to Washington. But the man whom Jefferson appointed to succeed Putnam—Jared Mansfield—was not a politician but a scholar, an instructor in the West Point Academy. His son, E. D. Mansfield, who spent part of his boyhood in Marietta, a political writer not likely to be unduly prejudiced in favor of Jefferson, says in his memoirs that Putnam had not sufficient scientific training to establish meridian lines and that for this reason Jefferson sought a specialist who neither sought nor desired the office.

J. Darlington, a representative from Adams County, in a letter dated Manchester, 29th of March, 1802, writes this letter to Paul Fearing:

"I have the pleasure to inform you that I have this day rec'd your letter of 9th inst., in reply to which I observe that the county of Clairmont I believe is bounded on the east by the west line of the county of Adams, therefore I believe that none of the inhabitants in the census taken were included in the county of Clairmont. So far as I can collect the sense of this county on the report of the committee on the subject of an admission into the union, they are unanimous in favor of it, and congratulate themselves in the prospect of having it soon in their power to shake off the fetters of aristocracy, and in the downfall of the Tory party in this Territory, and hope the day may soon approach when they shall be governed by a constitution founded by true Republicans chosen by the people free from the control of an arbitrary chief."

When the Jeffersonian Republican of that time was speaking of his political opponents, "Tory" and "Aristocrat" were his favorite epithets; when the Federalist retaliated with names, "Democrat," "Jacobin" and "Robespierreian" were in his speech synonymous terms.

CHILLICOTHE, Jan. 13th, 1802.

I am also sorry that he (Judge Meigs) could not have the appointment of Major-general which was intended for him by a large majority of members until a constitutional objection took place. Then Colonel Oliver was proposed but could not be taken up by as many as would carry him in opposition to Colonel Sproat, whom the Federal party was using every influence to support. Others were mentioned but it was found that none was as likely to succeed as Major Buell, who is elected by a respectable majority. From what I have yet discovered, Mr. Backus seems to be an open and decided Republican. Party spirit prevails so much, chiefly by the influence of two or three members, that business progresses very slow. Please to favor me by next mail who you would wish might be appointed Associate Judge in place of Major Buell and whether you would wish Judge Wood continued and if not who you would recommend in his place.

A STATE CONSTITUTION.

In August, 1802, the two political parties had become so well defined that two tickets for delegates to the Constitutional Convention were presented to the electors. The friends of Jefferson, or Republicans as they called themselves at that time, nominated Return Jonathan Meigs, Jr., Griffin Greene, William Skinner and William Wells. The Federalists nominated Gen. Rufus Putnam, Benjamin Ives Gilman, Ephraim Cutler, and John McIntire. The Federalist ticket was elected by a large majority.

It is suggestive of the estimate of the distribution of population in the county that three candidates on each ticket were from the southern part and one (Mr. Wells for the Republicans and Mr. McIntire for the Federalists) from the upper Muskingum.

SLAVERY.

At this time the question of slavery in the proposed State was discussed with a great deal of earnestness. It was claimed that even Jefferson was in favor of permitting slavery for a limited period in the hope of thus hastening its ultimate extinction in Virginia as well as Ohio. In the convention the clause prohibiting slavery was adopted by a majority of one. Even that majority was gained through the labors of Mr. Cutler, who convinced some who favored a limited slavery that such a policy was a violation of the compact made in the Ordinance of 1787. At this time there were slaves held in the Territory; two had that year been reported by the "lister" among the personal property held in Belpre township, and a few years later Blennerhassett sent a slave to Marietta to be hired out by the year.

Although "Arthur the First" had been removed from his position as governor, the Republicans in the convention were in such haste to be rid of his friends that they would not wait to have the State Constitution ratified by a popular vote. It is an example of political paradox that the Constitution which began with "We, the people" was not referred to the people at all. That which was the fundamental law of our State for half a century was adopted by the vote of 27 men. Against this form of adoption were the votes of Putnam, Cutler, Gilman, and Updegraff of Jefferson, and John Reily of Hamilton.

Letter Belt to "Paul Fearing, Esquire, Federal City."

CHILlicothe, (sic.) 3rd Dec., 1802.

The Constitution was signed on Monday last.

It begins with we the people and if we may judge from the judiciary article few constitutions were ever so bepeopled as it is throughout.

We are to have a Supreme Court of Appeals to consist of three Judges, and instead of making them as respectable and independent as the situation of the State would admit of, they have not only confined the Legislature to a parsimonious pittance, but the Judges are to travel like peddlers, once a year at least, into every county of the State. * * * I think it will be well for us lawyers. It will be well for clients if they get their causes through in seven years unless they pay well.

Mr. Belt's prediction concerning the Supreme Court has hardly proved true. As the increase of the State in population made it necessary for the Supreme Court of Ohio to hold all its sessions at the capital, the people have found it expedient to create nine Circuit courts each consisting of three judges. These judges travel from county to county in their circuit and thus save great expense to litigants. The duties of the Circuit judges of today are therefore similar to those prescribed for the Supreme Court in the days when the population of the whole State was much less than that of a single circuit of the present time. This plan ridiculed by Mr. Belt was devised by Ephraim Cutler and by his influence carried in the convention.

DESPAIR OF THE FEDERALISTS AND EXULTATION OF THE REPUBLICANS.

With the adoption of a State Constitution, the leadership in Ohio passed from the pioneers of the Muskingum to those of the Scioto and the Miami. The memory of Governor St. Clair's vetoes caused the convention to fear the executive, and thus it happens that in Ohio the governor even yet does not have the veto power. As we read the letters of those days we find the Republicans hopeful and exultant might be expected. The Federalists are utterly despondent. They think the country has gone a long way on the road to destruction.

The spirit of the stout Federalists is vigorously expressed a little later than this time by Stephen Jones in a letter to Rufus Putnam:

"I noticed in the public prints, a few years since, that T. Jefferson had honored you, by removing you from an office (surveyor general) bestowed upon you by the great and virtuous Washington, the real Father of his country. * * * * *

"The numerous removals of honest, capable men from office, and, in many instances, the vacancies so made by T. Jefferson filled again by him with d—d rascals, has excited my warmest indignation."

MARIETTA, Feby. 14th. 1803.

* * * * * You have undoubtedly had an account of the issue of our election—the result is enough to disgust me with a Republican government. If the people will believe lies in preference to truth, if honest men are neglected and rogues promoted, what will be the issue? Despotism, I fear.

Could you have believed that Wyllis Silliman and William Jackson would be elected Representatives—and Bowen, Coroner? Greater disgrace never fell on a people.

No question is made to Tiffin for Governor, and I am well satisfied that he became the cipher rather than to hold a six years' seat in the Senate, as was first contemplated by the Democrats.

I am completely disgusted with the politics of the times; and confess that I have little expectation of any alteration for the better.

You saw Backus' attack on your character. It was answered by one of your friends, since which the mighty censor has been silent. This man's conduct has been mean in the extreme and he appears to be unpopular with all. Nevertheless so uncertain is the sovereign will, that he may be one of our Senators next October.

Silliman has given up the paper and Tupper has become sole editor.

What is Mathews after? Is it possible that he will become a pliant Democrat for the sake of office? I could think he detected some symptoms of change before he left this place.

Yesterday Capt. Barker launched Mr. Woodbridge's brig and Ned Tupper's schooner. We have had a very severe winter. We have not yet heard anything of opposing the proposals made by our convention to Congress.

The Wyllis Silliman here mentioned had been associated since 1801 with Elijah Backus in publishing the Ohio Gazette and the Territorial and Virginia Herald. When Mr. Silliman withdrew from the partnership, he removed to Zanesville and President Jefferson appointed him register of the land office. In 1824 he was a candidate for United States Senator, and for this position he received hearty recommendations from Colonel Converse and John Mathews. Mr. Mathews had married Miss Sally Woodbridge and removed to Springfield, opposite Zanesville, afterward named Putnam in honor of Gen. Rufus Putnam and now a part of Zanesville. He afterward represented Muskingum County in the House in 1807 to 1808 and his district in the State Senate in 1820.

That he had not deserted his old political faith is evident from the following letter which he wrote in 1824 to Ephraim Cutler:—

"I take the liberty, as an old Federalist writing to an old Federalist, to electioneer a little for a renegade Federalist, Wyllys Silliman, who will be a candidate for the Senate of the United States.

"I have long ago forgiven him and feel some zeal in adding my mite to promote his election. Silliman has never been a sneaking Democrat, Horn-blower, or anything of the kind; in point of talents, I think (he) will not be behind any other candidate."

William Henry Harrison was elected and in the whirligig of politics, he soon afterward became the successful leader of the very party that had formerly opposed him.

Thomas Dwight (a member of Congress) wrote in this dolorous fashion to Gen. Rufus Putnam, from Washington, D. C., on February 2, 1805:

"Of politics I am most heartily weary, and the more so as I foresee the Robespierreian system fast approaching. At the end of this Congress I retire from public life to a private station which I consider in these days as the only post of honor.

"We might possibly get into a war with France by our trade to St. Domingo, if certain great men did not prefer creeping and crawling with peace to war on any terms and for any cause. What Bonaparte commands respecting our concerns will I believe be most scrupulously obeyed. We shall pass an act to restrain the trade."

The contest between Washington County and its neighbors was only an incident connected with our emergence from a provincial to a national State. At first each little group of settlers had its prejudices against all other. The New England emigrants did not like the settlers from Virginia or the Scotch-Irish from Pennsylvania, and both Virginians and Pennsylvanians hated the Yankees. Many years ago an old lady, whose parents had brought her in childhood to a part of Ohio almost exclusively settled by Pennsylvanians, used to give this amusing incident of her first visit to one of her new neighbors. After she had been in the cabin a little while and had been very curiously surveyed by a ring of children, one of them exclaimed, "Mother, get her a piece of bread. We want to see a Yankee eat." It took a long time to wear away these provincial prejudices and teach each little group that they could learn some useful lesson from the other.

Puritan ideal of union, order and nationality seemed for a time to be supplanted by the Jeffersonian doctrine of equality and personal liberty. But we have learned that the two are not antagonistic. By the fusion of the colonies the best in each of them has survived.

When General Putnam was striving to keep the Constitutional Convention away from Chillicothe, he little thought that his own great-grandson would make that town his home. Rufus Putnam is now an honored citizen of Chillicothe and has no fear of riot or insult from his fellow townsmen. The Scioto divides neither State nor people. The contending elements have blended to build up a grand commonwealth. It is not strange that Ohio has given to the nation such a rich treasure of jewels—that illustrious group of soldiers and statesmen. Every section of the older settlements gave some of her noblest sons and daughters to subdue the Ohio wilderness and build up a new empire. In the last half-century Ohio has been repaying that debt with a generous interest.

HARMAN BLENNERHASSETT.

This romantic episode in the history of pioneer times gave brightness and beauty to those years of toil, but the tragic end which awakened the interest and sympathy of the whole country was the direct result of political strife.

It is not strange that the story of this tragedy on the Ohio has been treasured with so much interest. When the white settlers came to the valley of the Ohio, there were scarcely any red men along its banks; the home of the tribes was far to the North or away on the waters of the Tennessee. The story of that other race who once inhabited this region was buried in their mounds and ramparts and the scenes of their busy life covered again with a dense forest. Hence, the new race found no stories associated with the beautiful sites which they had chosen. The Ohio had along its bank works as old, perhaps, as the Roman towers on the Rhine, but there had been no continuity of race to preserve and build up its traditions. No wonder, then, that the sad story of the Blennerhassetts has touched the hearts of all who live in this region. Many of our readers, no doubt, will eagerly read this vivid retelling of an old but always interesting story.

Harman Blennerhassett, born in Hampshire, England, at some date between 1764 and 1767, educated in Ireland for the profession of the law, came to Marietta with his family in 1797 and the next spring purchased the upper lobe of the island which still bears his name. It is in the Ohio, 14 miles below the mouth of the Muskingum. Here he fitted up a home luxurious and grand for those times—a veritable palace in comparison with the plain homes at Marietta and Belpre. In this beautiful place he lived until 1807. In 1805 the tempter and destroyer came.

genial Blennerhassett and persuaded him to invest his fortune in a venture which even yet has in it something of mystery, but which at the time promised wealth and fame to the sanguine promoters.

A filibustering scheme to seize some of the Spanish territory of Texas—a scheme no better and probably no worse than that of Lopez in 1851, of Walker in 1860, or of many others that have been favored by Americans—was interpreted by the sycophantic worshippers of the reigning Jefferson, and especially by the drunken General Wilkinson, into a plot to destroy the Union. That Burr was not unwilling to see the West become an independent empire is probable, indeed almost certain. There were many true men in Kentucky and Tennessee who felt even at the beginning of the 19th century that Spanish misrule in North America should be ended, if necessary by force. Senator Blount, who was expelled from the United States Senate for entering into a plot in 1796-97 very similar to that formed by Burr 10 years later, did not for that reason lose any of his popularity in Tennessee. But Jefferson could not neglect the opportunity to crush his hated rival, Aaron Burr. Governor Tiffin detained the boats which had been built on the Muskingum; the Virginia militia ravaged the beautiful island home; Burr and Blennerhassett were taken to Richmond and there, after a tedious trial, released. A little later Blennerhassett's beautiful home land was seized by a creditor and the family with a small remnant of their property went to Mississippi. Nothing remains of his buildings, which were destroyed by fire in 1811; even the foundations were dug up long ago, and part of the site is now covered by a bowling alley and dancing hall erected for picnic parties.

In the eight years of his residence on the Ohio it was natural that a man of Blennerhassett's culture and intelligence would have intimate social and business relations with his neighbors at Marietta. In private collections and in the library of Marietta College are preserved many of his letters and numerous relics of his island home. Among his intimate friends were Dudley Woodbridge, a prominent merchant of those times, with whom he formed a business partnership for the sale of imported (English) goods, Paul Fearing, a representative in Congress, Griffin Greene, a cousin of the American general, and David Putnam, the first preceptor in Muskingum Academy. When Blennerhassett first came to Marietta, he brought the following letter of introduction to Mr. Woodbridge:

PITTSBURG, July 31, 1797.

SIR:

Presuming upon a short acquaintance I take the liberty of introducing to you my friend Harman Blennerhassett, Esq., a gentleman from Europe who wishes to become a resident of the Western Country. He visits Marietta and the adjacent settlements for the purpose of observation. Any information you may please to show him will be fully compensated by his acquaintance and gratefully acknowledged by

In the numerous letters from his Western home, there is revealed the genial, hospitable gentleman, honorable in his dealings, hopeful in the midst of discouragements. The following letter to Griffin Greene, Esq., is typical of many which he wrote in his quiet, peaceful days:

BEAUFORT ISLAND, Sept 22d '98

DEAR SQUIRE:

In pursuance of your letter I enclose you my Dft for the amt of your Demand on the score of our last Dealing as by our Friend's Capt D'Hebecourt's acts returned to me which I take it for granted are correct:— I have not particularly examined them yet for want of time, but rest persuaded that should any error appear at any time, you and I shall be equally forward on both sides to rectify it.

I have since a week or ten days past entertained a hope that your occasions would not press for my Dft till things looked up better at Philadelphia where everything is so deranged by the common calamity that foreign bills of exch. I find must suffer a heavy depreciation. This consideration however, I have made give way to your necessities.

On the subject of the Boat I wish to have a little unreserved conversation with you. I therefore beg of you to slip down and give me the week you have promised me. Let me add, among your older acquaintance perhaps you have not one disposed toward you with more friendly sentiments than

Your Obligd

Hble Serv't,

HARM BLANNERHASSETT.

The "common calamity" was the war actually begun by France. It will be recalled by the student of history that in 1798 Washington had been called to the command of the army and that the general expectation of the people was that the war with France would be continued. Hence foreign bills of exchange were subject to an unusual risk; they could be sold only at a heavy discount.

We will pass over the eight quiet years and give another letter written shortly before the outbreak of the storm. This letter addressed to Dudley Woodbridge, gives us a hint of the way in which slave labor might sometimes be used even in the territory reserved for freedom:

DEAR D<sup>y</sup>:

I forgot to mention to a small business I wish you to transact for me at Mar'a viz—to place Kager for a year or by the month with Lincoln or Allen. The latter K. tells me offers at the rate of 110 Drs. a year. But Mr. L. first spoke of hiring him. I want 120 Drs. if I am to find his clothing, but will take the above offer if Mr. L. will not give my demand. I wish you would take the trouble to write or get written a few lines by way of an article or oblig'n as security for the wages specifying the time an owner of a slave may safely hire one there. Whenever Kager shall earn for me 4 years wages I mean to set him free. [Then follow directions about some produce he had sent to Marietta to be sold.]

HAR BLANNERHASSETT.

We have seen but one letter from Mrs. Blennerhassett, and that is only a fragment, supposed to have been written December 12, 1806. We are indebted for this and other papers to Mrs. J. A. Gallaher, a granddaughter of Mr. Woodbridge, to whom the letter was addressed:

Our runaways have just arrived and would start immediately off in the wherry if they could only get a supply of biscuit. I enclose the order of Mr. B. to get it from Jones & I wish also to have your keel boat loaded & sent down with as much provisions of all sorts as it will carry, also to get another keel boat of Mr. Miller's which lies at Colonel Lord's, and load it and send them down with as many hired hands as can be got. Mr. Elliott was to have Muncell's bill discharged and two coils of rope got which he left at Muncell's. I wish to settle all accounts with Miller. My mind is so distracted I scarcely know what I write but hope to see you.

Yours,

M. BLANNERHASSETT.

On the 2d of December, 1806, the Ohio Legislature met in secret session at Chillicothe to discuss the movements of Burr and Blennerhassett. The following orders show the result of the deliberations:

The State of Ohio.

To JOSEPH BULL, Esq., Major General of the Third Division of the Militia of the State of Ohio.

You are hereby authorized and required, with such of the Militia of your Division as you may think necessary, to arrest and secure Harman Blennerhassett, Esq., if he may be found within the jurisdiction of the State of Ohio, to answer to the following charges, to-wit: that he the said Harman hath fitted out and is attempting to fit out, and hath procured to be fitted out on the Muskingum river within the Jurisdiction of this State a number of Batteaux, with the Intention that such Batteaux shall be employed to disturb the peace and tranquility of the United States, all of which Doings of the said Harman Blennerhassett are contrary to an act of the State of Ohio entitled "An Act to prevent certain Acts hostile to the peace and Tranquility of the United States, within this State."

And you are further authorized and required to take possession of and detain the Batteaux aforesaid, together with all their Tackle, Apparel, and Furniture and the same securely to keep according to the provisions of the fourth section of the above recited Act.

Given under my Hand and Seal at Marietta, in the State of Ohio, this Tenth day of December, Anno Domini One Thousand Eight Hundred and Six.

RETURN JONATHAN MEIGS, JR.,
Agent commissioned by the Governor of the State of Ohio.

MARIETTA, 16th December, 1856.

CAPTAIN TIMOTHY BUELL, Greeting

You are hereby authorized and empowered to raise by voluntary enlistment two sergeants, one corporal, one drummer, one fifer and * * * privates for the service of the United States to be stationed in the County of Washington. They will receive such pay and rations as the troops of the standing army.

By authority,

JOSEPH BURN.

Mr. Genl. 3d Div Militia, State of Ohio.

The number of privates was given in the commission but the figures are no longer legible. In the roll of the company, which has been preserved, there are 35 names. Dr. S. P. Hildreth states that they were posted near the mouth of the Muskingum during the winter of 1806-07, and that many amusing scenes occurred during this period.

The following letter addressed to Mr. Fearing gives us a little hint of Henry Clay's opinion concerning the relations of Burr and Blennerhassett:

LEXINGTON, Aug. 2nd, 1807.

DEAR SIR,

It is my duty to say it will be in your interest to attach the boats that you can demand [here] on the Virginia side as the property of Burr. Clay is of the opinion it will do. You will therefore by some means get him over and have a writ served on him. If any difficulty should arise concerning bail you will please apply to Mr. McNeill, who, I presume, will oblige me therein. In the meantime I suppose the other attachment need not be altered or relinquished. Clay thinks that as the whole expedition was fitted out for Burr, although Brht. was the person who paid for the boats and cargoes, yet it is probable that he can be considered in no other light than as the friend or agent of Burr. Perhaps you can obtain some information from Barker respecting the person who required them built and gave directions as to their form, number, &c. You may find sufficient evidence to prove that Blennerhasset said they were for Burr. I will expect to hear from you shortly.

Y'r Obt Servt

ROBERT MILLER.

The attempt to attach under Virginia process the boats and cargoes seized by General Buell under orders from the Governor of Ohio was not successful. The property which had not been lost or destroyed was sold at public auction in Marietta. One can hardly read these old letters without being convinced that in equity Ohio and Virginia owed a large debt to Blennerhassett for property wasted or recklessly destroyed. In the light of subsequent events there is something pathetic in the following appeal to Dudley Woodbridge:

NABOKOV, Volody 23, 1977

DEAR DUPLEY,

Amidst the various conjectures that may have arisen in your mind out of the friendship I long thought you had for me, respecting the situation of my family and the destiny that awaits me, it will not be indifferent to you to hear that we have sought an asylum here from the persecution that has pursued us, where we shall remain in expectation of collecting so much of the wreck of our property as we can receive, thro' you and others.

Your letters therefore will be anxiously looked for and the earliest statement and remittances you can forward of the property or its proceeds which I paid for before I came away.

I need not advise you of the dilapidated state of my affairs or suggest the narrowness of my means to resettle my family. Your punctuality and industry will save both; and the temper of the times however big with terror and alarm will not cover in your mind with the garb of treason or conspiracy the operations of buying or selling provisions here and at Marietta. I allude to the poor, desolate and solitary wilderness.

Marietta. I will have followed in this place, unless some new way shall possibly compel me to engage by what means I may see fit to eat or drink. I am very desirous to receive my acc. with you together with your order in my favor on Capt. Ellis and Shaw. You will all be ready to agree you can collect to inform me how far my family may hope for indemnity from the govt. of Ohio and Virginia for any part of my property detained or destroyed. For myself, I am satisfied to abide any chance of consideration for actions I never committed in which I will always be ready to exculpate you from any participation otherwise than as a merchant having no interest or concern in any views that have been attributed to Col. Burr injurious to the U. S.

I write to Col. Cushing and Mr. Jas. Wilson to request their special exertion to collect and forward to me here for the use of my family every article of my property that will be worth transportation.

Col. C. will inform you of the situation in which I am placed here under charge of being an associate of Col. Burr, who has substracted himself from the treachery of his friends and the persecution of his enemies.

It would astonish you to witness the prosperity of this country arising out of the cotton business. If you could visit this place you would not hesitate to take your stand amongst merchants selling from 200 to 50000 dollars worth of goods with an average profit of 20 per cent.

For further particulars I will refer you to Col. Cushing and the better information I shall hereafter collect and with our best wishes for yourself and family I remain, Dear Dudley,

Your sincere friend,

HAR. BLENNERHASSETT.

P. S. The want of our negroes and horses constitutes our greatest embarrassment. If you can succeed by any means to get them all down on Mr. Jones' vessel or any other the earliest opportunity you will confer a great obligation upon me. H. B.

Mr. Woodbridge was unable to carry out Blennerhassett's wishes concerning credits and other personal property, for everything which Burr's creditors could seize was tied up by legal processes in the Virginia and Ohio courts. Although property amounting to many thousands of dollars was wasted or destroyed, Blennerhassett seems to have met every legal obligation in an honorable way, and after a delay of six years Mr. Woodbridge was permitted to pay him the balance, $330.20, due him on goods.

In a letter to David Putnam, dated "St. Catharines near Natchez, July 15, 1808," Blennerhassett gives many directions about the sale of his property and especially of the island which he offers "for 30 prime hands, allowing two boys or girls not under 13 to go for a hand."

Of his own work he reports, "With a force of but 8 or 9 hands in the field and with an overseer on a farm I rent for $300 my cotton crop will fetch me $2200. A negro bought here will clear himself in two years."

From a long list of articles bought at public sale for Robert Miller, one of Burr's creditors, we select the following items:

6	Alphabetic charts	2	00
2	Caneiro glasses	2	00
1	Barometer	3	00
1	Baronoscope	10	00
1	Chisoleme	50	00
1	Quadrant	15	00
1	Case of instruments	6	00
7	Vols. Repertory of arts	4	00
1	Laurel	2	75
1	Decorative	6
1	Doz. wine glasses	75
1	Decorative	1	00
2	Goblets	1	00

Mr. Miller had previously given directions from his home in Kentucky to bid on such articles as could conveniently be brought down the river but not to offer more than half the real value.

In Blennerhassett's letters, written after the tragedy that robbed him of his beautiful home, there is no trace of bitterness. Even the scoundrel who had betrayed him and then "subtracted himself," is dismissed with a single line. How carefully, too, he protected the reputation of his Marietta friends, who for years had known him as a neighbor yet had no knowledge of any scheme for seizing Spanish territory!

That Blennerhassett had formed no political plot with the citizens of Marietta to promote disunion is evident from the fact that among his most intimate friends and business associates were many ardent Jeffersonian Republicans. It is true that, as he himself admitted, he did publish in the Ohio Gazette, a Marietta newspaper, "a series of short essays calling the attention of the people of the Western Country to a subject that might engage their interest * * * setting forth motives of right and expediency which should induce the country west of the mountains to seek a separation from the Atlantic States in a peaceable and constitutional manner." These articles were answered by "Regulus," who denounced the thought of separation and defended the administration of Jefferson. "Regulus" was the Jared Mansfield already mentioned as the successor of General Putnam in the office of surveyor general.

Neither Federalists nor Republicans of Marietta had at any time the least sympathy with disunion.

That Burr was at one time engaged in plots illegal, if not treasonable, is probable. One can easily believe such charges when preferred against the first great Tammany boss and the murderer of Hamilton. Yet even he was not proved guilty in the United States court. Against his victim, Harman Blennerhassett, not one word of the charges uttered under the authority of an administration noted for its sonorous proclamations, has been substantiated. All that can be truthfully said is that he risked his fortune in a wild speculation and in the venture lost.

LOCAL QUESTIONS CEASE TO BE THE POINT OF DIFFERENCE BETWEEN POLITICAL PARTIES.

The point of division between political parties in this county for the period between 1803 and 1812 turned from local to international questions. The Napoleonic wars awakened the interest of all Americans and men were divided into two parties, one of which admired Napoleon while the other feared and hated him.

The veterans who had spent the best years of their youth in resisting the aggressions of the Tories of England and the prime of their manhood in erecting a bulwark against English armies in the West, resented the imputation of being Tories, but they were filled with horror at the atrocities committed by a Corsican savage who had ruined France in his ruthless efforts to reduce all Europe to his despotic sway. It is not strange that the patriots who had fought to establish a free country would sympathize with the power that had struggled to liberate Portugal, Spain and Germany, rather than with the tyrant who had crushed out liberty in Holland and Switzerland and deluged Europe in blood, yet they recognized that both France and England had in their struggle committed many outrages upon our neutral commerce.

Both had violated international law in many ways with an arrogance which no self-respecting power would now tolerate. We had abundant cause for war with France and England at any time between 1804 and 1812, but the Federalists and Republicans could not agree which score should be settled first. We could not very well fight them both at the same time. The Federalists said, "France is our worst enemy;" the Republicans said, "England is doing us the greatest mischief," and the fact that England had so recently been holding a part of our State and inciting the savages to hostility made the people of Ohio believe that the Republicans were right.

The Western Spectator, a Federalist paper, in its "Carriers' New Year's Address" has this to say of Napoleon:

The Gallic leopard rules alone,
And nations crouch beneath his throne,
We come, O France, commerce plies her art,
And independence oaths her share,
Poles, Germans, Prussians, kiss the rod,
E'en Austria dreads the tyrant's nod.

Italia fawns beneath his throne,
Europe, Russians, tremble at his frown,
Where treason waits the Saxon's nod,
And midst his cliffs found sure abode,
The blood-stained Gallic eagles rise,
And liberty and virtue dies!

When war with England was threatened in 1812 the Western Spectator finds fault with the administration for not sooner arming against France, but it finds no excuse for the aggressions and outrages committed by England, and as early as May of that year gives the following news:

"The corps of volunteers, which assembled at Zanesville under the command of Colonel Cass, arrived at this place on Saturday last and were saluted by the discharge of cannon. They were joined by Colonel Sharp with the volunteers from this county, and the whole, amounting to about 250, took their departure the next morning."

On the Fourth of July, 1812, the Spectator issued this "manifesto:"

"As war is declared, we must necessarily wish success to the army of our own country; of that country in whose welfare is embarked the welfare of all we hold dear in the world. But a state of war is the last situation in which we will be induced to be silent on the acts of an administration which we deem unfit to manage the concerns of our country."

In another column appears the following:

Federal managers are desired to be cautious, while residing in Marietta, of speaking disrespectfully of Poor Madison and his Cabinet, as it is reported that the Governor of the State of Ohio, on the evening of the rejoicing for the war, gave out as his opinion that a coat of Tar and Feathers ought to be given to all those who sport an opinion derogatory to volunteering or who shall venture to repeat Jno. Randolph's assertion in Congress, that the present war was an evidence of French influence. No doubt the Governor's understrappers will profit by the hint, and we understand the price of Tar and live geese feathers is advancing, in consequence of the prospect of a great consumption.

Again the editor says, "We detest the wrongs of Britain, but fear above all things an alliance with France."

A few weeks later the editor said: "A great number of groundless reports against the Federalists are circulated in this county. Every good man should repel them."

In August these lines were quoted with evident approval:

Tom Jefferson next unknown servant of France)
As American's Ruler did proudly advance;
With ambition and treachery seated the throne
Where his base disposition was presently known.
Your Navy was sold, Embargoes were laid,
Your money by millions to Napoleon conveyed:
No commerce allowed, your produce must rot,
You must obey Bonaparte, let it suit you or not.

We give below some other extracts from the same paper showing the popular feeling at different dates:

July 25, 1812.

On Monday last the militia of the regiment in this county were assembled in Marietta, by request of Brigadier-General Tupper, for the purpose of obtaining volunteers to supply our quota of the 5,000 militia to be detached from this State. There is no doubt that a sufficient number were disposed to offer their services, but were prevented by the influence of certain (not Federalists, by the bye). It was industriously circulated that as more Democrats than others would go, it would be improper to encourage volunteering; probably on account of the October elections. In this manner, for sheer party purposes, has the patriotism of our citizens, particularly of Grandview, been repressed, and the draft, which may call into the field those upon whom their families depend for daily subsistence, must be substituted in place of volunteering, by which more than a sufficient number could have been raised of persons whose circumstances do not render the leaving of their homes inconvenient. Times are changing. We have been told that the Governor, when attempting to raise volunteers in April, declared those who discouraged the good work to be no better than the Tories of the Revolution.

September 5, 1812.

Members of the Ohio Volunteers have passed this place on their way home. They are all inclined to stigmatize General Hull as a traitor. We will wait for his defense, if he has any.

September 8, 1812.

At a meeting of the citizens of Marietta and its vicinity spontaneously assembled at the Court House on Monday the 2nd of September, 1812, by reason of the recent arrival of intelligence that the Northwestern Army had surrendered—and for the purpose of considering of the course proper to be pursued in relation to that event.

Gen. Joseph Wilcox was chosen chairman and Levi Barber, clerk. A committee consisting of William Woodbridge, Robert Williamson, Samuel P. Hildreth, Caleb Anderson, Alexander Hill and Levi Barber, reported that in their opinion there was little danger that the enemy would invade the interior of our State. Yet urged the formation of volunteer companies, even of those beyond the military age. They also deplored the lack of firearms and recommend a thorough inspection of all that were to be found. They reported that there were not in or about Marietta one-half the number of muskets or other firearms requisite for the equipment of those citizens capable of using them.

In September, 1812, the candidates for the October election were thus reported:

PEACE TICKET.	Representatives.	WAR TICKET.
William R. Putnam		Sardine Stone
Moses Hewitt	Sheriff.	Jehiel Gregory
Joseph Barker	Clerk.	Timothy Buell
Nathaniel Dodge		Alexander Hill

In April, 1813, the Western Spectator was discontinued and in its place appeared the American Friend, an earnest advocate for a vigorous prosecution of the war against England. The first editor, David Everett, who had already won some reputation as an editor in Boston, intended to write a "History of the Present War," but before the end of that war death had closed his earthly labors.

The political history for the next few years can best be given in the form of extracts from the American Friend.

In May, 1813, there appears a poem signed by C—— on "The Times." The editor explains that the lines on slavery have been omitted from this poem because "The American Friend has subscribers in two neighboring States."

A "Back Woods Man" vents his spite on the people of Boston on account of their opposition to the war with England. He is especially bitter against the clergy. His article begins with what he calls a "Russian" adage, but it makes plain English to one who reads it backwards: "Snoiton ollufera; sklofn O Tsob!"

At a meeting of "Republican delegates from the different townships" held at Marietta September 20, 1813, it was resolved that "at the present crisis, when our country is beset by the savages of the forest and by the civilized savages of Great Britain, it becomes the imperious duty of every good citizen to exert himself." William Woodbridge was nominated for State Senator; Sardine Stone and Elijah Hatch for Representatives. John Sharp was president of the convention and S. P. Hildreth, secretary. The candidates nominated were all elected.

February 21, 1815—

GENERAL POSTOFFICE.

February 14, 1815.

Treaty of peace was signed at Ghent on the 24th of December. Signed by the Prince Regent on the 30th and arrived here this day.

In haste,
R. J. MILES.

In 1815 the "Republican citizens of Marietta" were invited to meet and make arrangements for celebrating the Fourth of July. Joseph Holden, Levi Barber, J. B. Regnier, S. P. Hildreth and R. C. Barton were the committee of arrangements. Oration by D. H. Buell. Dinner was served at the house of John Brough, where Joseph Wood presided. The toasts were distinctly "Republican" in the partisan sense, but number fifteen in the list revealed the new condition which was soon to cause a new alignment of parties:

From the Manufacturers—Let not the strong arm of ingenuity and industry relax at the sound of Peace, but let us rather strive to double our resources against a future day of adversity.

At a meeting of Republican delegates convened at the Court House, September 9, 1815, the following gentlemen were nominated:

Commissioner, William Skinner.
Senator, John Sharp.
Representatives, Henry Jolly, Robert Linzee.

The Federal candidates were:

Commissioner, Caleb Emerson.
Senator, William R. Putnam.
Representatives, Joseph Barker, Alvin Bingham.

The Republican ticket was elected by a large majority.

The American Friend of 1815 has much to say about the "genius, generosity and renown" of Napoleon and seemed to lament his downfall.

American Friend, 1817—

The Fourth of July will be celebrated in this town. Republican citizens, generally, are requested to attend in front of the Court House on said day, at ten o'clock, when a procession will be formed, and conducted to the Methodist Meeting House, where the ceremonies will be performed; from thence they will proceed to a Bower on the plain, where a dinner will be prepared.

There was a toast to "James Monroe, our next president"—not then elected—and the following to General Jackson: "While the God of Rivers continues to roll its floods to the Atlantic, the gallant Jackson and the 8th of January, 1815, will be remembered and cherished by the Democratic citizens of the United States."

In August, 1817, many columns of the American Friend are taken up in charges of exclusively cruel actions committed by one Oliver H. Perry, of whom we have all heard something in our school histories. These charges sound very much like the report of a senatorial committee on the Philippines.

THE ERA OF GOOD FEELING.

In 1817 the "Era of Good Feeling" seems to have reached Marietta in advance of the date usually assigned by historians, for the invitation to celebrate the Fourth of July is extended to the "citizens of Marietta" and there is no restriction of party lines.

In the American Friend for July 11, 1817, it is announced that President Monroe had arrived in Springfield, Massachusetts, and that "great preparations have been made for his reception at the patriotic town of Boston," that "the Blue Lights have been extinguished and party spirit laid aside," and that "more unanimity will be expended in this quarter on this occasion than there was during the whole war."

"Seneca" in the same paper calls attention to the change which had taken place in public sentiment as shown in the toasts on the last Fourth of July. It is no longer "Free Trade and Sailors' Rights" but "Domestic Improvements and Manufactures." He complains that the short war of 1812-14 had so demoralized the county that more robberies and murders had been committed in the three years past than in 20 years before.

"Seneca," by the way, was a resident of Virginia, and a few weeks later he paid his respects to his own State in this fashion: "It is a fact no less strange than true, that nearly two-thirds of her white male population have no share, either in the administration of her government, or in the election of officers." Strangely enough he dates his letter from West Virginia.

In the fall of 1817 a "Friend to Order" warns the Republicans against the "disorganizing Jacobins" who are seeking to run an independent ticket and divide the party. The appeal has a very modern sound. The "disorganizers" seem to have had their own way, for there were four tickets in the field with former Jeffersonian Republicans and Hamiltonian Federalists mixed up. One ticket, having William Skinner for Senator, Col. Joseph Barker for Representative and Daniel Goodno for Commissioner, is preceded by this announcement, probably written by Nahum Ward: "Be it known to all Jacobins and Blue-lights whether of Federal origin or Democratic origin, that their day is past and gone—the sword of party is sheathed." This ticket was not elected but a selection from the other three. Mr. Skinner announced before the election that his name had been published without his permission and that he was not a candidate. Colonel Barker also made a similar announcement.

February 21, 1818, a meeting was held in the Court House to express an opinion about the recent increase of compensation of Congressmen, which had been fixed at $8 a day and $8 for every 20 miles of travel. A vote of thanks was given to William Henry Harrison and Samuel Herrick for having opposed the measure.

In August of that year all legal voters were requested to meet in their respective townships and select delegates to a nominating convention and in the ensuing nominations Federal and Republican lines seemed to be broken up.

NEW QUESTIONS.

On the fifth of July (since the fourth came on Sunday), 1819, resolutions were passed expressing the hope that party might soon die and be forgotten, that domestic manufactures might be encouraged, and that there might be no more Slave States. New questions were coming fast.

In 1819, when there was some discussion about holding a convention to make a new Constitution, some people in this county were afraid such a convention would adopt slavery. One who was opposed to calling a convention said: "If the Constitution should be changed, there will be a strenuous effort to prevent a prohibition of slavery. Those who have lived near the Slave States must be both deaf and blind, if they have not heard and seen, that this is confidently expected. We know that our legislative body is composed of at least one-fourth Virginians. It would be next to madness to believe, at such a time, there is no danger of trusting the Constitution out of our own hands."

In the ensuing election 26 votes in this county were cast in favor of a constitutional convention, and 880 against it. Although there were many objections to the proposed revision of the State Constitution, the fear that slavery might be permitted in Ohio caused the vote in this county to be almost unanimous against the calling of a constitutional convention. From this time the discussion against slavery is bold and aggressive, especially on the part of those who had formerly been Federalists. In 1820, when threats of disunion had been made by a few men in the South, a writer in the American Friend gives them this warning:

"If you intend to beguile the good people of Ohio, and the other Western States, to join in your unhallowed attempt to dissolve the Union, and establish slavery on a still broader basis, you will be woefully mistaken! For rest assured that the Western States understand the value of liberty too well to aid or assist in depriving others of that invaluable inheritance. If a dissolution of the Union (which we deprecate) is to take place, let it be on the principles of the Friends of Liberty or the Friends of Slavery—we belong to the former; wherever her standard floats there ours shall wave."

On the Fourth of July this toast was offered at the celebration in Marietta:

"May the Union of the United States be maintained, and the principles of liberty and independence, that all men are created equal."

In 1819 the Legislature of Ohio passed what has since been known as the "Crow Bar Law," levying a tax of $50,000 on each branch of the United States Bank doing business in Ohio, and authorizing the Auditor of State to go into each room or vault of such banking house and seize the money necessary to pay the tax. Acting on this law, the collectors for the Auditor entered the branch of the United States Bank at Chillicothe and seized $100,000 in specie and bank notes. This act of nullification was greatly resented in some other States but the American Friend thus justifies it:

"It is with the deepest regret that we observe a rancorous and persecuting spirit evinced in the Eastern prints against our State for having presumed to carry into effect the law of the last Legislature, levying a tax on the branches of the United States Bank at Chillicothe and Cincinnati. Ohio presumes she knows her rights. An aristocracy has been introduced among her Republican institutions—she has required a tribute from it—and the Eastern editors have raised the hue and cry against her, because she has resisted the rapid strides and destructive effects of this mammoth institution. The people are the proper and only tribunal to decide whether an institution leading to oppression and tyranny is agreeable to our Constitution or not."

At the Fourth of July celebration held in Marietta in 1821, among the toasts were the following:

"May the Union of the United States be maintained, and by discouraging the consumption of foreign fabrics, and by the promotion of improvements so desirable."

About this time the word "Dough Face" appears as a nickname of those Northern men who were supposed to be subservient to the slaveholders.

At the banquet on the Fourth of July 1821, "only domestic productions" were offered the guests, and among the toasts were these:

"May the Union of the United States be maintained, and by the promotion of improvements so desirable."

On the same day, at the house of S. D. Buell, in Adams township, more than a hundred guests were served at tables "loaded with a magnificent profusion and extensive variety of articles of domestic origin." After an address by Cyrus Spooner many toasts were drunk, one of which was prophetic:

Slavery—Its origin is in barbarism. In its effects on the United States, pernicious as "the pestilence that walketh at noonday." Let the lovers of "equal and exact justice" to all men be active in abolishing the degrading practice.

Sentiments of similar import, but milder in form, were also expressed on that day at a celebration held in District No. 5 of Fearing township where Joel Tuttle was the orator.

In January, 1822, Representative Buell and eight others voted for an examination into the practicability of connecting Lake Erie with the Ohio, but there were 59 votes in the Ohio House of Representatives against the motion.

These extracts show that the memories of a war that had ended ten years before both in America and Europe could no longer serve as a dividing line for parties. Those who hated Napoleon and those who worshipped might heartily agree on questions of currency, tariff, internal improvements and slavery. From 1824 onward the political thought of Washington County blended with the stream of national interests. Only a few incidents more demand special mention on account of local interests and they will be discussed in the following chapter.

CHAPTER VI.

POLITICS FROM 1820 TO 1860.

DEMOCRATS AND WHIGS.

As we have said in the last chapter on politics, in the period of which 1820 may well be considered the central point, following the "Era of Good Feeling," and the obliteration of old party lines, there was a new parting of the ways. After this time, we see men who had worked together since the early years of the century grouped in two rival camps. The policy of a national bank and a protective tariff was now dividing former political friends; but, as the discussion of these questions had little or no local color, they need in a county history only brief mention. The question of internal improvements also attracted the attention of the people in this region, at that time so far from the markets of the world. Our citizens were especially interested in the improvement of the Ohio River by the national government. At times we find that public-spirited citizens of Washington County have undertaken at their own expense to improve the facilities for navigation in the Ohio, and especially to remove obstructions from the channel between Kerr's Island and the Ohio shore. But it was felt that this highway of the nation, which flowed by so many different States, should properly be cared for by the central authorities, which had the control of the commercial relations.

In State politics, the question of the improvement of navigation in the Muskingum was long a very important one, and it was only through an agitation continued for about 20 years that anything important was accomplished. In the discussion of this question there was frequent evidence that the embers of the old strife between the citizens on the Muskingum and the Scioto was not entirely dead, and that a little breath of sectional partisanship could fan them into a blaze.

In the new division of parties new names appeared. The Jeffersonian or Democratic Republicans, as they were called for the first two or three decades of the century, began in the time of President Jackson to be known as the Democratic party, or as the "friends of Jackson." Those, who in 1825-56, had been known as the "Friends of the Administration," that is, of John Quincy Adams, began under the leadership of Henry Clay to be known as National Republicans, and after 1834 they called themselves Whigs as a protest against what they considered the arbitrary acts of President Jackson.

The temperance question first appeared as a moral movement to persuade men to avoid drunkenness, next as a plea for total abstinence, and later as an effort to restrain or prohibit entirely the traffic in intoxicating liquors. Opposition to freemasonry resulted in the formation, in 1832, of the Anti-Masonic Society of Waterford, which endeavored to wield a political influence.

SLAVERY.

The friends of each of the questions struggled to make their favorite the paramount issue. But in 1840 another question appeared, not as a little cloud, but sounded as a peal of thunder in a clear sky, with a crash so sharp and discordant that it frightened the venerable Jefferson in his retirement. Long before the tempest burst upon us in its fury, the sky continued to flash, and the earth rumbled and trembled, with the approach of the impending storm. In vain the optimist in his love for the Union strove to convince the people that the slavery question could not lead to disunion or civil war; the great question would come up for a settlement.

There were two reasons why the majority of the people in Washington County for many years deprecated strife or even discussion about slavery. The pioneers were nearly all soldiers of the Revolution who had fought side by side with their brethren from the South, and under their beloved commander, Washington, who was himself a slave-owner. Again, ere the majority of these pioneers had passed away, a second war with England brought the enemy within the borders of our own State and many of the soldiers who drove the invaders back to Canada, were volunteers from Virginia, Kentucky and Tennessee.

It seems to be evident that until about 1854 a large majority of the people in this county was opposed to slavery agitation, not because they were in favor of slavery, for by their votes and acts they had shown the contrary and had especially shown that they would not permit its extension into Ohio; yet they looked upon the question as settled by constitutional compromise which they were in honor bound to respect. But at all times there was a minority, small but steadily increasing as the years went on, conscientiously opposed to slavery in any part of our Union. They were earnestly in favor of free soil, free men and in the advocacy of their opinions they demanded free speech. They showed their opposition to the peculiar institution, which after 1820 was practically restricted to the Southern States, by speaking and writing to arouse public sentiment. This agitation caused on the southern side of the Ohio a nervousness which finally changed to a feeling of resentment. Good men in Virginia felt that this agitation was imperiling not only their property but even the lives of their families. Believing themselves threatened with such serious evils, through what they considered as the unjustifiable interference of people from other States, they sometimes resorted to means of repression which would hardly bear the test of a legal examination. Perhaps, they believed that self-protection was the highest law. They determined to keep all incendiary publications and speakers outside of their borders.

Within 40 miles of Marietta there lives an elderly gentleman in a respectable community of what is now West Virginia, who saw a party of his neighbors, a few years before the Civil War, take his copy of the New York Tribune from the post office and with noisy demonstration put it in a bonfire, which they had kindled before his house. A club of young men of Wheeling, Virginia, about the same time, were receiving their Tribunes from the Bridgeport post office because they could not get them from their own office in Wheeling. For more than 20 years before the war John Stone, of Belpre, dared not go far beyond the south bank of the Ohio, lest he be arrested on account of his anti-slavery agitation, and at one time in those ante-bellum days, Mr. Burgess, a passenger on an Ohio River packet, a short distance below Marietta, was threatened with lynching by his fellow passengers for the crime of expressing anti-slavery sentiments. John Brown's raid to Harper's Ferry intensified this bitterness of feeling.

Unfortunately at that time there was at the head of affairs in Virginia one, of whom George D. Prentiss, of Louisville, has said, "The tallest man I ever knew was called Short, and the largest one was Small, and the Governor of Virginia is called Wise." This Governor, who was "called Wise" (Henry A. Wise), had a section of artillery planted on the bank at Parkersburg to threaten any invaders from Ohio. The good people of Belpre, not to be outdone by this wise Governor, in a display of patriotic fervor, prepared to defend their own shores from the fire-eating forces and confronted the artillery with a huge churn mounted upon a cart.

For 20 years or more before the war the agitation of the slavery question had reached the ears of the slaves themselves and some of the more active and venturesome among them began to seek for liberty in Canada.

UNDERGROUND RAILROAD.

Joseph Smith, of Vincent, estimated that there passed through Washington County on their way to liberty, between 1850 and 1860, about 600 fugitives. Some of these came from the Cotton States, but the majority were from Virginia and Kentucky. These fugitives went northward from the Ohio River by what was popularly known as the "Underground Railroad"—a railway which future historians can never accurately trace, for its tracks were as devious and numerous as the by-roads of Washington County. The means of transportation were as varied as the routes, but they were all used with the same end in view—the rescuing and concealment of the fugitives, the circumventing and discomfiture of the pursuers. Men yet live in our county who in their boyhood took part in those exciting scenes, and they tell many amusing stories of their experiences.

Sometimes the fugitives passed from David

Putnam's house in Harmar to Mr. Ridgway's at Rainbow, and thence through Salem to the Palmers; but more frequently they crossed the river to Belpre township and thence northward through the western townships, where friends of the fugitives were very numerous. It is now impossible to name a tithe of those who were ready to receive the wanderers. In conveying the fugitives northward, no uniform method was followed. Sometimes it was found expedient to keep the fugitives in concealment for many days or even weeks near one place, while the pursuers were wasting their time and energy in going farther northward.

B. B. Stone relates that at one time some fugitives were concealed for a time on the Virginia side, opposite Belpre, and that one of his sisters, since the crossing by one of the men might create suspicion, had crossed the river to Virginia and taken a supply of food to the fugitives. Sometimes the one who had received and concealed the fugitives would himself convey them to the next "station," but a safer way, and one probably more frequently followed, was to conceal the fugitives in some convenient place and then to send word to some friends 10 or 15 miles away, to come and get them by night. Mr. Stone says that he has been sent on such an errand in his boyhood to tell Bert Hibbert that some fugitives were concealed in a certain field belonging to Mr. McKay.

Maj. Jewett Palmer tells how he had been sent when a boy to feed a fugitive, concealed in the woods near his father's house and that this was his first sight of a negro.

The greater mass of the people regarded these escapades as something amusing with which they had little or no concern, but there were a few people in the county who fancied it was their duty to help the pursuers, and it was the great delight of the managers of the Underground Railroad to bring these spies, as they regarded them, to grief and mortification.

A story is told of some boys in Salem township, whose names can not be recalled at this late date, but Moses Blake and Thomas Porter are said to have been among them, who prepared a plan for the especial benefit of one of their neighbors, who had made himself obnoxious by aiding the pursuers. Some of the boys went to this Southern sympathizer and told him that a reward had been offered for the apprehension of three negroes who had recently escaped from Virginia; that these slaves were concealed in the township and that if he would take his team they would help him to catch them and take them to Marietta and share with him the reward. He readily assented and went with the boys who soon found the supposed fugitives, who happened to be three of their own companions with faces blackened for the occasion, and easily caught them, put them in the wagon and started to Marietta. Pretty soon one of the fugitives leaped from the wagon and disappeared in the woods, then another followed his example. In his desperation the slave catcher called to his supposed helpers, "Hold on to the little one, he'll pay expenses." But even the little one with his captors soon disappeared in the woods and the slave hunter was obliged to go home without his expected reward. For a long time the saying, "Hold on to the little one, he'll pay expenses," was heard among the boys of Salem township.

At one time a Mr. Brown who lived not far from Amesville had some fugitives concealed on his farm. The pursuers came in the evening and were kindly received by Mr. Brown, and their horses well cared for in his commodious stable. Before the guests retired for the night, they were warned by Mr. Brown not to go out of the house at night without calling him, as a savage dog might attack them. Late at night the boys of the family took the horses of the pursuers out of the stable and used them to convey the fugitives 15 miles from the place. Before daylight they returned and left the horses in the stable. At another time, when one who had concealed a fugitive near his house learned that a spy was observing his movements, he took the fugitive in daylight from his place of concealment and took him to a tobacco house. The spy observed this and soon his horse could be heard galloping away to bear the news to the pursuers. At once the negro was taken from his hiding place in the tobacco house and conveyed to another station. Soon the spy returned with the pursuers who went in the tobacco house but found nothing more than a volume of smoke, for the fires had again been lighted. The sequel to the story is that the pursuers after that regarded the spy as a traitor to their cause and unworthy of further confidence.

James Lawton, William S. Heald, Jonathan Lee, Thomas B. Hibbard and many of the families of the Smiths took part in helping away the fugitives.

On Putnam street in Marietta lives Mrs. John Eells, who many years ago in Oberlin entertained Lewis Clark, the original of Mrs. Stowe's George Harris in her celebrated novel, "Uncle Tom's Cabin." Mr. Clark's sister was also the original of Eliza. Mrs. Eells relates that she and her husband supplied Lewis Clark with provisions for a trip to Kentucky, whence he conducted his brother to freedom. Mrs. Stowe afterward met Lewis near Boston and there gathered from his lips many of the incidents which were woven into her story. His stormy life is now ended, but before its close he had an opportunity to greet in Marietta his two friends, Mr. and Mrs. Eells, and to thank them for their kindness to a needy wanderer. He lived to see the day when the slave-driver's whip was no longer feared on the banks of the Ohio.

The old homestead of Mr. Ridgway, a convenient station for fugitives coming into Ohio by way of Harmar or Marietta, stood near the Rainbow Ferry. It was torn down five or six years ago. In this house there was a large basement and back of it a "blind" cellar which served as a very useful place of concealment for fugitives when the pursuers were close at hand, since the opening to this cellar could be closed in such a way as easily to escape discovery. There is a tradition that at one time five fugitives were here concealed, one of them being a very young child, and Mr. Ridgway feared that its crying might reveal the hiding place. In the early evening, by design or accident, some of the neighbors had gathered in the basement for a prayer meeting; while they were thus assembled, the pursuers came and asked permission to search for fugitives, a permission which Mr. Ridgway promptly gave, but requested them not to disturb the prayer meeting. It is said that while the pursuers were thus searching, the singing was very loud and demonstrative, but it was wholly unnecessary, for the child did not reveal by any sound the place of concealment. Mr. Ridgway's neighbor, Benjamin F. Dyar, who lived on the east side of the Muskingum, often joined in the work of helping away the fugitives.

Between the Free Soiler who regarded liberty as the inalienable right of every man, whether black or white, and the Southern planter who regarded the slave as his property assured to him by constitution and law, it was difficult to find any room for compromise. The conflict was indeed irrepressible.

The climax in the strife between the slave hunters and the Free Soilers came on the night of July 9, 1845, when three citizens of Decatur township, Peter M. Garner, Creighton J. Loraine and Mordecai E. Thomas, were seized on the Ohio side of the river near Hall's Landing for the crime of assisting some fugitive slaves, who had escaped from Virginia. The three prisoners were taken to Parkersburg and lodged in jail. Bail was refused them. They were tried in Virginia for an alleged offense committed in Ohio. It was natural that the people of Washington County of every political faith should be indignant at this outrage committed upon citizens of Ohio, within her own boundaries. At one time, it is said, that the Governor of Ohio actually contemplated an armed rescue of the prisoners, but better counsels prevailed. Samuel F. Vinton was sent from Ohio to argue the question of jurisdiction. His argument, reported in Volume 4 of the Ohio Archaeological and Historical Society, proves beyond reasonable doubt, not only that the arrest of the prisoners on the north bank of the Ohio was a high-handed outrage, but also establishes the right of Ohio to the territory as far as the middle of the channel of the river. Virginia's absurd claim to the whole of the Ohio River, a claim contradicted by the best authorities in international law, was in danger of being successfully disputed. The authorities in Virginia were unwilling to have the question of territorial jurisdiction again brought before the United States court. They were, therefore, glad to release the prisoners in January, 1846, on bail, the bondsman being a man from Ohio, and so the case never came up for final settlement. The details of the story are told in the extracts from the newspapers of the time, appearing at the end of this chapter.

CAMPAIGN OF 1840.

The contest between the Whig and Democratic parties on the questions of tariff and currency reached a picturesque climax in the great campaign of 1840—a campaign which elderly men still recall as one of the great events in their lives. It is said that on the 22nd of February, 1840, 20,000 people assembled at Columbus, at the Whig Convention, when Harrison and Tyler were accepted as the standard bearers of the Presidential ticket, and Thomas Corwin nominated as candidate for Governor. A delegation of more than 50 went to Columbus from Washington County. The whole summer and fall was busy with the excitement of the political campaign. There were great meetings, with speeches and singing, and free dinners at Marietta, at Beverly, on the Little Muskingum, at Newport, and probably at other places. Thomas Corwin, the "Wagoner Boy," as he was called, was the star orator of the Whigs, and John Brough, or "Jack," as he was familiarly styled, formerly of Marietta, was the leader on the Democratic side.

A canvas ball 13 feet in diameter, carried on a four-horse wagon, came through Marietta from Dresden, where it had been built, and was sent on its journey to Nashville, Tennessee, in charge of Capt. Horatio Booth, George M. Woodbridge and Joseph Hunter, who were appointed a committee on the part of the Washington County Whigs to take the ball to Cincinnati by river. The water being very low, they mounted the ball on the "Ferry Flat" and starting at daylight succeeded in reaching Parkersburg by noon. Here they found the side-wheel steamboat "Boston," which being unable to get farther up the river because of the low water was about returning down the river. The captain, being an ardent Whig, begged the privilege of towing them to Cincinnati. His proposition they gladly accepted and they were treated royally by the captain and crew. Everything was free to them that the boat could furnish.

On their arrival at Cincinnati, they were met by what seemed to be the whole population of the city. The levee was black with people. A committee was on hand to receive the ball and also one to meet and entertain them. They were taken to the Broadway Hotel, then the chief hostelry of the city, and were entertained there free of charge during their stay. They were taken to General Harrison's rooms and introduced to him. He seemed very cordial but seemed weak and almost sick from the worry and work of the campaign.

A crowd of enthusiastic Whigs embarked on a steamboat to attend a meeting at Chester in Meigs County. It is said that the boat stuck on a bar, but the passengers leaped out into the shallow water and helped the boat over the obstruction.

The campaign resulted as we know in a victory for the Whigs, but a barren victory it proved, since General Harrison died a few weeks after his inauguration and Vice-President Tyler succeeded to his place. In a county history it is unnecessary to pursue further the history of the struggle between these two great parties. About the middle of the decade before the Civil War, Washington County in common with all other parts of the country had her grotesque experience with the "Native Americans," or, as they were more commonly called, "Know Nothings," or the "Dark Lantern" party. Its short-lived existence, which for a little while seemed to threaten us with a renewal of the old-time conflicts between churches and races, fortunately lasted for so short a time, that its whole history partakes more of the grotesque and comic than of the tragic.

The writer distinctly remembers an incident which shows how easy it is to be frightened about nothing. At a little Catholic cemetery, the Irish laborers had recently buried one of their comrades; somehow, the story was whispered about that the burial was a humbug and that the real errand of the supposed mourners was to convey a lot of arms and conceal them at the chapel. It required the interference of some of the cooler heads to prevent the excited neighbors from making a raid to discover the concealed arsenal. On the other side, the excitement was equally as great and quite as unreasonable. A quiet, industrious German farmer, a Catholic from Bavaria, was so frightened by the reports of the Know Nothings that he procured from a blacksmith huge bars of iron to barricade his doors and protect himself and his family from the midnight attacks of the Know Nothing lodge. The unreasoning hates and fears of those times very quickly passed away and German and American Catholics and Protestant boys of Washington County were found enlisted under the same banner in defense of a common country. From that time onward, the political history of Washington County has little in it that is peculiar or local. It is blended with the great stream of national life.

NEWSPAPER EXTRACTS PERTAINING TO THE POLITICS OF THE PERIOD.

(Chiefly from the American Friend, Marietta Gazette and Marietta Intelligencer.)

CIRCULAR.

August 7, 1820.

At a meeting of the citizens of the county, friendly to Internal Improvements and Domestic Industry, at the Court House in Marietta, on the 4th of August instant, the undersigned were appointed a committee to correspond with the several townships in the county on the subject of the approaching election, and to request those citizens who are friendly to Internal Improvements, &c., to convene at an early period, and appoint two delegates to meet in convention at the Court House in Marietta, on the 28th day of August, at one o'clock, P. M., to nominate suitable persons for candidates at the next October election. The officers to be selected are one governor, one representative in Congress, one representative in the State Legislature, one sheriff, one commissioner, and one coroner.

ROYAL PRENTISS,
S. P. HILDRETH,
LEVI BARBER.

P. S.—The committee would suggest to the several townships that Saturday, preceding the meeting of the convention, will be a suitable time for the choice of delegates.

ADMINISTRATION MEETING.

November 23, 1827.

At a meeting of the citizens of Washington county, Ohio, friendly to the present Administration, held at the Court House in Marietta, agreeably to present notice, on Thursday the 22d. instant, for the purpose of electing delegates to a convention to be held at Columbus, for the formation of an electoral ticket for the State, &c, David Putnam, Esq., was appointed chairman, and A. T. Nye, secretary.

Whereupon William R. Putnam, Arius Nye, Samuel P. Hildreth, David Putnam, John Cotton and Joseph Barker, Jr., were appointed delegates to represent the friends of the administration in this county, in the proposed convention.

By order of the meeting.

A. T. NYE, Secretary.

CELEBRATION OF THE VICTORY OF NEW ORLEANS, IN MARIETTA.

1828.

The Jacksonian Committee of Arrangements give this general invitation to all persons in Washington and the adjoining counties, who are friendly to General Jackson, and the victory gained by him over the British at New Orleans, and who may please to assemble at the New Court House, on the 8th day of January next, at 10 o'clock A. M. for the purpose of celebrating said day. An address will be delivered on the occasion by Doct. Morris German, and a Dinner provided; with the necessary seasoning, &c.—Free of Expense.

FOURTH OF JULY CELEBRATION IN MARIETTA.

"The anniversary of our National Independence was yesterday celebrated in this town in a spirited and patriotic manner. The day was ushered in by the discharge of cannon, ringing of the bell, etc. At half past 11, a procession was formed near the Court House, under the direction of Capt. Billy Todd, and moved to the First Society's Meeting House. The religious exercises were performed by the Rev. Mr. Sweet. The Declaration of Independence was read by William P. Skinner, and an excellent oration was delivered by David Barber. Songs and odes were sung by a choir of singers. After the exercises were over, the procession was again formed as before, and proceeded to a house where a large number partook of a dinner prepared for the occasion. During the day the spirit of party seemed to be forgotten, and our citizens, among whom were a few survivors of the Revolution, appeared to enjoy themselves with a full sense of the great and glorious achievements that the day is calculated to recall to mind.

"After the cloth was removed the following toasts were drank:

1. The Declaration of Independence.—May it be the basis of our political system.
2. The Constitution of the United States:—The ark of our political safety:—May it endure forever.
3. The memory of Washington:—Our Father.
4. The President of the United States.
5. Our Fathers of the Revolution:—May they never be forgotten.
6. The heads of Department.
7. The Governor of the State of Ohio.
8. Domestic Manufactures and Internal Improvements:—The guaranty of national wealth, prosperity and independence.
9. The Great and Good Lafayette.
10. The Baltimore and Ohio Rail Road:—May the wisdom of its Directors so lay down this national belt, as to be the mouth of the Mississippi.
11. The Navy:—The best and purest source of glory, and the admiration of the world.
12. The Army:—Efficient but not headless.
13. The American Fair:—"Our hearts' joy, what'er our sorrows be, They cease and vanish on beholding thee."
14. Volunteers:—By Dr. S. P. Hildreth:—The memory of Hon. R. J. Meigs:—Amongst the first in changing the wilderness into a fruitful field, so was he also the first to defend it from its enemies:—Ohio will long remember him, as one who has reflected lustre on her name, and added not a little to her character and dignity as a State.
15. By Arius Nye, Esq.:—A government of laws:—As we enjoy these, may we know how to preserve them.
16. By George Dana, Esq.:—Honest differences in political opinions:—May they never, in this happy country, be thought incompatible with private friendship.
17. By Mai. Alexander Hill—Henry Clay, Secretary of State:—A patriot and statesman:—His elevated mind scorns bribery, disdains flattery, and spurns the invective threats of his enemies:—He is entitled to the confidence of the American people.

18. By Royal Prentiss—Education:—The surest pledge of national virtue and independence.

19. By Nahum Ward, Esq.—The Presidential contest—South.

It steams, it scalds, we can not bear this furnace! Stand off, and let the Northern wind have way."

20. By Col. Ichabod Nye—The rising generation:—May they protect what the patriots of the Revolution have won.

21. By John Brown—Henry Clay:—The firm patriot and generous Republican—though misrepresented, slandered, persecuted, posterity, at least, will do him justice, and place his name on the brightest page in the list of the immortal worthies of this great Republic.

22. By William Hall—Health to the President, prosperity to the people, and may our Congress direct their endeavors to the public good rather than indulge in party distinctions.

23. By Maj. Jesse Hildebrand—General Washington:—He who changed the name of General Cornwallis to that of Cob-Wallace by shelling the corn off him.

"Several other volunteer toasts were drank which have not been handed in for publication.

"On the evening previous to the 4th, the cannon, which was intended to be used at the celebration, was spiked by a ruffian under the hope that it would be rendered useless for the day—during the night, however, the hole was drilled out—again in the fore part of the day the same villian again spiked the cannon, which was after much labor again drilled out—and due precaution used to prevent another attempt."

"The name of the person who has committed this outrage will hereafter be presented to the public, that he may receive the reward such conduct merits."

ROTATION IN OFFICE.

"In our paper to-day will be seen a long list of appointments and removals by the President; among them is one in our own town—David C. Skinner, Receiver of Public Monies, in the place of John P. Mayberry, removed. This, under the Jackson definition of the term is 'reform,' but we conceive, in this instance, that it is simply a change, as a reward for a friend, and a punishment for exercising the republican freedom of opinion and speech. We know both gentlemen—they are both respected, rich and men of integrity—both could do very well without the office, and both, of course, could do well with it—but the vast difference between them is, that Mr. Skinner advocated the election of Jackson, and Mr. Mayberry opposed it. There is no other ground of complaint. The doctrine of 'rotation in office' will not sound consistently here—for there is also in this place a Register of the Land Office who has held that office for fifteen years or upwards, and he has been re-appointed by Jackson.

"We notice these things to show the consistency of the Jackson hue-and-cry of 'reform,' 'rotation in office,' etc. The gentlemen who formerly held these offices have done well—one has been removed, the other retained, without any cause of complaint against the one—or any extraordinary meritorious acts in the others, save and except that of being a favorite of Jackson.

Saturday, November 21, 1828.

"More Reform! Dr. Morris German, a 'whole hog' Jacksonian, a resident of Point Harmar, Marietta, has been appointed Post Master at Point Harmar, in the place of Col. Levi Barber, punished.

"The cause of this removal is the same as that of other removals that have taken place since the reign of terror commenced. Colonel Barber was a friend to the former administration, on republican principles—of course opposed to the elevation of the General; he was a substantial and consistent Jeffersonian Republican, and therefore did not change his principles. The office which he filled, it is true, was of little consequence to him, but he was faithful in the performance of his duties—no fault had been found by those of his neighbors, in his vicinity, or at a distance—all were satisfied. But he did not throw up his hat and 'huzza for Jackson,' nor did he deliver an oration on the 8th of January—and this is cause sufficient why he should be punished.

"Since the reign of terror commenced, there have been three removals within this small town, and we believe that these are all, excepting the Register of the Land Office, that comes within the power of the General Government, viz.:

"John P. Mayberry, Receiver of Public Monies, to make room for David C. Skinner.

"Daniel H. Buell, Post Master, Marietta, to make room for Aaron V. D. Joline, editor of the Pilot.

"And Levi Barber, Post Master, Point Harmer, to make room for Morris German.

"The Register of the Land Office, in the Marietta Land District, for reasons that were undoubtedly satisfactory to the General, was re-appointed—and this is the only instance in which the people here were satisfied with the exercise of power under the new order of government. Although he came out a Jacksonian, it would have been regretted had he been removed.

"All the gentlemen removed from the offices above named, were old Jeffersonian Republicans—honest and capable—but their firm and undeviating course was not to be passed over lightly—they were marked, and when their turns came, they were punished."

PREPARATIONS FOR THE CONTEST OF 1836.

1836.—

"At a meeting of the citizens of Washington County, opposed to Martin Van Buren and Richard M. Johnson, held pursuant to public notice, at the Court House in Marietta, on Saturday, the 30th ult., at 2 o'clock, P. M., Geo. Dana, Esq., of Belpre, was appointed chairman, and Levi H. Goddard, of Marietta, secretary.

"On motion of Arius Nye, Esq., seconded by Joseph Barker, Jr., Esq., it was

Resolved, That this meeting will appear in delegates to the Whig State Convention, to be holden at Columbus on the 2d of February next.

"The meeting then proceeded to consider the following resolution submitted by Joseph Barker, Jr., Esq., and after remarks thereupon, from various gentlemen present, passed the same by a unanimous vote.

"Resolved, That in the opinion of this meeting Daniel Webster of Massachusetts is a statesman pre-eminent qualified to fill the Presidential chair, and that we would hail his election to that station as an event well calculated to restore the government of the United States to its primitive purity,—and that the delegates from this county be requested to use their utmost efforts to procure his nomination;—but that in case of failure, they may exercise a discretionary power."

About this time a convention at McConnelssville, declared in favor of Gen. William Henry Harrison.

WHIG NOMINATIONS.

WASHINGTON COUNTY DEMOCRATIC MEETING.

1839.—

"Agreeable to publications, a large and respectable meeting of the Democratic citizens of Washington County, was convened, on the 21st inst., at the Court House in Marietta, when Silas Cook was called to the chair, and A. Larzelere appointed secretary. On motion

Resolved, That a committee of five be appointed to draft and report resolutions for the consideration of this meeting.

"A. V. D. Joline, Hugh Hill, C. B. Flood, and Stephen Hildreth, were appointed said committee. On motion,

Resolved, That a delegate from each township be appointed to represent this county in the convention to be held at Columbus on the 8th of January, 1840, for the purpose of settling upon a candidate for the next Governor, and an electoral ticket for the next Presidential election.

"The following persons from their respective townships were appointed: Adams—Andrew Allison; Aurelius,—William S. Royley; Belpre,—A. G. Hollister; Barlow,—Benjamin Palmer; Decatur,—Philip Schroder; Fearing,—John Darling; Grandview,—E. H. Collins; Lawrence,—John Hill; Liberty,—Matthew Gray; Ludlow,—Horace Hallum; Marietta,—A. Humphreys, William Whittlessey, A. V. D. Joline, C. B. Flood J. P. Wightman, E. Gates, A. Larzelere; Newport,—G. W. Gale; Roxbury,—I. A. Palmer; Salem,—James Enis; Union,—George W. Barker; Warren,—J. J. Hollister; Waterford,—Robert Leget; Wesley,—Hapgood Goddard; Watertown,—T. C. McClanathan.

"The committee on resolutions reported the following:

Resolved, That our confidence in the administration of Martin Van Buren remains undiminished, and that in his messages and public acts we see that same devotion to Democracy which led him into the Senate of New York, to defend the administration of James Madison, and the last war, as well as to defend the integrity of Daniel T. Thompson when assailed by his Federal adversaries.

Resolved, That in Col. R. M. Johnson, of Ken-today, we see the well tried soldier and statesman, and friend of the people, and the as presiding officer of the United States Senate, he has, by his kind and conciliatory manners, gained the esteem of all.—His reelection to that station is demanded by the best interests of the Democratic party.

Resolved, That we hail with feelings of pride and pleasure the late message of Governor Shannon—believing that it contains the true doctrine of the Democratic party, and although our adversaries affect to be pleased with his recommendations in regard to bank reform, yet their acts prove this to be mere affectation, for they have, as a party, systematically opposed every message recommended by the Governor.

A NEW SONG FOR AN OLD TUNE.

By J. G. Green.

1849.

Come all ye Whigs of Washington,
And bring your friends along,
And to a good old tune I'll sing
To you another song,
To you another song, my boys,
A word I have to say,
Oh, never split your tickets, boys,
Upon election day.

Our candidate for Governor,
'Tis everywhere allowed,
That of her gifted "wagon boy,"
The Buckeye State is proud.
The Buckeye State is proud, my boys,
Let Shannon keep away,
Oh, never split your tickets, boys,
Upon election day.

The Locos know for Congressman,
The Whigs know for Senator,
The frail foundation of their House,
I built upon the sand.
It built upon the sand, my boys,
Which Morris sweeps away,
Oh, never split your tickets, boys,
Upon election day.

We want a Representative
On whom we can rely;
And well do Locofocos know
Whit cannot run with Nye,
Whit cannot run with Nye, my boys,
The forfeit he must pay,
Oh, never split your tickets, boys,
Upon election day.

THE LOCOCOS TO REMEMBER.

A lesson we will teach;
For Bosworth will Recorder be,
In spite of Jo D. Beach.
In spite of Jo D. Beach, my boys,
Three years he'll longer stay;
Oh, never split your tickets, boys,
Upon election day.

I fear that Morgan will be Elected Commissioner.

He cannot be Commissioner,
For John D. Chamberlain,
For John D. Chamberlain, my boys,
Will never go astray;
Oh, never split your tickets, boys,
Upon election day.

And for the Sheriff, you may put,
McClarathan at rest;
For he cannot the office fill,
As long as we have Test;
As long as we have Test, my boys,
Rogues cannot get away;
Oh, never split your tickets, boys,
Upon election day.

We know it often has been said
Consistency's a jewel;
Therefore for State's Attorney, we Can't have Charles F. Buell,
We can't have Charles F. Buell, boys,
For Barber's in the way;
Oh, never split your tickets, boys,
Upon election day.

And when the Loco party dies,
The Coroner will bury,
And they must have a jury case,
'Twill be such fun for Larry,
'Twill be such fun for Larry, boys,
In Warden Willis' way;
Oh, never split your tickets, boys,
Upon election day.

Now all ye Whigs and Straight-outs, too,
Wherever you are found;
Be at the polls on Tuesday next,
Be early on the ground,
Be early on the ground, my boys,
And do not stay away,
Oh, never split your tickets, boys,
Upon election day.

PARTING SONG.

By J. G. Green.

1849.

As sung by the Washington County delegation at McConnellsville, at the adjournment of the convention.)

Ye Whigs of good old Morgan now,
We leave you with regret;
The kindness you have shown to us,
We never will forget.

CHORUS.

But we must part with grateful hearts,
Our bosoms long will swell;
Accept our warmest heartfelt thanks,
We bid you farewell.

We think that you may truly state,
A good day's work is done,
For Shugert is a man of weight,
And Curtis well can am

But we must part, &c.

We found the latch-strings hanging out,
And every man will say,
He never met with kinder friends,
Than we have met to-day

But we must part, &c.

But friends 'tis time that we should part,
We must no more delay,
We hope to find a chance some day
Your kindness to repay.

But we must part, &c.

THE PEOPLE'S MEETING.

(At Newport, Ohio, Sept. 15, 1840.)

August 29, 1840.—

The citizens of Old Washington, and the adjoining counties of Ohio, also the citizens of Wood and Tyler counties, Va., are respectfully invited to meet at Newport, Washington County, Ohio, on Tue-day, the 15th of September, 1840, at 10 o'clock, A. M. at which time and place the Hon. Thomas Corwin, Democratic Whig candidate of the people for Governor will address the assemblage. The Hon. Calvary Morris, member of Congress, and the Democratic Whig candidates for re-election, Hon. Thomas Ewing, Hon. Samuel F. Vinton, and other distinguished statesmen from abroad, have been invited, and are expected to be in attendance. One or more bands of music will favor the meeting by their attendance. The ladies of the surrounding country are especially solicited to honor the occasion by their attendance. Let all who believe that the rights of free American citizens are worth preserving, come, see, hear, and judge. Extensive arrangements are making for a free dinner—all will be made welcome.

WASHINGTON COUNTY COLONIZATION SOCIETY.

"On Wednesday evening last the Rev. Mr. Selon, agent of the American Colonization Society, delivered an address upon the subject of African colonization, at the Congregational Meeting House in this place (Marietta), in pursuance of the notice previously given. The meeting was attended by a large number of our citizens who listened with attention, to a lucid and eloquent exhibition of the claims of the American Colonization Society, upon the confidence and support of all the friends of humanity and religion.

"After the address, a collection was taken up in behalf of the Colonization Society, amounting to $34.

"A society was formed as an auxiliary to the parent society at Washington, with the name of the "Washington County Colonization Society;" and the following gentlemen were chosen as officers, until the annual meeting, which is to be held on the 4th day of July next:

David Putnam, Esq., President.

James Whitney, 1st Vice-President.

William Slocumb, 2d Vice-President.

Dudley Woodbridge, Treasurer.

William A. Whittlesey, Secretary.

The annual meeting of this Society, by the constitution, is to be holden on the 4th day of July annually. By reason of another meeting which has been announced to be held at 11 o'clock on that day, for the purpose of celebrating the anniversary of American Independence, the Colonization Society will meet at the meeting house of the First Religious Society, in Marietta, at 3 o'clock, P. M., at which time an address may be expected by the Rev. Mr. Bingham; and at which the citizens of the county, and all others who are friendly to, or disposed to aid the objects of the Colonization Society, are invited to attend.

At the close of the exercises, a collection or subscription will be taken up in aid of the objects of the society: and the officers for the ensuing year will be elected.

All persons who are disposed to join the society will have an opportunity to do so, by subscribing to the Constitution, and on paying fifty cents will thereby become members.

Those gentlemen in the respective townships in the county, to whom the circular of the directors and a subscription paper were addressed, are requested to make a return of their respective subscription papers to the directors, or the treasurer, at the annual meeting.

ANTI-ABOLITION MEETINGS.

"At a large and highly respectable meeting of the citizens of Washington County, convened agreeably to public notice, at the Court House in Marietta, on Monday evening, the 23d inst., A. V. D. Joline, Esq., was called to the chair, and L. Chamberlain was appointed secretary. After the objects of the meeting had been stated by the chairman the following preamble and resolutions were adopted:—

Whereas, the time has arrived when it becomes the moral duty of the people of Marietta, for the purpose of freeing their good name from the stigma of interfering with the property of our neighbors of the slave-holding States, to let their sentiments on the question of the immediate and unconditional abolition of slavery be known

And whereas, it is a duty we owe to our neighbors of the South, to the preservation of our Union, and to ourselves, that we should lend our feeble aid in putting down those incendiaries who are now using all their efforts in arraying a portion of this Union against the West, and in disturbing the peace and quiet of the once happy community.

And whereas, believing that the Anti-Slavery Society, in agitating the question of slavery, and in filling the minds of the black population of our country with notions of liberty and equality with the whites, which can never come to pass, are doing the negroes an essential injury. Therefore

1st. Resolved, That we deprecate any intermeddling, on the part of our citizens, with the slaves and slave-holders of the South as unjust, unwise and impolitic; as dangerous in its tendency, and incendiary in its character.

2d. Resolved, That the citizens of a Free State have no right to interfere with the property of the slave-holders, and much as we deprecate the evils of slavery, we yet dislike the doctrine of speedy and unconditional abolition more, and that of the two evils we will choose the least.

3d. Resolved, That we view with indignation the efforts of those fanatics calling themselves Abolitionists, whose doctrine, if carried into effect, would have a direct tendency to dissolve the Union.

4th. Resolved, That the great mass of the people are, and we trust, ever will be, opposed to the fanatical doctrines of the Abolitionists.

5th. Resolved, That the professors and trustees of the Marietta College be requested to discountenance the students from imbibing the doctrines of the Anti-Slavery Society, by expelling the refractory, or otherwise, as to them may seem most proper.

6th. Resolved, That the members of this meeting pledge themselves, individually and collectively, to oppose all Abolitionists, in promulgating their doctrines, by every means which to them may seem lawful and just.

7th. Resolved, That neither Congress, nor the non-slave holding States have a right to interfere, directly or indirectly, with the slaves and slave-holders of the South; and that any such interference would be at variance with the spirit of our Constitution, and ought not to be tolerated.

8th. Resolved, That the efforts of the Abolitionists, in this State, will have a direct tendency to encourage the migration and settlement here, of swarms of free blacks and runaway slaves, from other States, thus evading the laws of Ohio, passed for the sole purpose of preventing their emigration and settlement in this State.

9th. Resolved, That it has become the duty of the Northern and Western States to let their sentiments on this all absorbing subject be known, and that we recommend to the citizens of other counties in Ohio, to hold meetings, so as to give a firm and decided expression of public opinion against the doctrine of immediate and unconditional emancipation of all the slaves.

10th. Resolved, That the proceedings of this meeting be signed by the chairman and secretary, and be published in the Democrat and Gazette, Marietta; and that the editors of the Enquirer and Whig, Richmond, the Banner, Charleston, the Globe and Telegraph, Washington City, and Republican, Parkersburg, and other papers in Virginia, be requested to copy the same.

In 1836, the following year, a meeting of the citizens of Washington County was held at the Court House of Marietta, on October 15th, Hugh Trevor presiding, and William Alcock, F. Buell and C. B. Flood were appointed a committee to open a correspondence with the president or the officers of the Washington County Anti-Slavery Society for the purpose of dissuading them from holding a meeting on the following Monday, October 17th. The meeting adjourned to the following Monday, when the committee made the following report: "That they had, in performing the duties assigned, met together and agreed upon the following letter, which was dispatched at as early an hour as possible, and from the insulting manner in which their note had been received, it was presumed that there would be no answer." Following is the letter:

MARIETTA, O., Oct. 17, 1836.

SIR:—At a large and highly respectable meeting of the citizens of Washington County, opposed to the speedy and unconditional abolition of slavery, held at the Court House on Saturday evening last, the undersigned were appointed a committee to open a correspomdence with the president, or other officers of the Washington County Anti-Slavery Society for the purpose of endeavoring, if possible, to dissuade them from holding a meeting on Monday next.

In fulfilling the duty thus imposed upon us by our fellow citizens, we would observe that after so decided an exposition of public opinion, that the Anti-Slavery Society, in yielding to the wishes of so large a majority of their fellow citizens, would show the world that the would implore you, to desist from a purpose, which we would not ask of you, did we not know that you could do so with honor.

Many of your society, on a late occasion, were witnesses to the excitement produced by a discussion of those doctrines which are viewed by the great mass of people, as having a direct tendency to dissolve the Union, we must be allowed to say, we fully concur. It is true that the laws of our common country pro-charges so often made against them, of setting the opinions of mankind at defiance, can have no foundation in truth.

We cannot see any good that can result from the society meeting, at the time specified in their advertisements: for it will ere long, have a direct tendency further to exasperate the people against them, and experience hath shown the dangers of such excitements. As men professing good will to all mankind, we would ask you, if it would not be better for your society to desist from their purpose than to proceed, and again convulse the community; and again create discord among those who would otherwise be friends. We would not wish to intimidate you, for an attempt would be childish in the extreme; but we would entreat, we trust you in your meeting together, and so far your meeting would be a lawful one, yet, lawful as it is, we would ask you if it would not be better for you to adjourn your meeting to some place where the people have not so deep rooted an antipathy to your doctrines, than to persist, and brave, as it were, the popular will, deliberately expressed. We are among those who believe that many of your society are actuated by pure and patriotic motives, and we confess to liberate the enslaved Africans would be the first wish of our hearts, and the hearts of those we represent. Yet when we reflect that in so doing, we break through that solemn compact entered into by our Revolutionary forefathers, who acknowledged the right of holding this species of property, and when we reflect that the laws of our common country guarantees to the slave-holders its protection in this robbery, and in bondage, and when we know that to wrest this property from them would raise our happy country into a state of anarchy, the blood of '76—to crumble to pieces, we turn with horror from the contemplation of such a state of things. The Slave States would not remain in the Union one moment longer than they formed the laws adequate to their protection. If the Union is dissolved, anarchy will reign supreme, and liberty will be sold in the fall of this great and growing republic.

We have thus, sirs, given you our opinions, and thus have we fulfilled the duty imposed upon us. But ere we report our proceedings, to those who appointed us as their organ, we would enjoin you by every feeling of philanthropy, to yield to the wishes of the majority. In doing so there is no dishonor. It will have a most beneficial effect on society, for good fellowship will again be restored, and all those feelings which now agitate and distract the public mind will of themselves die away and be succeeded by feelings of a more Christian character.

As we have to report our proceedings at nine o'clock to-day, your immediate answer, before that hour, through the Post Office, is hereby requested.

With a fervent wish that you will accede to our request,

We remain,

Respectfully yours,

W. M. ALDER,

F. B. FELL,

C. B. FLOOD,

Committee.

After adopting the committee's report, the Anti-Slavery meeting then adopted among others the following resolutions:

Resolved, That we do not recognize the majority of the members of the Washington County Anti-Slavery, or Abolition Society, as citizens, but as interlopers, alike destitute of common sense and of a knowledge of what conduces to the peace and good order of society, as they are of a knowledge of the true interest of the slaves.

Resolved, That the members of the Anti-Slavery Society, from their standing in the community, and from their general character as men of information, are beneath the notice of the good citizens of Marietta, and our remonstrance, dissuading them from their course, would be like "turning a fool from his folly."

Resolved, That in justice to ourselves, we are bound to treat these deluded youngsters with silent contempt.

Resolved, That the citizens of Marietta consider the abolition of slavery altogether out of our sphere of action, living as we do, in a free State, and we do approve of the trite saying, "every man mind his own business," and we will leave the white negroes of the North and the black negroes of the South, to manage their own concerns.

Resolved, That the laws of Ohio, relative to the introduction of, and residence among us, of free blacks, should be enforced, and every one, who fails to give the security required by law, should be dealt with as the law directs.

Resolved, That if the Abolition Society continue to hold meetings in this town, it will be in insolent defiance of this meeting, and of public opinion.

ANTI-SLAVERY MEETINGS.

The Washington County Anti-Slavery Society held its meeting on the 17th of October, 1836, in the Baptist Meeting House in Marietta. A committee that had been appointed to prepare a petition to Congress, respecting slavery in the District of Columbia, made its report. A committee was then appointed to circulate the petition in the county, being constituted as follows: Marietta,—T. Post, J. C. McCoy, L. Temple; Fearing,—J. M. Amlin; Salem,—D. G. Stanley; Lawrence,—William Hill; Ludlow,—John Newton; Wesley,—Philo Mathews; Adams, ——— Garrard; Aurelius,—H. Jackson; Barlow,—James Lawton; Union,—T. Ridgway; Decatur,—J. Haynes; Watertown,—Joseph N. Ford; Waterford,—Thomas H. Corey; Belpre,—John Stone; Warren,—J. J. Hollister; Grand View,—Charles Talbot; Newport,—William Green; Roxbury,—Nathan Proctor. Among the resolutions adopted at this meeting were the following:

Resolved, That the past success and the present prospects of the Anti-Slavery cause should inspire us with renewed confidence in its principles and measures.

Resolved, That the Society disclaim and intention to treat disrespectfully any person or any communication addressed to them as a Society; and therefore recommend to the officers of this society to pursue a conciliatory course.

Resolved, That a committee be appointed to draft a memorial to Congress for the grant of a tract of land for the free people of color.

Resolved, That the deepest gratitude and highest praise is due to our worthy Mayor, Anselm T. Rye, for the noble and patriotic stand taken by himself on this occasion in protecting us from the lawless violence while in the exercise of our dearest rights, guaranteed to us by the Constitution and laws of our land, inasmuch as his example is among the foremost of such a redeeming spirit in our country, from the all devouring vortex of pro-slavery proscription.

The second annual meeting of the Washington County Anti-Slavery Society was held in Fearing in 1837, Rev. Luke De Witt presiding. The constitution was amended, so that "The Society shall hold an annual meeting on the third Wednesday of October, at which time the officers of the Society for the ensuing years shall be chosen, and a quarterly meeting on the third Wednesday of January, April and July."

The committee appointed at the last meeting of the Society, to draft a petition to Congress for the grant of a piece of land for the people of color, reported, which report was accepted, but not adopted. Among the resolutions adopted at this meeting were the following:

Resolved, That every member of this Society, and every friend of the Anti Slavery cause ought to make strenuous exertions to make known the evils of slavery in the Northern States, as they exist in the South.

Resolved, That the alarming extent to which mobocratic violence has spread calls loudly upon the friends of good government to take a decided stand in the favor of the laws.

Resolved, That the right to discuss every measure of the government is essential to its well being, and that any system which requires the suppression of discussions is dangerous and ought to be abolished.

Resolved, That the daring attempts which have been made to prohibit Anti-Slavery discussions, by lawless violence, only strengthen our previous conviction of the incompatibility of slavery with our free institutions, and the necessary of its immediate abolition.

The officers elected for the ensuing year were as follows:

J. C. McCoy, President.
D. G. Stanley, Vice-President.
L. Temple, Secretary.
Thomas Wickham, Treasurer.
Col. Harry Hill, Salem; J. M. Anlin, Fearing;
Rev. B. Roberts, Watertown; James Lawton, Barlow;
John Stone, Belpre; Thomas Ridgway, Union; Seth Hart, Harmar; Rev. A. Dana, Newport; T. Post, Rev. L. DeWitt, Marietta, Directors.

PUBLIC SENTIMENT IN 1837.

"The way it works. Whatever may have been the errors of all or any of those who lately have been engaged in canvassing 'Southern Institutions,' we are satisfied the cause of emancipation is progressing more rapidly than at any former period within the last half century. There are strange illusions abroad on this subject. Some in the South suppose that the main portion of the North are Anti-Abolitionists, and some that the Anti-Slavery feeling is the common one in the non-slaveholding States. The last opinion is the true one. Put out of the question the men, whose opinions or pretensions in favor of Southern institutions are influenced by interesting ties of trade and politics, and the champions of those institutions would be very scarce.

"On the other hand, it seems generally supposed in the Free States, that great unanimity of feeling and opinion exists in the South in regard to those cherished institutions. This, we are assured, is an utter mistake. The number of those who follow Mr. Jefferson, in this regard, is very great. Mr. Clay says decidedly and emphatically that slavery is a most enormous evil. And so would say multitudes of the best men of the South, if they were compelled to utter their sentiments. The following extract of a letter, dated May 5, 1837, and published in an Eastern paper, contains, we believe correct views on the subject. The writer in giving an account of some conversations with a venerable and distinguished minister of the Baptist denomination, in North Carolina, says:—

Of course I had a conversation with Father C. on the subject of slavery. He says he believes the Northern Abolitionists are, many of them, honest, though misguided, men, and also that he knows of no man in North Carolina, who, like Messrs. McDuffie, and Calhoun of South Carolina, regards slavery as good. He considers it as an evil, and wishes the land was delivered of it. His views of the subject are like those of thousands in Maryland, Virginia, North Carolina, Tennessee and Kentucky. I hope to see these five States added to the number of Free States. The discussions of the last five years have awakened the consciences of thousands, and the issue will be favorable to the slave and to the cause of freedom.

"It seems to us that the Abolitionists are exceedingly indiscreet in the harsh and indiscriminate censure they pour forth upon all slave-holders and upon the entire South. If their rebuke and their agitations, in their opinion, are necessary, still intemperance, not to say injustice, does not subserve any good cause. But let none suppose that the rebukes of the North are unheard. A citizen of one of the Free States, not many months ago, observed to a distinguished Southerner, that the operations of the Abolitionists were impeding the cause of emancipation—or to that effect; —‘Sir,’ said the Southerner, ‘you are mistaken. Depend upon it, these agitations have put the slave-holders to a very serious thinking.’”

THE OHIO KIDNAPING CASE.

from the "Lancetta and Argosy"

July 24, 1845.—

“On the night of the 9th inst., Creighton J. Loraine, Peter M. Garner, and Mordecai E. Thomas, all citizens of Decatur township, in this county, were seized on the Ohio shore by a body of men from Virginia taken by force, and without process of law, to Parkersburg, where they were committed to jail. On the 18th inst., they were examined before a called County Court, and committed for trial before the Supreme Court to be held in September next—bail for their appearance having been refused. The facts that led to the abduction of these men are these:

“On the evening of the 9th, six negroes, claimed as the slaves of John H. Harwood, living 12 miles below Parkersburg, made their escape into Ohio. Mr. Harwood having knowledge of their purpose, secured the services of some of his neighbors, who came over in advance of the negroes, and concealed themselves near the bank. Soon after midnight the negroes came over, and were met on the bank by Loraine, Garner, Thomas, and four others, who were aiding them in the removal of their baggage from the canoe when the three above-named were seized, as above stated, and taken to Virginia, together with five of the negroes.

“With the defense of these captured men, or of those who may aid slaves when escaping we have nothing to do. If the offenses are committed against the laws of Virginia, within her jurisdiction, let the offenders be legally demanded of the Governor of Ohio, the criminals removed by legal process, and the penalty of the violated law inflicted.

“The claim that Virginia sets up is, that citizens of Ohio, and who have never set foot on Virginian soil, are amenable to her laws! That is bad enough—too bad—so bad that a Kentucky jury upon their oaths would not, and we trust a Virginia jury will not, sanction. But in this case, Ohio citizens are seized upon their own soil, and without process of law removed by people of another State from our territory by violence, under a pretense that they have committed a crime—where? not in Virginia, but in their own State, to whose laws alone they are amenable, and where alone they can have a constitutional trial—viz.: by a jury in the county where the act was done.

“And will the citizens of Ohio, will the authorities of the State, quietly submit to such indignities? They will merit the scorn of all men if they do. If our laws will permit a foreign mob to seize free men, citizens of Ohio, and violently carry them as felons into a foreign jurisdiction, let not henceforth be said that they are made for our protection.

“Ah, but these were fanatics, meddling with what was none of their business—incendiaries, negro stealers! Tell us not that; for if they were, and we care not what beside, the right to kidnap them confers the right to kidnap the best citizens in the State, and whoever would himself be safe must repel the principle as unjust, unholy, and full of wrong.”

CAPTURE OF OHIO

“Capture of Ohio Citizens in Ohio by Virginians—Transportation across the Ohio River—Incarceration and detention by Virginia Judicial Authority in Parkersburg Jail—Bail refused.

“(Our readers will recollect that in giving an account last week, of the outrage by Virginians, we gave the absence of the editor as a reason of its not being noticed in our previous number. The first part of the following communication was written for our last, but not seasonably received. We note this lest any who should read this without having seen our last, might infer that we had not noticed the affair previously to this time.—Ed.)

"On the 9th of July, 1845, an armed force crossed over from Wood County, Va., and placed itself in an ambush above the mouth of the Little Hocking. They say they came in the employ of John H. Harwood, to prevent the expected escape of his slaves. They saw several men pass down the road. Some time after midnight they heard the paddles of a canoe coming from Virginia. They heard voices from it, and, as they supposed, responses from the Ohio shore. The waylayers hurried from their ambush among the pawpaws, passed down the road on the bank and descended, but found they were too low; re-ascended, till they were opposite the canoe—saw it was filled and floating away—saw a crowd on shore which they met at some distance from the water, seized three white men, two of whom were carrying baggage—took five negroes—one woman, three children and an old man. One negro man was suffered to escape, but the three white men, Loraine, Ganrer, and Thomas, were forcibly taken across the Ohio River to Parkersburg—committed to jail by Gardner and another magistrate—refused intercourse with their Ohio friends excepting one with a Virginia attorney; which attorney, for himself and junior colleague, demanded $450 for defending them, and finally obtained from citizens of Ohio $50 for appearing before the Call Court on Friday, July 18, 1845.

"Three attorneys of Marietta were employed by citizens of Ohio to appear at that court in the defense. They were told by the younger of the Virginia counsel that the prisoners did not wish any attorney from Ohio to interfere in their case. One of the counsel from Ohio requested permission to appear in vindication of the rights and jurisdiction of Ohio. This was refused. After the promise of $50 was obtained from a citizen of Ohio, by the elder Virginia counsel, he invited Mr. Whittlesey of Marietta to assist—retaining the examination of witnesses in his own hand.

"There was undoubtedly a plot laid in Virginia to entrap men in Ohio. Harwood, with a professed knowledge that his slaves would escape across the Ohio on a certain night, employs men—not to retain the slaves in Virginia, but, professedly to stop them on the Ohio side. Harwood swears that the negroes took with them his property to the amount of $100 to $150. Harwood knew they were going and suffered them to take this property (probably their own clothing principally), including a saddle and a martingale.

"The Supreme Court of the United States decided, about a quarter of a century ago, that low-water mark was the boundary of the States northwest of the Ohio. That court is the only tribunal which could settle that boundary—and yet it is claimed by Virginia—at least in Parkersburg—that some dictum of a Virginia Judge Smith 'countervails that decision.

"Nothing was done by the prisoners without the jurisdiction of Ohio. But it was expressed, claimed and insisted upon, by the prosecution before the Call Court, that the captors had a right to take those prisoners in Ohio and have them tried in Virginia. The prisoners were detained by the examining court for trial in the Superior Court of Virginia; and furthermore, the examining court refused to admit them to bail, though the counsel for the prosecution allowed they had the power to do so.

"We think it is time for Ohio to vindicate her right. Funds should be raised to employ counsel, obtain the best legal advice, and prosecute legal measures for the release of our captured citizens, the assertion of our rights, and the maintenance of our peace and dignity.

"Our call is not confined to the citizens of Washington County, but it is addressed to all citizens of Ohio who unite with us in opinion on this subject."

WHAT THEY SAY IN PARKERSBURG.

Arrest of Abolitionists.—For several years past slaves have been escaping from their masters, and although in every instance pursuit has been made, yet in very few instances has it been of any avail. This is owing to the fact that there is in Ohio an organized band, who have provided hiding places and a line of covered wagons in which the runaway slaves are transported by night and sometimes by day to the Canada line. The laws of Ohio have worked at these proceedings, if indeed the late legislation of that State on the subject has not operated to favor the plans of the Abolitionists. The consequence is that three citizens of Ohio are now confined in the jail at this place on a charge of obstructing away of aiding the escaped slaves from this county and Commonwealth.

The facts, as we are informed, are as follows: Information was recently received that the slaves of John H. Harwood, Esq., living at Washington, this county, about 12 miles below this place, would attempt an escape on the night of Wednesday last. Six gentlemen of that neighborhood crossed the river after dark and concealed themselves on the Ohio side. About two o'clock on the morning of Thursday, six of Mr. Harwood's negroes came across and were received by a party of whites at least seven in number; and while the latter were engaged in assisting the former and their baggage from the canoe, the concealed Virginians made a descent upon them, and after a severe struggle succeeded in capturing and securing five of the blacks and three of the whites. The latter were brought to this place, and after an examination before William S. Gardner and John Stephenson, Esquires, were fully committed.

As the offense of which these men are accused is a felony under our laws, an examining court has been summoned for Friday next (18th inst.). We forbear comment at least until the result is known. Although our citizens have been greatly exasperated by the events of the last few years, of which the one which gave rise to these remarks is the last, every disposition is manifested to give the accused a fair trial, and, if found guilty, to leave them in the hands of the law.

"The emphasizing is ours. There was no evidence before the Call Court that the prisoners assisted 'the negroes and their baggage from the canoe.'

"It is evident from this Parkersburg article that the Virginia gentlemen invaded Ohio to make the capture here. That they have knowingly and intentionally captured 'three citizens of Ohio'—transported them to Parkersburg Jail to be punished in order to intimidate the people of Ohio. 'If found guilty,' these prisoners are magnanimously to be 'left in the hands of the law'!—if not, we hear,—and this article rather 'gives color to the idea'—that they are to be assigned to the tender mercies of Judge Lynch."

THE CALL COURT.

The trial of Garner, Thomas and Lorraine, confined in jail here, under the charge of aiding the escape of slaves of the county and Commonwealth, occurred on last Friday, in the presence of a considerable assemblage of persons from the country on this and the other side of the Ohio River. Messrs. Stringer and Spencer of this place appeared for the prisoners, and of two gentlemen of the bar of Marietta, who attended for the purpose of assisting in the defense, the prisoners accepted one (Mr. Whittlesey), constituting together a very able and faithful defense, as was admitted on all sides at the close of the trial.

In the absence of Gen. J. J. Jackson, the attorney for the Commonwealth in the county, the prosecution was conducted with a high degree of fairness and ability, by P. J. Van Winkle, Esq., of this place. The result was the remanding of the prisoners for further trial at the Circuit Superior Court on the first of September. We may have a word to say about this matter on its merits, at some future time, but not now; because our citizens intend that the final trial shall be, as it is on all sides admitted that the trial before the examining court has been, a fair one. And they intend firmly to abide by its issue, be it what it may. So that we purposely refrain from going into the question at this time, and until after the final trial. The Court expressed themselves desirous to admit the prisoners to bail, but regretted that it did not consist with their duties to do so.

"The 'high degree of fairness and ability' evinced by the prosecution, however, it may be accepted by some Virginians—we would hope not very many—would have been held quite otherwise, had the like occurred in Ohio.

"The prisoners had been denied free and unrestrained intercourse with friends and kindred from Ohio—were excessively intimidated—and were cajoled into the belief that they could not safely admit the counsel—three, not 'two'—sent by their friends in Ohio to aid in their defense. P. G. Van Winkle, Esq., objected to counsel appearing in behalf of the violated rights of Ohio, unless formally authorized by the Governor of Ohio. He dwelt much on the limited power of the Court, and advanced the most ultra sophistical and offensive pretensions of the rights and dominion of Virginia 'Northwest of the River Ohio.' We cannot well suppose that Virginia will concur in these assumptions.

"We hope the newspaper press of Ohio will pay that attention to the subject which its unspeakable importance demands. It is evident that Virginians are quite prone to view the people of Ohio as too spiritless to vindicate their rights. Let them now be vindicated, legally, peaceably, but firmly, and infinite mischief may be prevented from occurring hereafter.

"We give extracts from the Cincinnati Gazette—

Many a Buckeye

OHIOANS CAPTURED! GREAT EXCITEMENT!

On the evening of the 6th. three men from Ohio, Mr. C. Loraine, Mr. Garner, and Mr. Thomas, all of Washington County, Ohio, were seized on the Ohio shore, by a body of men from Virginia, and lodged in jail at Parkersburg upon the charge that they had aided the escape of slaves.

We have nothing to say in defense of any man, or set of men, who will entice slaves away. If caught, let the law have its course. But we have something to say against our citizens being seized on their own soil, and without process of law, by people of another State, to be tried before the tribunals of that State. They may be wrong every way; bad at heart and bad in conduct; but they should not be troubled if Ohio has the means or the power to protect them. The law of a State is limited to the territory of the State. Beyond, it is a dead letter, and if for slavery, or for anything else, this principle is violated, our State governments are in effect annihilated. If this were allowed, Ohioans may seize Virginians for being slave-holders, and punish them, just as Virginians may seize Ohioans for aiding the escape of slaves. Such a state of things would result in anarchy—and if general would destroy the government.

We wish our friends in Ohio to be firm, but cool. Mahan was seized on the same grounds, and in the same way nearly; but a Kentucky court and jury acquitted him without a moment's hesitation. The appeal in this case is to the law. Let it be fairly met, and we do not believe the result doubtful. No jury upon their oaths—no judge—no law—would sanction a principle so fatal in all its consequences, as that necessary to convict and punish these Ohioans, viz.: that the laws of Virginia extend into Ohio. See that the best counsel is obtained in Virginia, and to that add the ablest men of our State. Indeed, in all such cases we would, if practicable, have the State speak and act through her highest officers, so that her citizens may feel everywhere that they are protected in all their interests.

"The abduction of Ohio citizens is such an aggravated offense upon the rights of men, and against the sovereignty of the State, as to excite, as it ought, great and general indignation. We have spoken freely upon the subject, and the press of the State, and of other States, almost universally re-iterates our language or speaks, in still stronger terms. We cannot copy many evidences of the spirit of the press, but here is an extract we find, with remarks of approval, in the National Intelligencer, copied from the Cincinnati Gazette, which

These Ohioans have been kidnapped on our and their soil, and while violating no law of home, by people from a foreign State, and are now held as felons in a foreign jail. It will never do to tolerate the idea that the people of any State may invade our territory by force, and by force capture and imprison our citizens. We shall be despised, and ought to be despised, as poltroon in spirit, and coward at heart, if we sluggishly fold our arms and say nothing and do nothing to meet wrongs of so outrageous a character. No man need to talk to us of the character of the men seized in this particular case. None need speak of what they attempted to do, or did. The right to seize the poorest and meanest citizen of Ohio by force, confers, if not resisted, the right to seize the best citizen of the State. Let us see whether there be virtue in the writ of habeas corpus, or the law, and let us know, too, speedily whether the citizens of Virginia, or any other State, may invade our soil, bear away our people, and doom them as felons, against justice, right, and law, without any remedy on our part, except the last remedy which God and Nature have put into our hands.

The editor of the Parkersburg Gazette has made a bitter personal attack upon the writer of an article in our paper of the 31st ult., to which the gentleman has replied; but as we do not wish to occupy our space with the two column article of the Gazette—which he wished to appear in connection with his reply—principally because we thought public attention ought not to be diverted from the original offense to a consideration of comparatively personal matters,—he has published it in the Buckeye. We annex some extracts from the commentary on the Gazette's article:

NOT TRUE.

"It is not true that the citizens of Virginia, who made the capture, crossed the river for that purpose, or with that expectation. They went for the sole purpose of intercepting the slaves, as they had a perfect right to do; and until they had actually seized the whites supposed the whole were negroes."—Parkersburg Gazette.

A "mighty" likely story that—isn't it now? They expected the negroes were about to leave their homes in Virginia—but they could not think of stopping them there! No; they had a perfect right to invade Ohio, and they would do it—Ohio being their lawful hunting ground. The Parkersburg Gazette remembers to forget a few items. These night hunters placed themselves in Ohio—where they could watch, not the river, but the road from Decatur. They saw men pass in the night, but could not suspect they were going to help the negroes! They heard the negroes answered from the Ohio shore—but thought 'twas negro answering negro! The Parkersburg Gazette says there was evidence (by these gentlemen) that the prisoners assisted the negroes and their baggage from the canoe—but when they "seized the whites" they supposed them all negroes. Now don't this make up a mighty likely story?

MOST SURPRISINGLY SURPRISING.

"We have seen with much surprise in the Marietta Intelligencer, a communication entitled 'Invasion of Ohio.' We are surprised that the editor of that paper should have admitted such an article to his columns. * * * We must again express our surprise that any respectable journal should give it publicity."—Parkersburg Gazette.

The Parkersburg Gazette seems to disremember that Ohio is a Free State. There is so much freedom in Ohio that we dare to be fair and publish what the Gazette says against us—the like whereof we suppose the Parkersburg Gazette dares not do. We have become so far free in Ohio that even abolition lectures have now seldom molested. Pro-slavery lecturers have scarce ever been interrupted. The intimation of the Richmond Examiner, that West Virginia was becoming free, is exceedingly grievous and surprising to the P. Gazette.

A FINE CHANCE.

"If a fair trial can be had, the prisoners will have it, and, as heretofore, every indulgence will be extended to them which circumstances permit. We have heard no desire expressed that they should be convicted unless the law, as applied to the facts, fully warrants it."—P. Gazette.

Well, what by Virginia construction, is the law? Why according to Mr. Van Winkle, "That Virginia, or any other State has a right to pass a law declaring the punishment of an offense committed against her citizens or their property although committed out of her limits, and may punish the offender if brought before her tribunals, and that the law under which these men are prosecuted is such a law!"

We want to add a word: If this is a sound doctrine, why may not Ohio pass a law against slave-holding and under it arrest any Virginians who may be guilty of what she pronounces a crime? The Virginians ought to see that this may prove bad doctrine for them.

PUBLIC MEETING.

A meeting of the citizens of Washington County was held at the Court House in Marietta, by adjournment, August 16, 1845, to take into consideration further measures for the liberation of Ohio citizens then in the Parkersburg Jail, and for the vindication of the rights of Ohio.

Nahum Ward, James Lawton, A. T. Nye, Judge Loring, and William West were appointed a committee to report resolutions for the action of the meeting; the committee submitted the following resolutions which were unanimously adopted:—

Resolved That the forcible abduction and detention in the Parkersburg Jail of our citizens, Creighton J.

Loraine, Peter M. Garner, and Mordecai E. Thomas, by Virginians, constitutes a most alarming trespass on the rights of Ohio.

Resolved, That in the opinion of this meeting, peaceable and legal measures should be adopted and pursued, with untiring energy, not merely for the liberation of the prisoners, but also security from similar assaults hereafter on the peace and dignity of Ohio.

Resolved, That application should be made in proper form to the Governor of Ohio, for his active interference in this case, to the utmost of his power and authority vested in him for the promotion of the welfare and vindication of the rights of Ohio.

Resolved, That it is highly expedient and essential to the peace of the States bordering on the Ohio River, that Ohio should assert and strenuously maintain her rights of State Jurisdiction to low-water mark, as established in 1820 in the case of Handley's Lessee vs. Anthony, et al., by the Supreme Court of the United States.

Resolved, That it is highly expedient and essential that laws should be passed by the National Legislature securing to persons seized, carried away, and detained from their own territory, the privileges of the writ of Habeas Corpus, and the protection of the Federal Judiciary.

Resolved, That the following named citizens of Washington County be and they are hereby appointed a committee to carry the foregoing resolutions into effect, seven of whom shall be a quorum, and the citizens of this meeting shall sustain them in so doing: Nahum Ward, Caleb Emerson, Walter Curtis, G. W. Barker, Hiram Gard, Job S. King, Dr. G. N. Gilbert, James M. Amlin, R. K. Ewart, John Collins, William R. Putnam, Jr., A. T. Nye, J. D. Chamberlain, Daniel Davis, Ira Hill, Elisha Allen, Joseph Barker, William P. Cutler, Simeon Deming, Jr., and William R. Brown-ing.

THE TRIAL AT PARKERSBURG.

SEPTEMBER 16, 1845.

B. Gates, Esq.—On Monday, the 1st inst., the Circuit Superior Court of Virginia commenced its fall session in Wood County. A large number of the citizens of Washington County repaired hither to attend the trial of the three Ohio citizens confined in the Parkersburg Jail on the charge of aiding the escape of prisoners. As an eye-witness I proceed to give a sketch of the proceedings of the Court.

On Monday, the grand jury, having been empaneled and sworn, retired to their chambers, and after a few hours deliberation, returned with an indictment jointly found against the prisoners, Peter M. Garner, Creighton J. Loraine and Mordecai E. Thomas, charging them with enticing and assisting, in the county of Wood, six negroes, the property of Mr. Harwood, to escape into Ohio from servitude. The indictment contained four or five counts, each varying the charge to suit the various sections of the statute. At nine o'clock on Tuesday morning, the prisoners were brought within the bar of Court, and the indictment immediately read to them, to which each answered severally not guilty. Counsel for the prisoners—Messrs. Vinton, and C. H. Brough, of Ohio, and W. A. Harrison and J. G. Stringer, of Virginia. Mr. Jackson, the attorney for the Commonwealth, here stated to the Court that in consequence of an attack of the erysipelas he should be compelled, in following the advice of his physician, to decline the prosecution of the case—not without hope, however, that other members of the bar could be induced to fill his place; but in case other attorneys should not be employed, he should be compelled to move the Court for a continuance of the cause until the next term. The Court thereupon appointed Messrs. Fisher and Van Winkle, but the former of these gentlemen declined. The latter consented to engage only on the condition that Mr. Fisher would lead the prosecution—this, however, Mr. Fisher peremptorily declined. The question then recurred upon the continuance of the case.

Mr. Vinton arose in opposition. He appeared (he said) in the cause, not strictly as counsel for the prisoners, but at the request of the Executive of Ohio in defense of the rights of the State. It was of the highest importance that no right, however great or small, should be violated between the sister States of Virginia and Ohio. Thus far two sovereignties had continued to flourish, one at the side of the other, and not an incident had transpired to war against the mutual amity and friendship which had ever existed between them. And feeling a conviction that if this cause should come to a speedy termination the intense excitement now existing in either State would at once, and quietly, subside, he could not but argue upon the Court the propriety of an immediate trial. Delay, he thought, would only heighten the unhappy excitement. Should the trial proceed, and the result be an acquittal of the prisoners, the people of Ohio would at once "rub out" all harsh and unfriendly feeling; but should the result be otherwise and a continuance be had, he was sure that an indictment would be found at the next term of the Court of Washington County against the Virginia citizens who had seized and brought here the prisoners, and that a requisition upon the Virginia Executive would follow, and if a surrender was made of these citizens, they would probably be sentenced to the Ohio Penitentiary under the statute of the State to prevent kidnapping. It was impossible to determine the extent of the difficulties that would eventually spring up under such a state of circumstances. All interference by the people of Ohio with the property or rights of the citizens of Virginia was to be deprecated and condemned as unwarranted and in violation of the good faith which should ever exist, under our admirable constitution, between the two sovereignties. Laws had been enacted in Ohio against any such interference, but it being shown that Congress alone had the power of enacting laws relative to fugitives from labor, the Ohio acts were repealed. He further alluded to the operation of the Constitution and laws of the United States, and also of the laws of Ohio and Virginia and urged the citizens of both States to a strict and faithful observance of them. He appeared, he repeated, in behalf of the State of Ohio; but should it be ascertained that the prisoners had, at any time when in the commission of the crime charged, been within the jurisdiction of Virginia, he would immediately abandon the defense and leave them to rely upon other counsel.

Mr. Harrison thought that were the Court to take a recess, counsel for the prosecution might be obtained.

Mr. Stringer made some remarks in a low tone which were not distinctly heard.

Mr. Jackson, further in support of the motion, said that the Commonwealth could not under the circumstances be fairly represented in the cause, as other counsel than those assigned would act without preparation. The question of boundary he thought a highly important one and required an elaborate investigation in order to settle it fairly and firmly. It should not be settled in haste. He hoped the prisoners would have the fairest possible trial, and he should not ask their conviction unless they were proven clearly within the territory of Virginia at the time of the commission of the acts charged. 'Twas true that much excitement existed on both sides of the river, but none but citizens of Virginia knew how to feel for the injuries which their rights were daily sustaining. The prisoners he thought were guilty, and as they now had them in their power he hoped they would be punished in an exemplary manner. The people of Virginia had rights which should be sustained if possible.

The Court after the close of the arguments granted the motion and fixed upon the 17th of November next for a special session to try the issue. The prisoners were admitted to bail in $500 each, or were to stand committed until trial, in case no bail could be had. They will, however, probably be able to secure the necessary bail within a few days. It is much to be regretted that circumstances are such as to prevent the attendance of Mr. Vinton at the time fixed upon for the Special Court. Good feeling and harmony prevailed throughout. It is worthy of remark, perhaps, that the Court repeatedly expressed a determination to afford the prisoners a fair and impartial trial. The only exceptional feature of the proceedings I observed was the degrading treatment shown the prisoners when taken to and from the jail. No one had a remote idea that any effort would be made to release them—yet each prisoner was collared by two self-important sub-officers and dragged along among a crowd of two or three hundred, as if they were the blackest criminals in Christendom. Yours, etc.

An Ohioan.

"It is certainly a hard matter for the prisoners to be dealt with thus. They were ready for trial. The prosecuting attorney has been out of health for some time, and it was understood weeks ago that he might not be able to conduct the case. In these circumstances no counsel, it appears, was secured to aid him. The prisoners must remain in jail more than two months longer, or give bail. Suppose Mr. Jackson is then sick, and there is the same neglect about assistance, or difficulty about procuring it, must these men be again sent to jail?

"There is one singular fact in this case.—

The ablest counsel in Virginia are willing to appear in behalf of the prisoners, but nobody but Mr. Jackson is desirous of appearing against them. If the State had a good case, there would probably be no difficulty of this kind.—Editor."

The Ohio State Journal, in an issue of September, 1845, after copying the account of the trial at Parkersburg as contained in the Marietta Intelligencer, comments as follows:

* * * * "We are convinced that there is no probability of the conviction of the prisoners, and that this is understood by those in the prosecution. But, as we intimated several weeks since, the final discussion of the question on its merits, is put off, in order to punish the prisoners before they are tried. They have already been retained in prison for some time, and unless they should get the bail will be retained for a longer period. Even if they get bail, the rod will be held over their heads, and thus, it is supposed, others will be deterred from following the example set by them, in the matter with which they stand charged. If we are correct in this supposition there is certainly just room for complaint against the course of proceedings. * * * *

"We learn from gentlemen at Parkersburg that the very serious illness of Mr. Jackson, the prosecuting attorney for Virginia, did not prevent his attending to other business the whole week. It is not so much a matter of surprise that the grand jury should have found a bill as that they should have found it upon such additional testimony as was presented. It has been stated that the grand jury would not have found a bill but for new and important facts that came to their knowledge, in addition to what were presented at the called court. And what were they? Why, a witness testified that when the kidnaped Ohioans reached Virginia, it was found that they had water in their shoes, and as the boat in which they were taken over was dry, it was concluded that they might have got their feet wet in Virginia water—probably when helping the negroes out of their boat when it reached this shore! Well, suppose they did 'get their feet wet' there, they were not within the jurisdiction of Virginia. They had not been within five rods of low-water mark, and did not get there until carried by an armed force.

"A word about the bail: Bail was required in Virginia. A number of citizens of Ohio, men of wealth and high character, offered to become responsible to any citizen of Virginia who would bail the prisoners. The indemnifying bond was signed by a large number of our wealthy citizens, and besides this one of the signers offered to give his individual note for the whole amount of the bail to a citizen of Virginia if he would enter into recognizance for their appearance. Two gentlemen of Virginia consented to give bonds if a third man could be obtained to engage jointly with them. A young gentleman of undoubted pecuniary responsibility voluntarily offered to do so, but as he was not a freeholder (his property being, at least a portion of it, in bank stock), he was refused. The sum total of the matter is, that after the most importunate entreaties and although undoubted and abundant security was offered, bail in the sum of $1,500 could not be obtained in Virginia; and our citizens, kidnaped by lawless ruffians, must remain in jail till the middle of November before they can be tried—for acts done in this State! Whether they will be tried even then, will probably depend on the health or disposition of the prosecuting attorney."

ADMITTED TO BAIL

January, 1846.—

"Judge McComas passed down the Ohio on Monday, on board the steamboat 'Columbia.' A special term of the Court was held in Parkersburg yesterday, and Garner, Loraine and Thomas were admitted to bail in the sum of $100 each. Asa Harris of Harmar entered into recognizance for them all.

"We have now only space to make this announcement, but may, at our leisure, have 'a word or two to say' about the amount of bail required at the term of the Court held in September last—the impossibility of obtaining the kind of bail then required—the comparatively easy terms now offered, and sundry other matters connected with the history of the affair.

PLUMPTRE FOR GENERAL JACKSON.

"Not the General of New Orleans memory, but Gen. John J. Jackson, the commander of the guard what shot the Parkersburg Town Bull—mistaking it for a posse of Ohioans! Just read this and tremble, all 'Ohio Abolitionists'!"

"The Winchester (Va.) Republican says, 'That Gen. John J. Jackson, of Parkersburg, has applied to the Governor of Virginia for 300 stand of arms and authority to embody troops to repel and invasion the 'Ohio Abolitionists' may attempt!'

"Now then, 'Rub-a-dub—rub-a-dub-dub,—who'll enlist in the Parkersburg town guard?' It will be a bloodless one unless the town has bought another bull!"

"Seriously, though, an attack upon Parkersburg is already planned, and we advise the valorous gentlemen of 'the guard' to prepare themselves with three days' rations of bull-beef, scour up their guns, and be prepared 'to repel the invasion'—for we hear that an 'Independent Company' of nearly 20 Ohio boys has been formed, and they have unanimously resolved to fill their pockets with buckeyes and hickory nuts, storm Parkersburg, pelt General Jackson to death, and drive the town guard out of Wood County!"

LATER VIEWS OF THE OHIO KIDNAPING CASE.

(From the Ohio Register, 1863.)—

"On the night of the 9th day of July, 1845, three citizens of Ohio—Creighton J. Loraine, Peter M. Garner, and Mordecai E. Thomas—were seized on the north bank of the Ohio River, just above the mouth of the Little Hocking, and forcibly carried across the river, and imprisoned in the jail of Wood County, Virginia, at Parkersburg, their captors being citizens of Virginia and their offense, 'carrying away' the slaves six in number, of John H. Harwood, a resident of Washington Bottom, nearly opposite the scene of capture. Half a century hath wrought many changes, and few that witnessed the exciting scenes and incidents of that eventful period are left to relate to the younger generation the story of what transpired on the border of Mason and Dixon's Line in those early days.

"On the night named, certain citizens of Decatur township residing some four or five miles up the Little Hocking, met the slaves of Harwood at the river, and were assisting them in getting their scanty luggage out of the canoe and up the bank, when the three men above named were pounced upon by concealed Virginians, who, in their eagerness to capture their Abolition foes, permitted the slaves to escape, and on the following day the six chattels were conveyed across the country in the vicinity of Plymouth in open wagons, with the stars and stripes proudly waving over the suddenly freed and happy people.

"The exasperated Virginians now had something tangible on which to wreak their vengeance, and the three prisoners were made to feel the wrath of an outraged and indignant people. They were denied all the ordinary comforts and conveniences of prison life in the Old Dominion. They were confined with the fugitive slaves, but denied even the meagre fare accorded to these, and when bail was proffered, they were indignantly denied their liberty on any terms.

"As may be supposed, excitement ran high on both sides of the river, and when the Governor of Virginia called out her State militia to defend her border and prevent the rescue of the prisoners, the people of Ohio were just as ready to march to the rescue at once, and Governor Bartley was appealed to in thunder tones to call out the militia or accept volunteers and resent the insult, and redress the wrong, even if rivers of blood ran as a result. But wiser counsels prevailed, and the authorities determined to appeal to the courts, and to this end the Governor appointed Hon. Samuel F. Vinton, the ablest legal talent of the State, to present the claims of Ohio, while very able and eminent counsel appeared on behalf of the Commonwealth of Virginia.

"The case finally reached the State court of last resort at Richmond, Virginia, at the December session, 1845, and was so ably presented and fairly discussed that the prisoners were discharged, and thus ended a most exciting and deeply interesting period in the State's history and to a person now looking back to the eventful time, it scarcely seems possible that bloodshed was averted and quiet restored. The question in the case, relied upon by Mr. Vinton, was whether these prisoners committed any offense against the laws of Virginia, as the canoe was some 50 feet within the shore from low-water mark, and hence within the borders of Ohio, and beyond the jurisdiction of Virginia courts.

"The State militia was vigilant and alert, and no human being, black or white, could evade the sentry's stern command to 'halt,' or enter the excited village without a pass endorsed by men good and true to the interests of slavery. Even the town bull was reported to have lost his life by his persistent and bull-headed refusal to obey the command on a dark November night, when the unerring aim of a chivalrous guard laid him low in death. The militia were prone to add insult to injury, and soon after their occupation of the village, they ran out a brass field-piece to the river bank, with its business end threateningly pointed across the border toward Belpre, where many pesky Abolitionists were supposed to dwell."

Mr. Editor: The article in the Register of August 20th, on the Garner case is in error in stating that the prisoners were discharged by the Virginia Court, if it means that the Court decided the case. The following letter written by Bishop Stanton to William P. Cutler gives the facts. It is dated Little Hocking, April 22, 1846:

"The prisoners Loraine, Garner and Thomas are held in a bond of $100 each. Asa Harris was taken for the three. No Virginia bail was asked; it is my opinion that Virginia never intends to decide the case. Judge McComas told a citizen of Ohio whom he thought trustworthy that he did not suppose that prisoners ever would come back and if they did not their bond never would be sued; if they appeared at the March term and renewed their cognizance there, in that case the Court at Richmond in June would decide that the act was done in Virginia, and if they again appeared in September, sentence would be passed upon them, and a petition immediately got up for a reprieve, signed first by Judge McComas and then by all the influential men in Wood County and then to be sent to Ohio for signatures, and have them relieved before anything further can be done, and there they suppose the matter will rest. The men are ready to do anything that is thought best and wish your advice whether to appear in March or not."

This appears to have been the end of the case which never reached a final decision. Mr. Vinton, in his argument in behalf of Garner, Thomas and Loraine, gave due prominence to the fact that they were taken on the Ohio shore, "fifty feet within the shore from low-water mark," but that was not the point he relied on. He denied absolutely that Virginia had any jurisdiction beyond the middle of the Ohio River. He maintained this proposition in an argument which seems conclusive.

E. C. Davies.

"In the issue of Tuesday, the writer stated that the three prisoners, Loraine, Garner, and Thomas, confined in the Parkersburg Jail were discharged but failed to give details as to how they were discharged; not deeming it of interest to the general reader.

"The facts were, that the Court of last resort at Richmond, not desiring to commit itself on the question raised in the case, desired that the prisoners be discharged, on mere nominal bond, which was done and the Court never did decide the case, because the prisoners were never again called to appear.

"For some reason the State and Federal courts have nearly always found it convenient to dodge the question of the Southern boundary of the Northwest Territory between Ohio and Virginia, which boundary is fixed, under the grant of the State of Virginia, to all the territory 'northwest of the River Ohio.' The question which has vexed the courts is what is meant by the 'river Ohio?' Is it the center of the navigable stream, the north side at low-water mark, or does it extend to high-water mark? If to the latter mark, then these men were in Virginia, and amenable to her laws; but the Court shrank from giving this much desired construction (desired by Virginians) and had it so decided, the able counsel for defendant could have carried the case to the Supreme Court of the United States, where a settlement of the question would no doubt have released the prisoners, and then rendered the commonwealth and its officers liable for false imprisonment, a complication and probability the Virginia courts were glad to avoid by withholding their decision.

"In later years, we have had some decisions in interior courts of the States which would scarcely pass muster as sound doctrine.

"In one instance, a Common Pleas judge in Ohio held that a burglary committed by breaking into a wharf-boat moored to the Ohio shore was not within the State of Ohio, because the breaking was on the outer side of the boat, next to the channel of the river; and a West Virginia case from Jackson County was even more absurd than this: in that case the sale of liquor on board a shanty-boat, moored to the Ohio shore at high-water line opposite Ravenswood, West Virginia, was held to be a violation of the laws of West Virginia, but these cases scarcely rise to the dignity of strong precedence.

"So much for the legal aspect of the case. Now, as to the unfortunate victims of the illegal imprisonment, and what became of them. Mordecai E. Thomas soon became blind after being released, and still lives at Quaker City, Ohio. Peter M. Garner died at Columbus, Ohio, many years ago, and Creighton J. Lorraine died at Franklin County, Nebraska, last winter. They all left the filthy and damp prison much impaired in health, and never fully regained their former strength.

"Had they, for the time being, forgotten their Quaker extraction, on the memorable night, and vigorously used the weapon Nature gave them, as did some of their comrades, the Virginians would have gone home with both eyes in mourning and empty-handed.

"Other parties were present on that occasion; just how many we know not, but we think Titus Shotwell, Borden Staunton, Hamilton Cottle, Jonathan Plumley, and others, most of whom are now dead, could give some facts if living."

EDUCATION.

If education be, as some have defined it, the conscious influence of one generation upon the next to produce conformity to an ideal, then education, intellectual, moral and religious, began as soon as New England families had settled in the Northwest Territory. Among these settlers were many who had been well educated for the day, even enjoying a liberal education.

EARLY TEACHERS AND SCHOOLS.

John Mathews, one of the pioneers, had at one time been engaged to teach in the Virginia settlement near Wheeling; but other duties called him away before he had begun his school. In the colony the division of labor soon began, and one was employed to teach the children, while the rest continued the farming and the building.

From the best attainable evidence, it appears that the first school in the new settlement was taught in the northwest block-house by Maj. Anselm Tupper, in the winter of 1788-89. Dr. Jabez True also taught in the block-house and Jonathan Baldwin, who afterward settled at Waterford. Bathsheba Roush, of Belpre, was the first recruit in the great army of earnest women who have labored for the education of the youth of our country. She taught at Belpre in the summer of 1789. Daniel Mill, a graduate of Cambridge University, taught for some years at Farmers' Castle. Jonathan Baldwin, who has already been mentioned, also taught in the same place before he removed to Waterford.

The schools of that day and those that were kept up for many years later were supported almost exclusively by the subscription of the patrons. For a long time there were no houses built exclusively for school purposes. At an early day Mr. Curtis taught a school at Marietta in a cooper shop. The first school near the present site of Amesville was taught in a room in the house of Ephraim Cutler in 1801. William Slocumb and Benjamin F. Stone were among the very early teachers at Marietta.

There was a little revenue for school purposes arising from the rent of Section 16 and perhaps the earliest corporation created by legislative enactment was one to take charge of the revenue arising from these lands. For a long time school laws in Ohio were simply permissive; the township might create districts, and the districts might build school houses but there was no obligation to do this unless the people of the township took the initiative. The people, not only of Washington County, but also of the whole State, owe a debt of gratitude to Ephraim Cutler and Dr. S. P. Hildreth for their untiring efforts to secure means for popular education in every district. Mr. Cutler especially labored to secure better school laws while he was a member of the General Assembly, and Dr. Hildreth was a member of a committee to prepare a report on education for the consideration of the Assembly.

THE FIRST SCHOOL HOUSES.

The first school houses built were rude log structures, very similar to those in which the majority of the settlers were then living. One end of the school house was almost entirely occupied by the huge chimney, where great roaring wood fires were kept in the winter time. The best of these had a single horizontal row of panes of glass to serve for a window. Against the wall beneath this window, a long board supported by wooden pegs driven into the wall served as a desk for the older pupils who were learning to write. This long desk was not exactly reversible, but the pupils were, for by clambering over the bench on which they sat they could reseat themselves and have the edge of the board as a support for their backs. Houses substantially of this form continued to be used in some parts of this county within the memory of men still living.

In the other means for public instruction, designed not simply for the youth but for the whole community, the pioneers were ever alert.

In February, the agents and the proprietors passed the following resolution:

Resolved, That the 7th day of April be forever considered as a day of public festival in the territory of the Ohio Company, as their settlements in this country commenced on that day; and that the directors request some gentleman to prepare an oration to be delivered on the next anniversary.

From the first year, the Fourth of July was celebrated with due ceremony and usually an oration was delivered to perpetuate in the hearts of the young the sentiments of patriotism, which had inspired so many of the founders and nerved them to offer their lives in defense of independence. It was also provided that the memorials of another race should be carefully preserved for the instruction of future generations. The elevated squares, the mounds, the Sacra Via were to be preserved for public use. Early attempts were made to secure libraries, and it is worthy of mention that the books selected for these libraries, or owned in families, were of a serious nature—historical and theological works. Life with the pioneers was a serious matter and they had no time or taste for lighter literature. Even the poetical works read by them were of a serious and contemplative character.

IMPROVEMENT IN SCHOOL HOUSES.

The second grade of school buildings, such as were standing in this county about the middle of the 19th century, were a little better than the first; both in size and in furnishings. A typical example of the school house of 1850 is recalled by one of the boys, who learned in it his first lessons in reading and writing. It stood by the roadside near a spring. It was built of hewed logs and contained three windows, each having eight small panes of glass. Instead of the huge fireplace, a coal stove stood in the middle of the room. The board for a desk still decorated three sides of the wall and between these desks and the stove were three long low benches on which the smaller scholars sat and very often roasted, especially if the weather was very cold.

The chinks between the logs were filled with mud, from the road, which had been thoroughly kneaded by the horses and vehicles, and one of the tasks which the boys especially enjoyed was that of patching up the walls and filling the crevices, on some mild winter day, when the road had been thawed. The only ventilation afforded in this room was caused by the accidental breaking of a window pane, and as the school house was a long way from town it usually happened that two or three such apertures were to be seen. In extremely cold weather, these were sometimes stopped up with a hat or a piece of paper.

Another picture of a school house of that time is given by Miss Harriet Warren:

THE OLD SCHOOL HOUSE

O'er shadowed by the lofty trees,
Where happy birds are singing over,
And wild flowers scent the summer breeze
Beside a gently flowing river—
An ancient cabin stands alone,
Its roof with moss and grass overgrown

For three score years that time-worn pile
Has firmly braved the wintry blast,
And three score springs with merry smiles,
And sunny days too bright to last—
Have showered their sweetest offering there
In wild profusion rich and rare.

When the first rustic latch I raised,
And then the door I opened quite;
So many eyes upon me gazed,
I wondered at the curious sight,
Then took my seat with dejected look,
And studied in my spelling book.

With school-mates there so dearly loved
I spent full many happy hours,
At noontimes through the woods we roved,
And hunted for our favorite flowers,
With merry laugh and joyful song,
While swiftly flew the hours along.

That little band is scattered now
Upon the world's oft changing stage,
Some wear fame's laurel on their brow,
The poet, statesman, and the sage,
And some have round a peaceful grave
Where bending willows sadly wave.

Fond memory often brings to mind
The image of my teacher dear,
With smiling face and actions kind
In heart and word alike sincere
But I will check the rising sigh,
A rich reward she reaps on high.

The old school house—I love it well,
'Twas there in early days I met
With one who words of love did tell,
And one who truly loves me yet.
The dear companion of my youth,
Through life's prolonged and weary day.

Deserted now, its tottering walls
Into decay are falling fast,
And oft when twilight's shadows fall,
I haste me there, and on the past
I muse, methinks all death seem
A beautiful, but fleeting dream.

AGITATION FOR BETTER EDUCATIONAL FACILITIES.

In 1822, Governor Trimble appointed Caleb Atwater, Lloyd Talbot, Dr. S. P. Hildreth, J. Barber, N. Guilford, James Hoge and John Collins as commissioners "to collect, digest, and to report to the next General Assembly a system of education for common schools."

This committee made a report to the State Legislature of 1822-23 in which they speak of the "prejudice which narrow-minded and avaricious men will endeavor to excite against any system of education which will compel the rich man to pay more towards defraying the expenses of erecting school houses, &c., than the man who is not worth a dollar," but they express the hope that familiarity with the plan proposed "will be the great means of removing all hostility to its adoption." They call attention to the fact that the population of Ohio represents almost every part of the world and that many of our fellow citizens are unacquainted with any system of public education.

A few months later "Philodemas" in the American Friend discusses the subject and deplores the fact that while Ohio has within 30 years risen from nothing to be the fourth State in the Union, "the progress of literature has not kept pace with her other acquisitions." He complains that the frequent change of teachers prevents any continuity of work and thinks that "with proper instructors and proper books it is possible for the scholars to learn grammar, geography, geometry and algebra, in the same time which they now waste to acquire a smattering of reading, writing and arithmetic." He commends the educational labors of Noah Webster but thinks that "Webster's Spelling Book," now in general use in the county, "is not at all adapted to the use of beginners."

At a meeting of the Ohio Annual Conference of the Methodist Episcopal Church, held in Marietta in September, 1822, three representatives of the Wyandot Indians—John Hicks, Monoque, and Between-the-Logs—were present and made short speeches. They thanked the conference for the school established among their people and for the unselfish labors of Rev. James B. Fruley. This mission originated in the pious efforts of a colored Methodist named Stewart, who had gone from Marietta to the Indians in 1817. About the same time Cyrus Kingsbury writes to his friends in the Marietta Congregational Church (who had helped to support his work), telling of his schools among the Choctaws, of the hearty support he was receiving from the chiefs, and of the sneering way in which some members of Congress spoke of the missionary work as a farce.

Perhaps some of us in 1902 have heard a little of the same kind of talk. Those who steal from the Indians do not wish to have missionaries or teachers on the reservations.

THE FIRST SCHOOLS.

It is difficult to state with absolute certainty when the first school was established in each township, for the reason that, the organization being so simple, no records have been kept. When two or three families of settlers had begun work in the wilderness, they soon found it convenient to have one of their community, perhaps, an older son or daughter, make a beginning at a school. A room was found somewhere or somehow and this school was begun. The teacher received perhaps not more than one dollar or two dollars a week for services.

The first school reported in Adams township was taught by Enoch Wing in his own cabin in 1797. In Aurelius township Nancy Dutton was teaching in 1800 and 1810. The first school house, a log one of course, was built near where Dexter now stands, in 1815. The first school house was built in Barlow township in 1808 and the first teacher was John T. Deming. Oliver Root was one of the pioneer teachers in Decatur township, but the date of his first school is not known. In Dunham township, a school was built on the Goddard farm in 1814—Ethelinda Clark taught here in 1816. In Fairfield township, a school house was built in 1819, in which Oliver Miller was teacher. Charles Shipman taught a school in Fearing township about 1804. As early as 1810 a small circulating library had been purchased, which served a very useful purpose for a few years; finally the books were distributed among the share owners. One of the earliest school houses in Grandview township was at the mouth of Mill Creek, taught by Mr. Edington, and about the same time or a little later Mr. Flack taught at Grandview. The first school house in Independence township was built in 1835, but William Cathers had taught a subscription school in that community about 1823. The first school house in Lawrence township, near the mouth of Cow Run on the Little Muskingum, in 1810, had for its teacher, Mr. Dunkin. Miss Doffet taught a subscription school in Liberty township, but the first log school house was not built until 1838. In Ludlow township Miss Daily taught a school in 1816. In Muskingum township, Miss Levings first taught in a log school house at an early date, but the exact time is not known. Caleb Greene taught a school at his own home in 1801, in Newport township. In another part of that township, in what was then known as the "hill neighborhood," Miss Annie Plumer was the first teacher. In 1805 and 1806 in a cabin built for a dwelling but not occupied, Russel Darrow taught the first school in what is now Palmer township. John True taught a school in Salem in 1807. In 1809 John Brown taught a school in a room of Judge Cutler's house.

The next year a log school house was built in that (Warren) township. In Watertown township, which was then known as Wooster, Nathaniel Gates taught a private school as early as 1799. The first log school house in Wesley township was built in 1819—Miss Hewitt was the first teacher.

The law of 1817 permitted the forming of districts in the townships and the building of school houses. Some of our townships speedily availed themselves of this permission; in others a beginning was not made for more than a quarter of a century.

As in all other counties, the supporting of the schools was gradually assumed by the public. At first the patrons furnished the school house, such as it was, with all its equipments, that were necessarily very meager, and paid the wages of the teacher. If any parents were too poor to pay the expenses of tuition, it was provided for by private benevolence and at a very early date we find that in some townships a committee was appointed to collect donations to meet such cases.

NOTES

January 29, 1827.—

The Meeting of the Citizens of Marietta, for the purpose of forming a Society to aid in educating indigent children stands adjourned to Friday evening next (2d Feb.) 6 o'clock, at the School house in the 1st District, at which time Articles of Association will be reported. As it is contemplated to extend the benefits of the Society throughout the Township, it is hoped a general attendance will be given.

JAMES M. BOOTH, Clerk.

A little later the funds from the rent of Section 16, and still later the money collected by special local taxation, were applied toward paying a part of the teachers' wages. The remainder was made up by the payment of the patrons in proportion to the number of days school received, and one of the tasks of the teacher between 1830 and 1850 was the computation of the amount due from each of these patrons, and the collection of the same. Sometimes the public money was expended in paying the teacher for a very short term, perhaps not more than two months and the teacher was then permitted to continue the school for the benefit of those who chose to subscribe for the same.

EXAMINERS OF COMMON SCHOOLS.

As we have shown in another part of this chapter, some of the earliest teachers were men liberally educated in the East, and as settlements multiplied it was impossible to find thoroughly qualified teachers for all the schools. The following notice, first appearing April 1, 1825, marked a new step in the educational progress of this county:

In pursuance of the law "To provide for the support and better regulation of Common Schools," passed at the last session of the Legislature of this State, the following gentlemen were appointed Examiners of Common Schools for the County of Washington, at the late term of the Court of Common Pleas, viz.:

Mr. William Stevenson, of Marietta.

Mr. William P. Putnam, of Belpre.

Anselm T. Nye, Esq., of Waterford.

The section of the law requiring this appointment makes it their duty to examine every person wishing to be employed as a teacher, and if they find such person qualified and of good moral character, to give a certificate to that effect.

We are requested to state that the Examiners of Common Schools propose meeting at the Muskingum Academy in Marietta, on Saturday the 9th of April next, at one o'clock, P. M., and subsequently on the third day of each term of the Court of Common Pleas for this county.

When it was first proposed to add English grammar to the list of enumerated branches required of teachers in public schools, one of the best teachers then in the county said that it would be impossible to supply the schools, if this requirement were rigidly exacted. However, from 1825, a county certificate has been demanded of those teachers who were to draw from the public funds, except for the short period when by the law of Ohio every township was permitted to elect its own examiners.

"An act to provide for the support and better regulation of Common Schools," passed February 5, 1825, makes it the duty of the trustees of each incorporated township to lay off the same into one or more school districts. It also provides, that no township shall be entitled to receive any part of the moneys collected for school purposes, until the same shall be laid off into districts, etc. We would suggest to the trustees of townships that have not complied with the law in this respect, the propriety of causing the same to be done as soon as practicable. It is essential to the interests of the rising generation that the requisites of this law be strictly attended to."

1831.—

At a meeting of the Examiners of Common Schools in Washington County, held at the court House in Marietta on the first day of November, 1831, there were present, William Slocomb, William Pitt Putnam, John Brown, John D. Chamberlain, Caleb Emerson of Douglas Putnam. William Slocomb was appointed chairman and Douglas Putnam, clerk.

The following regulations for the government of the Examiners were adopted:

1. The Board of Examiners will hold an Annual Meeting at Marietta, on the second day of the Fall Term of the Court of Common Pleas in each year.

2. The Examiners for the several Townships shall meet for the examination of Teachers on the first Saturday in April, June and October.

3. Each Examiner shall keep a record of all persons to whom he shall grant certificates and of the several branches in which they are authorized to teach; and shall return a Report of the same to the Clerk of the Annual Meeting.

4. Every person applying for examination, who is not personally known to the Examiners, shall produce satisfactory evidence of good moral character.

5. Every person shall apply to the Examiner or Examiners in the Township where he or she may reside, or where he or she proposes to teach school; and in case there is no Examiner in such Township, then application shall be made to the Examiners in one of the Townships adjoining.

6. No Examiner shall grant a certificate to a person from a Township where any other Examiner resides, unless said certificate shall be first signed by the Examiner in such Town; or unless sufficient cause is shown to render such examination necessary.

7. The Examiners shall require from all Teachers the following qualifications, viz., a knowledge of Reading, Writing and Arithmetic, at least so far as to comprise the Rule of Three.

8. The Examiners shall visit the Schools in their respective Townships from time to time as they shall deem expedient; and in ordinary cases, at least as often as once in each quarter.

9. These regulations may be altered or amended at any Annual Meeting of the Examiners by a vote of a majority of the Examiners present.

It was decided that for the current year, the Examiners of the several townships should meet on Saturday, the 19th of November, for the examination of teachers. It was ruled that teachers might be examined either at the Annual Meeting, or at the quarterly meetings of the Examiners in the several townships.

COMMON SCHOOLS.

At the last session of the Court of Common Pleas for Washington County, Jonas Moore, Wm. Slocomb and Douglas Putnam, were appointed Examiners for Teachers of Common Schools.

Being vested by the late school law, with authority to appoint Examiners in distant townships, the Board have appointed Doct. G. N. Gilbert, of Belpre, Doct. George Bowen, of Waterford, and Mr. Ebenezer Battelle, Jr., of Newport, Examiners for the term of one year.

The regular quarterly meetings of the Board will be held at the Library Hall in Marietta, on the first Wednesdays in September, December, March and June, at 10 o'clock A. M.

By order of the Board,

Wm. Slocomb, Clerk,

Marietta, Aug. 7, 1838.

COMMON SCHOOLS OF WASHINGTON COUNTY.

September, 1841.—

The undersigned, having been appointed Examiners of Common School Teachers for Washington County, deem it proper to state the general principles by which they will be governed.

1st. In regard to certificates of good moral character. We shall in all cases require that such certificates be from persons of known probity, and as far as practicable, from magistrates or other public functionaries. This rule is necessary to prevent impositions, which have sometimes been practiced.

2d. In regard to literary qualifications. The law requires that the teacher should be qualified to teach reading, writing and arithmetic. We can not regard any person as qualified to teach reading, who is not well acquainted with the elementary principles, as the sound of words, modulations of the voice, pauses, etc.—or who can not give evidence of his knowledge of these principles by his own manner of reading.

The following gentlemen are appointed Examiners of Female Teachers—and are authorized to grant the certificates: Doctor G. N. Gilbert, of Eelpre; Doctor Campbell, of Waterford; and Rev. Allen Darrow, of Newport.

The Board recommended the following books for the use of all the Schools in the county:

Eclectic and Webster's Elementary Spelling books, do. Readers—and Porter's Rhetorical Reader. Slocomb's and Adams' Arithmetic, and Colburn's First Lessons, Smith's, Pond's and Murray's Grammars, Mitchell's and Smith's Geographies, and we earnestly recommend that a lesson be read from the Bible in all schools at least once a day.

The quarterly meetings of the Examiners will be held on the first Wednesdays of October, January, April and July, at the counting room of Slocomb and Buck, in Marietta, at 2 o'clock P. M.

Wm. Slocomb,
Hiram Gear,
E. B. Perkins.

EDUCATIONAL NOTICES.

MUSKINGUM ACADEMY.

The Trustees give notice that Mr. Levi Keyes has this day opened a school in the Muskingum Academy in which will be taught the following branches, viz.: Latin, Greek, Mathematics, Rhetoric, Logic, Chemistry, Natural and Moral Philosophy, Astronomy, Grammar, Geography, Reading, Writing and Arithmetic.

The price of tuition depends on the branches taught. Application for admission may be made to Mr. Keyes at the Academy.

NOTICE.

The annual meeting of the Education Society of Marietta will be held at the Brick School House in the 1st District on Monday the 3d day of September next, at half past 6 o'clock P. M., when a report will be made of the proceedings of the Society. A general attendance of the members, and all others friendly to the Society is requested.

By order of the Managers,

J. Shipman, Sec'y.

Marietta, August 28th, 1827.

EDUCATION.

The Subscriber proposes to teach a small class of Young Ladies at his own house, commencing about the 1st of May next. Besides the common English branches, he will teach Projecting maps, Natural Philosophy, Astronomy, etc. He has the various optical glasses and other apparatus, necessary to exemplify the philosophy of vision, colors and several other subjects connected with the above studies.

April 30, 1830.

A CARD.

The Subscriber gives notice that his School is now open for the reception of pupils of both sexes. The course of instruction includes all the branches usually taught in Common Schools; and (if desired) Natural Philosophy, Belles-lettres, Latin language, &c. &c.

The school room is pleasantly situated—is spacious and well arranged for the accommodation of pupils. No exertion on the part of the instructor will be spared to render the school worthy of patronage. Jno. Pearce.

YOUNG LADIES' READING SCHOOL.

*They laugh at all our gifts, in busy vain?
Come, bring art, and teach the Ladies' Pen.*

The undersigned having taught several classes of Males, with success, sufficient (as he hopes) to establish his qualification as a teacher of Penmanship, now proposes to organize a class of Young Ladies.

The Ladies are too often deficient in this indispensable branch of Education, in which they might so easily and so eminently excel. To remove this defect, and enable them to write with neatness and facility, the undersigned (if patronized) promises to devote his most assiduous exertions.

VERMILION.

Samuel Hall

Respectfully informs those who may be interested in the cultivation of Musical Science, that he proposes opening a school on Monday evening Jan. 7th, for instruction in the theory and practice of singing.

For further particulars please apply at the basement story of the Library Hall.

December 28, 1832.

JUVENILE SINGING SCHOOL.

The subscriber proposes to open a school for the instruction of the youth and children of Sabbath Schools embracing those from eight to sixteen years of age in the principles and practice of vocal music.

It is a false notion, entertained by many, however, that the gift of an "ear for music" is limited to a few happy ones, while the great majority are wholly incapacitated by nature to learn the art. There is no more difficulty, nor near as much, in learning a child to sing correctly as there is in learning him to talk, or read. Indeed all languages are only different systems of intricate sounds, that require much time, practice and patience in their combination to express ideas; and let the same, or even the tenth part of the time, patience and practice spent in the acquisition of a language be devoted to music, either vocal or instrumental, and ninety-nine hundredths of the pupils would make equal progress toward the complete mastery of the science. Nothing is more common than to hear individuals complain "they have no ear for music, and can not tell one sound from another." But let the same persons have spent as little time and trouble in learning to talk, or read, as they have in learning to sing, and any language on the face of the earth would be to them only unintelligible gibberish—they would have no ear for it, and could not distinguish one word from another.

Should sufficient encouragement be given, a course of instruction, comprising sixty lessons, of two hours each, from three, till five o'clock P. M. on five days of the week will be commenced.

Terms—two dollars per scholar—one-half payable in advance. Names may be left at the printing office.

SCHOOL.

C. B. Guthrie has opened a School in the Brick School House on the first district of Marietta, in which will be taught all the branches of a common English education, viz.: Orthography, Reading, Writing, Arithmetic, Geography, English, Grammar, History, Rhetoric and Composition. From his experience in teaching and liberal terms, he hopes for a share of the patronage of the inhabitants of the place.

TERMS.

Orthography, Reading and Writing, $2.00; Arithmetic, Geography, Grammar, &c., $2.50.

N. B.—The school is open to those living out of the district, by paying the additional sum of 42½ cents, for the use of the room.

School Directors.

Marietta, June 8, 1837.

SCHOOL DIRECTORS.

"As the season has arrived when our winter school should commence, it may not be amiss to make a few suggestions to those who, in an important sense, have the direction of the education of our youth.

"In the first place, it is very important that the directors should employ persons to teach, who are well qualified to discharge the important duties entrusted to them. If this part of their duty be neglected, attention to all other parts will be comparatively useless.

"Directors should take care that the house, in which the school is to be taught, be rendered as comfortable and pleasant as possible.

"Proper seats, and writing desks that are firm and steady, should be provided. Care should be taken that these be of different heights, to accommodate the different ages of the pupils. The proper height for a writing desk is, when the right arm rests easily upon it, and the body being nearly erect. Seats for small scholars should always be furnished with backs, the practice of furnishing seats for scholars with no support to the back, and often too high for the feet to reach the floor, is highly injurious in its tendency.

"It is the business of the Directors to furnish a good supply of fuel, and see that it is properly prepared for use; so that the room may be comfortably warm at the proper hour. A want of attention to this part of their duty will be attended with more loss and inconvenience than is generally supposed. Directors can render an essential service to their districts by ascertaining what books are needed in school, and by procuring such as are necessary to furnish something like uniformity for the different classes. Parents sometimes feel that they cannot afford to purchase the necessary books; whereas, they should feel that they cannot afford to do without them, and thereby lose much of the benefit which they might otherwise derive from the school.

"Directors should also sustain the teacher in the government of his school. To do this effectually, the school should be frequently visited by some one or all of them. This should always be done at or near the commencement of the term; when the scholars should be plainly told that no improper conduct could be allowed—that if any of them should disobey the requirements of the teacher they would, if unreclaimed by proper admonition, be dismissed from the school. It would be well for the Directors, at each subsequent visit, to make inquiries relative to the deportment of the scholars, and publicly admonish those who manifested a spirit of insubordination. If teachers would keep a daily register of the punctual attendance, and recitations of the scholars, to be exhibited to the Directors at each visit, much good would result. A knowledge of the fact that the Directors will faithfully discharge all of these duties will go far towards promoting the best interests of the school.

"Directors should hold free and frequent intercourse with the teacher in private, for the purpose of learning the particular state of the school, and for devising plans for its improvement. This will inspire him with zeal to prosecute his work with diligence. It is often the case that teachers commence their school with a good degree of ambition faithfully to discharge their duty. But soon find that they have the co-operation of no one. If faithful or unfaithful, no one is likely to know much about it. They soon become discouraged, and the temptation is strong to get through the quarter as easily as possible, and call it a bad job well over. Whereas, could they have had the co-operation of the Directors, the whole state of things would have been a different aspect.

"The following school books are recommended for use in the schools in this county, viz:

Reading, Spelling, and Readers.
Smith's Geography and Grammar.
Cobb's First Lessons.
Shuman's Arithmetic.

"By order of the Board of Examiners for Washington County.

"Wm. Slocomb, Clerk.

"The school law makes it the duty of this officer, before the spring election of township officers, to ascertain what sum of money is required to keep a free school in the township the ensuing year for at least six months. He is then to satisfy himself what amount of public funds will be furnished from the State Treasurer, from taxes and from lands, and, if from all these sources there is not money enough to support the schools free at least six months in each year, he, the township clerk, is bound by law and by his oath (because he is sworn to execute the law) to give public notice before the spring election of the amount of deficiency of school funds, and cause a vote to be taken by the people on the question whether the additional funds shall be raised by a tax on the property in the township or not.

"So far as information has reached me, a great majority of the townships where the vote was taken, have agreed to raise the money, and I hope that next spring every township clerk in the State will present the question as required by law to the people, so that they can vindicate themselves from the charge of being hostile to universal education."

TEACHERS' INSTITUTE.

Under some name have been held in this county since 1837, as the following minutes will show:

Marietta, November 7, 1837.

An audience assembled in Convention at the Baptist Meeting House, at half past six o'clock P. M.

The object of the meeting briefly explained by Caleb

Emerson, Esq., Mr. Wm. Slocumb was chosen Chairman, and Royal Prentiss, Secretary.

The exercises were opened by prayer by the Rev. Hiram Gear. Prof. Jewett offered a resolution for the appointment of committees to report on the following subjects:—on which the chair named the gentlemen below:

1. On the expediency of forming an association for promoting the interests of Common School Education; and, if thought expedient, to present a constitution for the same.—Prof. Jewett and Dr. S. Fuller.

2. On the best method of teaching the elements of Reading.—Mr. L. Tenney.

3. On the best method of teaching Grammar.—Mr. Theodore Scott.

4. On the introduction of Vocal Music into Common Schools.—Rev. Mr. Haensel.

5. On the Construction of School Houses.—Mr. T. Scott.

The Chairman then delivered an address on the defects of Common Schools.

A discussion then ensued on the following question:—Ought our Common Schools to be wholly supported by public funds? In which Messrs. Emerson, Gear, Haensel, and Jewett took part, deciding in the negative.

The convention adjourned, to meet to-morrow at half past nine o'clock.

November 8, 1837.—The convention met agreeably to adjournment, was opened by Professor Allen. The Report of the "Construction of School Houses" was read and accepted.

The following question was then presented for discussion, Ought the Legislature now to raise the standard of qualifications for Teachers? After a debate, in which Messrs. Allen, Emerson, Douglas Putnam, and Maxwell participated, it was voted that the further discussion of the question be postponed.

Rev. Mr. Gear addressed the Convention on the importance of the co-operation of parents with the teachers of their schools. Adjourned; two o'clock.

After prayer by the Rev. Mr. Haensel, the report on "the best method of teaching the elements of Reading," was presented and accepted.

The report on "the introduction of Vocal Music into Common Schools" was presented and accepted.

The Committee appointed above, reported in favor of the expediency of forming an association for promoting the interests of Common School Education, and presented a constitution for the same. The constitution was read and adopted.

On motion the convention proceeded to organize the association, which was done by the election of the following officers:

President, William Slocumb.

Vice-president, Theodore Scott.

Secretary, Thomas W. Ewart.

M. P. Jewett, Shubel Fuller, Charles Emerson, L. Tenney, Argalus Pixley, Marietta; E. Marsh, Watertown; Wm. P. Putnam, Belpre; Wm. R. Browning, Belpre; Joseph Barber, Newport; Wm. Dana, Newport; R. Scott, Ludlow; Isaac Proctor, Grandview; Geo. Templeton, Lawrence; Thomas F. Stanley, Fearling; John True, Salem; Wm. W. McIntosh, Aurelius;

Matthew Gray, Liberty; P. B. Buell, Adams; Joseph Barker, Union; S. Deming, Jr., Watertown; Hiram Gard, Roxbury; Vincent Smith, Wesley; Jesse Lawton, Barlow; Judson J. Hollister, Warren; Eli Gilbert, Decatur; Directors.

The convention then adjourned till half past 6 o'clock.

At half past 6 o'clock the convention met. Prayer by Rev. Mr. Gear.

The report on "the best method of teaching Grammar" was read and approved.

Rev. Dr. Linsley delivered an address on "the relation of College to Common Schools."

The following resolutions were presented by Professor Allen and adopted.

Resolved, That this convention recommend to the several townships within this county to form associations within their respective limits, auxiliary to the "Washington County School Association."

Resolved, That the co-operation of parents, with the teachers of their schools, is essential to successful efforts for the benefit of the scholars.

Resolved, That in the opinion of this convention the introduction of Vocal Music into our Common Schools would be highly conducive to the intellectual advancements, the moral elevation, and the individual and social happiness of the pupils.

Resolved, That the teachers of common schools throughout the county be especially invited to become members of this association.

Vote, That the thanks of this convention be presented to the Baptist Society for the use of their Meeting House during its sitting.

Vote, That the proceedings of this convention be published in all the newspapers printed in this county.

Adjourned sine die.

Wm. Slocumb,
Chairman.

Royal Prentiss, Secretary.

WASHINGTON COUNTY SCHOOL ASSOCIATION MINUTES.

The first semi-annual meeting of the Washington County School Association was held at the Baptist Church in Marietta, beginning Tuesday evening, May 1, 1838. The president having briefly explained the objects of the Association, Hon. Ephraim Cutler made a report on the application of the public school fund by the districts, which report was accepted. The following resolutions, offered by Professor Jewett, were adopted:

Resolved, That no speaker shall occupy the floor more than 15 minutes at a time.

Resolved, That no speaker shall have the floor a second time while any gentleman who has not spoken may desire to do so.

Resolved, That no vote shall be taken on the questions debated before the Association, but the discussion shall at any time be arrested by a vote to lay on the table.

The question "Ought corporal punishment to be entirely discarded from our Common Schools?" was discussed by Messrs Slocomb, Jewett, Lionel Tenney, Lewis, Reed, and Hollister.

Dr. S. Fuller made a report on physiology as a branch of common school instruction, and the following question was discussed: "Ought emulation, as it generally exists in our Common Schools, to be encouraged?" Messrs. Gear, Lionel Tenney, and Emerson were appointed a committee to report on "What motives are proper to be used in our schools in exciting scholars to study?"

The question "Ought the Legislature now to raise the standard of the qualifications of teachers?" was discussed by Messrs. Allen, Douglas Putnam, Lewis, Emerson, Hollister, and Linsley. An address was delivered by Professor Jewett on "the use of the Bible in our Common Schools." Lionel Tenney made a report on "the best method of teaching English Grammar." After an address by Samuel Lewis, Esq., State Superintendent of Common Schools, the following resolutions were adopted, after which the meeting adjourned to meet in Belpre the first Tuesday of November following:

Resolved, That a committee of three be appointed to report at the next meeting of the Association whether it would be expedient to establish State institutions for the education of Common School Teachers—if it be deemed expedient, then to report on the practicability of the measure, and present a detailed plan for establishing and regulating such institutions.

Professor Jewett, J. M. Booth, Esq., Rev. Mr. Haensel, Committee.

Resolved, That a like committee be appointed to report on the subject of School Libraries for townships or districts with a plan for establishing and regulating same. Lionel Tenney, Dr. S. Fuller and David Deming, Committee.

Resolved, That a like committee be appointed to report what further improvements are required in Common Schools to insure for them the attention and patronage of those citizens who now neglect such schools, as well the wealthy as all others. Professor Allen, T. Scott, Professor Maxwell, Committee.

Resolved, That a like committee be appointed to report on the expediency of circulating a Monthly Periodical at the expense of the State for all the school districts of the State. Douglas Putnam, Rev. H. Gear, J. J. Hollister, Committee.

Resolved, That in the opinion of this Association a firm and salutary discipline may ordinarily be maintained in our schools by the skillful employment of moral persuasion; and that the teacher should resort to corporal punishment only in cases of extremity and when all other proper modes of influencing the pupil have failed of success.

Resolved, That this Association highly approve of the measures adopted at the last session of our Legislature for promoting the interests of our Common Schools, especially that which secures the labors of an able and efficient Superintendent.

The following rules for the regulation of the Board of Directors of the Washington County School Association were adopted at the meeting of the Board January 12, 1838:

1. It shall be the duty of the Board to cause at least two weeks public notice to be given before the holding of the semi-annual or annual meeting of the Association. Also to assign the topics and subjects for lectures and discussions to the several speakers whom they may engage at least twenty days previous to the meeting of the Association.

2. All resolutions offered shall at the request of any member be reduced to writing.

3. It shall be the duty of the Secretary of the Board to keep a record of their proceedings. Also to put on file all instruments of writing which may be submitted to him either by any member of the Board or of the society for their consideration, and read the same in connection with the proceedings of the last meeting.

It will be noticed that the Board of Directors were required to assign topics and subjects for lectures and discussions to the several speakers whom they would engage. Therefore, preceding the meetings of the Association, meetings of the directors were held for this purpose.

The annual meeting of the Washington County School Association was held in the Presbyterian Church in Belpre, beginning Tuesday evening November 6, 1838.

An address was delivered by Joseph Barker, Esq., giving a history of common schools in the early settlement of the country. Beman Gates made a report on "the introduction of Vocal Music into Common Schools." A discussion of the subject followed the acceptance of his report, in which Messrs. William R. Browning, L. Lewis, E. Adams, J. J. Hollister, George Dana, Judge Loving, and the president participated. An address on "the influences of education upon the mind" was delivered by W. W. Hartwell. Rev. Mr. Jolly made a report on "introducing moral and religious instruction into Common Schools," which report was accepted, and then its subject matter discussed by Joseph Barker, Esq., William P. Putnam, L. Lewis, George Dana, Caleb Emerson, Rev. Mr. Kingsbury, J. J. Hollister and the president.

The president of the Association delivered an address on "School Discipline." Professor Allen, Rev. Mr. Gear, Theodore Scott, Caleb Emerson, William P. Cutler and the president were appointed a committee to prepare articles on the subject of common school education for the political papers of the county. Theodore Scott reported on the best methods of promoting common school instruction by the Association. A general discussion was had on the improvements necessary in common schools to insure for them the attention and patronage of every class of citizens, in which Professor Allen, Caleb Emerson, Professor Maxwell, William P. Putnam, C. Ames, Joseph Barker, Jr., Judge Loving, Rev. Mr. Jolly and George Dana participated. On motion of L. Lewis it was,

Resolved, That the next year, 1839, the County Association be organized to deliver lectures on the subject of Common School Education, to report selected school discourses, and their plans, to attend the same, to the Convention of the Association.

The following officers and directors for the ensuing year were elected:

The second semi-annual meeting of the Washington County School Association was held in the Methodist Episcopal Church in Newport, beginning May 7, 1839. Gordon Battelle delivered an address on "the Universality of the claims of Education." Rev. Mr. Gear delivered an address on the connection between intellectual and moral culture. Mr. Andrews delivered an address on the general subject of "School Instruction," and Beman Gates, on request, made some remarks on the subject of "Vocal Music," with a plan of teaching the same in public schools. Rev. Mr. Strickland made a report on "the use of fixed questions in text books," which was discussed at length by Rev. Mr. Gear, Joseph Barker, Jr., George M. Woodbridge, W. W. Hartwell, Caleb Emerson, Lionel Tenney, Mr. Kenney, Mr. Andrews and others. W. W. Hartwell presented a report on "the use of the blackboard," and in the discussion that followed, Caleb Emerson, Judge Barker, Professor Allen, Joseph Barker, Jr., Lionel Tenney and Mr. Kenney participated. Lionel Tenney presented a report on "the best method of teaching Geography." E. Kinney presented a report on "Mental Arithmetic," which was discussed at length by members of the Association. The meeting adjourned to meet in Marietta the first Tuesday in November.

At the meeting of the Board of Directors held October 11, 1839, addresses and reports were assigned to different members of the Association, and the president was appointed to inform teachers where they could obtain situations, and to inform districts where teachers could be obtained.

The Washington County School Association met at the Baptist Church in Marietta November 5, 1839, for its annual meeting. An address on "the benefits of School Associations as a means of promoting the interests of Common Schools," prepared by Judge Barker, was read by George M. Woodbridge. Caleb Emerson delivered an address on the subject of "General Education," and Prof. Henry Smith gave an address on "the influences of popular education on our civil and religious institutions." E. Kinney presented a report on "Composition in Common Schools," and in the discussion that followed, Rev. Mr. Gear, William Slocomb, George M. Woodbridge, Lionel Tenney and G. Dana participated. William Slocomb, Rev. Joel H. Lindsey, Rev. A. Darrow, George Dana, William A. Whittlesey, Beman Gates and Julius Deming were appointed delegates to the State Education Convention. Theodore Scott presented a report on "School Discipline," which was followed by a discussion. E. Adkins presented a report on "the evils of a want of punctual attendance in "Common Schools," which brought out a full discussion. Lionel Tenney reported on "the introduction of apparatus into our "Common Schools." The following resolutions were adopted at this meeting:

Resolved, That the Directors of this Association be requested to employ a person to lecture on the subject of "Common Schools" in all the Townships in this County, and take measures to defray the expenses by subscription or otherwise, as may be deemed most proper.

Resolved, That this Association recommend to the several school districts of this County, to purchase a box of apparatus for the use of their schools.

Resolved, That the several clergymen laboring within the county be requested to deliver addresses as they may have opportunity, on the importance of Common School instruction; and also to use their influence in obtaining full meetings to attend the meetings of the lecturers appointed by the Directors.

The third semi-annual meeting of the Washington County School Association met at the Cumberland Presbyterian Church at Beverly, commencing Tuesday, May 7, 1840. A report, prepared by John Woodbridge, on "the expediency of introducing the Bible into common schools" was read by Rev. Mr. Strickland. Professor Andrews offered the following:

Resolved, That the introduction of any one mode of school government into our Common Schools should be a serious detriment to the cause of education.

Which, after a discussion, was laid on the table. Dr. S. Fuller delivered an address on "the influence of exercise and diet on the mind." The question, "Ought the Legislature now to raise the standard of qualifications of teachers?" was discussed by Professor Andrews, W. W. Hartwell, Rev. Mr. Strickland, S. B. Robinson, Dr. Baldwin, Mr. Prentiss and President Slocomb, and was decided in the affirmative. The question, "Is it expedient for teachers of Common Schools, in order to produce the greatest amount of usefulness, to deliver lectures upon the principles of civil government?" was discussed by Caleb Emerson and Mr. Cutler, and was decided in the affirmative. A lecture was delivered by President Slocomb on "the responsibilities and duties of teachers." The following resolutions were adopted:

Resolved, That the introduction of any one mode of school government into our Common Schools would be a detriment to the cause of popular education.

Resolved, That writing compositions ought to be introduced into our Common Schools.

The annual meeting of the Washington County School Association for 1840 began Tuesday evening, November 10th. An address was delivered by President Slocomb on "the duties and responsibilities of teachers." Addresses were also delivered by Caleb Emerson, William D. Emerson and Lionel Tenney. The address of William D. Emerson was on "the influence of education on the perpetuity of our republican institutions." The following reports were presented: "The Jurisdiction of Teachers," by Amos Viller; "Improvements in Teaching," by Lionel Tenney; and "Rhetorical Reading" by Professor Andrews. "The relative importance of the study of English grammar in our Common Schools and High Schools" was discussed by Messrs. Perkins, Gear, Slocomb and Emerson. William Slocomb, Beman, Gates, Rev. H. Gear, Arius Nye, George M. Woodbridge, William P. Cutler and William R. Putnam, Jr., were appointed delegates to the State Convention to be held in Columbus the following December. The following officers and directors were elected for the ensuing year:

The fourth annual meeting of the Washington County School Association was held in the Baptist Church in Marietta, commencing November 2, 1841. The following addresses were delivered: "Qualifications of Teachers," by Prof. John Kendrick of Marietta College; "Importance of the connection of moral with intellectual instruction in our schools and colleges," by E. B. Perkins. William D. Emerson reported on "Improvements in Teaching," which was discussed at length by Rev. H. Gear, E. B. Perkins, Caleb Emerson, President Slocomb, A. Spaulding and Lionel Tenney. Professor Andrews reported on "the influence of different kinds of reading for the young," and the subject matter of the report was discussed at length by Caleb Emerson, E. B. Perkins, Professor Kendrick, Professor Maxwell, Rev. H. Gear, Professor Andrews and Lionel Tenney. A report was read on "the state of Common Schools in Washington County" by Joseph Barker, Jr. After its acceptance the following resolution was adopted on motion of Mr. Barker:

Resolved, That five solicitors be appointed to obtain funds which shall be applied under the direction of the directors in the employment of agents to visit the different towns and districts in the county and deliver lectures on the subject of "Common School Education."

Joseph Barker, Jr., E. B. Perkins, Lionel Tenney, William P. Cutler, and A. Spaulding were appointed as the five solicitors.

William Slocomb, Joseph Barker and Caleb Emerson were appointed a committee to petition the Legislature to pass an act to prohibit any German school being taught to the exclusion of English in any district. Messrs. Gear, Emerson and Kendrick were appointed a committee "to report at the next annual meeting on the proper books to be used in the Common Schools of the County, with a list of the books they may recommend, and their reason for preferring them." It was decided that the next meeting would be held in Watertown, in the Presbyterian Meeting House, on the third Tuesday of May following. The following officers and directors were chosen for the ensuing year:

President, William Slocumb
 Vice-president, Judge Barker
 Secretary, F. B. Perkins
 Directors, Alfred Dana and E. Short,—Adams
 William R. Browning and George Dana,—Bel-

November 1, 1842.—

The Association adopted the following resolution:

Resolved, That in the opinion of this Association it is desirable that the study of Natural Sciences be introduced into our Common Schools.

September 9, 1843.

On motion, it was

Resolved, That a committee of three be appointed to correspond with other School Associations and friends of education, in order to secure their cooperation in petitioning the Legislature to provide some more efficient mode than the one now adopted of visiting Common Schools.

John Kendrick, E. B. Perkins and Beman Gates were appointed.

The following question was taken up for discussion:—"Are teachers' drills practicable, and ought they to be encouraged at the present time, and recommended to the consideration of teachers?" Messrs. Tenney, Burgess, Cutler, H. McClure, Kendrick, Emerson and J. J. Hollister participated in the debate.

On motion, the question was so amended as to substitute in place of the words "Teachers' drills," the words "Teachers' Associations for mutual improvement." The question as amended was then put to a vote, and carried in the affirmative.

November 4, 1845.—

The officers and directors elected at the annual meeting held on this date were as follows:

President, E. B. Perkins
 Vice-President, I. W. Andrews
 Secretary, Beman Gates
 Directors, Jonas Mason and Daniel Davis,—Adams
 William R. Browning and O. R. Loring,—Bel-

May 5, 1846.—

G. Dana, Jr., introduced the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Science of Agriculture ought to be introduced as a study into our Common Schools.

Which was referred to a committee of three,—G. Dana, Jr., William P. Cutler, and J. J. Barker, to report at the next meeting.

November 3, 1846.—

Professor Andrews introduced the following resolutions:

Resolved, That this Association regards with great favor the introduction of the study of the Natural Sciences into our Common Schools.

Resolved, That a regards Resolution, Sec.

ence) is not adapted for the purpose of instruction and would be detrimental to gradual introduction into the Common Schools of this County.

Resolved, That in the judgment of this Association no teacher ought to be considered as possessing the qualifications necessary to give instruction in the best Common Schools unless he can pass an examination in these subjects.

These resolutions were discussed by Messrs. Slocomb, Burgess, Caleb Emerson, Andrews, Kendrick, Tenney, Heath, Perkins and Smith. The first two were adopted, and the third laid on the table.

The attention of the Association was called to the July meeting of Teachers' Institutes as now conducted in some portions of the State, and as recommended by the Secretary of State. On motion it was,

Resolved, That the Examiners of the County, together with D. E. Gardner, William P. Cutler, G. Dana and I. W. Andrews, be requested to make inquiries concerning the establishment of such a one at Marietta the coming fall. And should they deem the plan advisable, to take the necessary measures for carrying it into operation.

November 3, 1847.—

The following resolutions were introduced and passed:

Resolved, That this Association respectfully and earnestly request the Board of Commissioners of Washington County to make the necessary appropriations for the support of a County Superintendent of Common Schools and a Teachers' Institute, the ensuing year, provided an act should be passed by the Legislature authorizing the same.

Resolved, That the Secretary be instructed to present said resolution to the Commissioners at their Spring Session and urge the motives for complying with its request.

Mr. Gardner also introduced the following resolution which was made the order of the day for the adjourned meeting of the next morning:

Resolved, That this Association request our Senator and Representative in the General Assembly of the State of Ohio, to procure the extension, to the County of Washington, of the provisions of an act, entitled "An act to provide for the appointment of County Superintendents of Common Schools, etc." passed February 8, 1847. And also an act entitled "An act to encourage Teachers' Institutes," passed February 8, 1847.

September 30, 1848.—

Hon. William P. Cutler, Hon. R. E. Harte and Prof. John Kendrick were appointed a committee "to present the subject of appointing a County Superintendent before the County Commissioners—in case of failure of an appropriation from that source, said committee to endeavor to raise funds by subscription for the purpose."

Professor Andrews made a report on union schools, showing the great advantages of the system over the ordinary isolated districts, after which remarks on the same subject were made by Messrs. Kendrick, Slocomb and Perkins.

The officers and directors elected for the ensuing year were as follows:

President, Hon. William P. Cutler
Vice-president, Rev. Gideon Dana
Secretary, Prof. I. N. Andrews
Directors, Dr. Blackledge,—Adams
John Corry, Esq.,—Averetts
Rev. D. C. Perry,—Barlow
William R. Browning and George Dana, Jr.,—

Rev. Mr. Smith and A. D. Hollister,—Warren
I. B. Robinson,—Waterford
David Deming,—Watertown

November 12, 1851.—

Professor Andrews offered the following resolutions, which were adopted:

Resolved, That the best interests of education in Ohio demand a thorough supervision of our schools; and that we hereby earnestly urge upon the attention of the Legislature the importance of the appointments of a State Superintendent, and such Assistant District Superintendents as from time to time may be necessary.

Resolved, That copies of the above resolution be transmitted to the Senator and Representative from this District, and that they be respectfully, yet earnestly, solicited to use their influence for the accomplishment of the object therein mentioned.

Mr. Bailey, formerly superintendent of schools in Ashtabula County, was invited to address the Association. Mr. Bailey took for his subject: "Examination of Teachers," and showed the importance of having examinations conducted by the whole Board of Examiners, of having stated times, and of conducting the examinations mainly by written questions.

In Volume 1, of the Ohio Journal of Education, the Teachers' Institute, beginning at Marietta, November 10, 1851, is reported as having enrolled 104 members. The instructors, who in that day served without pay, were, E. D. Kingsley, P. R. Kendal, Rev. H. Bates, Beman Gates, I. W. Andrews and L. Andrews. Since that day, at the annual meeting of the Washington County Institute, the teachers have received instruction and encouragement from teachers widely known throughout the State and nation. For the last 35 years the fees received from teachers' examinations have furnished the funds sufficient to procure lecturers and instructors of the first class. For this means of support to the institute, the teachers of Ohio are largely indebted to the wise forethought of Hon. E. E. White, who now lives in Columbus. Besides the annual meeting, which has usually been held in Marietta, the teachers have had many local meetings, sometimes under the direction of the county committee; sometimes under the special township committee. In these, practical questions have been discussed and many teachers have found them even more profitable than the larger annual meeting.

WILLIAM SLOCOMB.

Hon. George M. Woodbridge gives us this picture of one of the early teachers:

"Across the street was the home of William Slocomb, the veteran school teacher, and his brothers, Silas and John. But we must not pass with the mere mention of the name of William Slocomb. For many years he was the instructor of the youth in the upper part of the town. His place for teaching was in the old Academy building, which stood, until a few years ago, immediately north of the Congregational Church building. His punishment of scholars in those days was of the old-fashioned kind, by furling the hand and using the switch. But opinions sometimes change, and so did those of Mr. Slocomb, upon the subject of school government. Later in life he became the advocate of the abolition of corporal punishment in schools and the government of even the most unruly by moral suasion. We will here be allowed to relate an incident which occurred at a teachers' convention in Newport, after Mr. Slocomb's change of views. In a talk, of an hour's length, he denounced the whipping of scholars and advocated milder means. After the completion of this talk, a young man, who had once been his scholar and many times felt the weight of the ruler and the sting of the switch, had the temerity to speak of this and to make light of the change of views of the old gentleman. Among other things, he said that within the radius of an eighth of a mile of the old Academy building there could not be found a straight limb, as in the early growth of the trees switches had been plucked for the use of the teacher. Aroused by this unwarranted attack of his former scholar, the old-time teacher arose and excitedly remarked: 'Yes, I well remember the school boy days of the last speaker, and never until now could determine whether I punished him too much or too little. But this much I do know, that in this case either was a failure.'"

TOWNSHIP HIGH SCHOOLS.

The most improved forward step made in our district schools has been the organization of the township high school with the principal as superintendent of schools. In 1888 Marietta township, which included all the territory of the township outside of the separate districts of Marietta and Harmar, resolved to build a high school at Sand Hill. Fortunately for this Board of Education, John T. Duff, a superintendent who had had much experience in grading and managing public schools, was by his private business called back to this county. He was invited to take charge of the schools of this township and in a very short time he had the high school in good running order and the district schools well graded. One of the patrons of this school said, that at the close of the first year he had saved enough in the board and traveling expenses of his children to pay for the entire cost of the high school. His successors have been H. E. Smith, H. C. Frye, C. C. Smith, L. E. Booher and F. L. Maury. Already a small library has been collected in each sub-district.

Waterford township followed the good example set by Marietta and established a high school in 1894 with C. S. Joseph as principal and superintendent. Mr. Joseph taught the school five days in the week, from Tuesday to Saturday inclusive and spent Monday in visiting the district schools, making the task a heavy one for him, but he discharged his duties in a creditable manner and left the schools of all grades in good order for his successor, L. E. Booher.

Belpre and Decatur townships have made some beginning at the organization of schools of a higher grade than the sub-districts.

It is said that Wesley township is also about to adopt the plan of a township high school, with the veteran teacher, Patrick Henry, as principal.

In some other townships, the separate district or the village school has served the purpose of a central high school, especially since the law has been so framed, as to requiring the payment of tuition for those pupils who have passed the common school examination. Lowell, in Adams township, has a graded school with a high school course. It has been reported in the State Commissioner's Report since 1888; Supts. J. L. Jordon and D. A. Leake.

The same year, Macksburg appears in the state report with F. P. Wheeler as superintendent. W. E. Ellison and C. C. White have been his successors.

Barlow township has two graded schools. Barlow village, reported since 1896, has had four superintendents, A. M. Farlow, John Lawton, J. R. Franklin, and G. W. Perkins.

Vincent, a separate district, has had two principals,—F. B. Shaner and A. M. Farlow.

In Belpre township what was probably the first circulating library in the Northwest Territory was established. The books were probably brought by Col. Israel Putnam in 1795. For many years this library of formidable books was a very improved educational factor in that township. At last they were distributed among the share-owners and it is said that some of them are preserved to this day. Belpre school as a separate district was first reported in 1872; the following names appear in the list of superintendents, in the order here given,—E. S. Cox, L. D. Brown, W. N. Spencer, C. K. Wells, J. G. Schofield, C. E. Keyes, Frank P. Ames, J. C. Barnes, E. D. Albright, C. E. Githeus, E. K. Barnes, M. L. Fearnow, and S. E. Weaver.

In Fearing township, Stanleyville, near the center, is a separate district and contains a school partially graded. In Grandview separate district, first reported to the State Commissioner in 1884, P. L. Topie, R. K. Walton, and J. F. Hannun, have successively served as superintendents. Newport separate district appears in the State Report after 1885 and its superintendents have been: G. W. Welty, J. W. McDaniel, L. E. Booher, F. J. Bailey, H. C. McKinney, and W. E. Seabock. Their first union school building was destroyed by fire, but they now have a new and commodious structure amply sufficient for the growth of the town.

New Matamoras has the following list of superintendents, beginning in 1889: John H. Martin, A. D. Hoffer, D. F. Grier, C. C. Middleswart, S. A. Wiggins, C. W. True, and C. E. Caldwell. They have a large and commodious building and a school attendance next to Marietta.

Harmar, as a separate district from 1866 to 1890, reported the following superintendents,—J. F. Lukens, M. R. Andrews, John T. Duff, N. M. McLaughlin, Jefferson Heston, J. D. Phillips, H. A. Meyers, and J. L. Jordan. Since that time it has been a part of the Marietta City district.

Beverly began as a separate district in 1854 with John Tarbell as teacher of the upper grades. It began the formation of a district library with the State donation in 1885. Its superintendents have been: Z. G. Budee, Jefferson Heston, T. C. Ryan and the present incumbent, J. F. Wagner, who has been in service in that position since 1889 and is therefore in years of service the ranking superintendent in the county.

Watertown separate district has been reported since 1895. L. E. Booher and G. W. Perkins have been superintendents.

The plan of union schools adopted by Akron in 1847 was quickly followed by other townships in the State. In May, 1849, the schools of Marietta were organized on the union plan. The very name is suggestive of a change which those of the present generation can hardly understand. Why union schools? Simply because at that time there were five separate districts in Marietta, each with its own ungraded school, having no more connection one with the other than do the sub-districts in a township. In fact, not nearly so much as the sub-districts now have under the present law. These five separate districts were united, that is, formed into a union of schools, which rendered graded schools possible. The first Board of Education consisted of Dr. I. W. Andrews, T. W. Ewart, R. E. Harte, Lucius Brigham, E. H. Allen, and Robert Crawford. Theodore Scott, who for many years taught a private school in Marietta, was the first teacher of the grammar schools. As a natural result of a system of graded schools, a high school was found necessary and organized in 1850 with E. D. Kingsley as principal of the school and superintendent of all the schools. In 1855 Hon. M. D. Follett took charge of the schools, teaching in the high school until 1857, when he resigned to begin the practice of law.

For many years Marietta had no general superintendent of schools but the principal of each school building had general charge over the group of schools in his building, while the principal of the high school examined pupils for promotion to that grade. This system would hardly have been possible had not such members of the School Board as Dr. I. W. Andrews, Dr. John Boyd and others, performed many of the duties in the general management which now devolves upon a superintendent.

In 1873 Supt. E. A. Jones, of Massillon, was called to take charge of the Marietta schools but after two years of very successful service he returned to his former home where he is still superintendent of schools. From 1879 until 1891 C. K. Wells was superintendent. He was succeeded by W. W. Boyd and he in turn by H. G. Williams in 1898. In 1902 Mr. Williams resigned his position to accept that of dean of the new Normal School connected with Ohio University and J. V. McMillan was elected in his place.

OTHER MEANS OF EDUCATION.

WASHINGTON COUNTY BIBLE SOCIETY.

The Ohio Bible Society was organized at Marietta, October 22, 1812, with Gen. Rufus Putnam, president; Rev. Lyman Potter (of Steubenville) vice-president; David Putnam, treasurer; and Samuel P. Robins, secretary.

We give extracts from some of their reports to show what this society did for education in this county:

"Report of the directors of the Washington County Bible Society, presented at the annual meeting, on Friday evening, January 4, 1828.—

"The directors of the Washington County Bible Society, in presenting their sixth annual report, would express their grateful acknowledgements to the Father of all our mercies that they have been spared to meet the members of the Society at this anniversary. In reviewing the operations of the past year, the Directors deeply regret that they have effected so little in the great cause in which they are engaged. Our labors have been far disproportioned to the wants of the destitute. While we believe that the operation of the Society has not been without its benefits, we must at the same time confess that the exertions, which have been made for the circulation of the Scriptures within the County, have been far less than what our ability and our duty requires of us. We have looked forward with pleasure to this annual meeting, as a new era in the history of our operations, or those of our successors, and we believe that our expectations will not be disappointed.

"At the time of our last annual report, the Society had funds to the amount of $18.45, and a small supply of Bibles and Testaments. Since then we have purchased of the Ohio Bible Society 71 Bibles and 96 Testaments, at a cost of $88.98. There have been issued from the depository during the past year, 60 Bibles and 102 Testaments, making the whole number since the commencement of the institution 316 Bibles and 465 Testaments. Some probably yet remain in the hands of agents, but the exact number we cannot state. Twenty-five Bibles and 19 Testaments have been distributed gratuitously since the last annual report. The receipts into the treasury during the past year have amounted to $106.12 1-2 of which $39.50 were received on subscription, and $66.62½ for sales of Bibles and Testaments, and from the estate of the late treasurer. We have at present on hand 17 Bibles and 36 Testaments, and funds to the amount of $35.59."

The following is taken from the seventh annual report of the directors of the Washington County Bible Society, made in January, 1829.—

"At the meeting of the directors last February they made the necessary arrangements for the purchase of Bibles, and appointed two of their number as the general agents of the Society, one on the east, and the other on the west side of the Muskingum, to whom was entrusted, under the direction of the Board, the power and duty of appointing subordinate agents in such parts of the county as they might think fit, and supplying them with Bibles for distribution. In the execution of this business, your Directors and general agents have met with many difficulties, but none such as materially to retard the work. They have great reason to be thankful to God, that the difficulties have not been greater, but that the work has been accomplished to the extent that we have previously mentioned. In our last annual report we estimated the number of families in the county, destitute of the Bible, at 300; a number then thought by many, to have been far too great; but so far from having been so, it falls far short of what has been found to be true. The number of Bibles distributed by our agents in several townships, by donation, sale for cash, and on credit, is as follows:

Aurelius, 14	Newport, 18
Barlow, 9	Roxbury, 35
Belpre, 18	Salom, 23
Deeter, 7	Union, 10
Feating, 18	Warren, 10
Lawrence, 33	Waterford, 46
Grandview, 25	Watertown, 32
Ludlow, 25	Wesley, 18

"In addition to the above, a considerable number have been sold and distributed directly by the general agents. The number of Bibles donated is about 120; of the balance, a large proportion have been sold on credit, and for many of which the Society will never receive the payment. We have not the means of stating the exact number of families, who were found to be destitute, as in some cases the agent sold Bibles to those who were previously in possession of one, but we feel safe in saying that the number exceeds 450. In the township of Grandview, the number of destitute families was estimated by our agent there at 10. It will be seen above that 35 have been distributed there, nearly, if not quite, all of which were among the destitute.

"The manner in which these Bibles have been received, though in some cases such as to cause Christians to mourn, have, in others, been attended with pleasing circumstances. One of our agents states that in many instances the Bible was received with evident tokens of gratitude, and thankfulness to the Society; while in others, but few cases, with the most marked opposition."

It has been given that a meeting of the friends of morality and religion will be held on Thursday evening, the 22nd inst., at 6 o'clock, in the Methodist Meeting House, for the purpose of organizing a Union to promote the observance of the Christian Sabbath. The attendance of all the friends of the Sabbath is respectfully invited.

Also, notice is given that the same evening a Committee will make report upon the necessity and expediency of forming a Society for the promotion of temperance.

THE MARITENNA LIBRARY ASSOCIATION.

It is one which bears no light testimony to the standard of literature in this town. The Association is composed generally of members resident in town, who are stockholders. They possess an excellent library, containing none but choice and valuable works, comprehending history, biography, travels, belle lettres, natural and moral philosophy, standard works on the arts and sciences, the most authentic and genuine authors on law, medicine, and theology; as also files of the ablest reviews, and journals of the present day, while at the same time 'light reading,' in general, is rejected. Here may be found a rich repast for all who love a mental feast. And much credit does it reflect on Marietta, that to the valuable collections now in use, new and important additions are constantly being made. A very neat and commodious building containing three rooms; two offices which are rented, and the Library Hall, the depository of the library; the upper story forming one large arched room, which is occupied by the Marietta Lyceum, as also by two of the religious societies of the town. Long may this institution flourish, and continue to prove of interest and improvement to all.

"Another instance of the taste for literature, which Marietta possesses, may be noticed in the fact that the Universalist Society devotes the property which annually accrues to its treasury, to the acquisition of an extensive and valuable library. The collections of books is large, and the selection of them has been able and well judged.

111 MARILYN FERGUSON M

"Is an institution well calculated for the extensive diffusion of useful knowledge. It was founded nearly three years ago, and has at present on its register the names of 85 members. Regular meetings are held, at which are occasionally delivered lectures on chemistry, and other subjects connected with natural philosophy and history, with the improvements constantly making in the arts, and discoveries in the sciences, and on many other subjects of interest and importance. Discussions are regularly held for the improvement and pleasure of the members. The Lyceum has in its possession a handsome electrical apparatus; and measures have been taken to design a map of Marietta and vicinity, which will probably be published at a future period by this institution.

"We might refer to other societies of less note, which, like small rills, tend in their consequence, to help pour forth their tribute of knowledge and learning in the common cause of education, and point out the 'Phila-Mathesian Society,' and the 'Society of Inquiry,'—both formed and sustained by the young gentlemen pursuing their collegiate studies at the Institute, but we hesitate to intrude further on our readers' attention at this time."

FIRST MECHANICS' LYCEUM.

To Incorporate the First Mechanics' Lyceum of Marietta, in the County of Washington.

a common seal and they may break or alter the same at pleasure.

MR. EDITOR:—Attracted by curiosity, I have several times attended the discussion of various subjects, by the members of this society (Mechanics' Lyceum), and I can assure you that I have spent but few evenings more pleasantly. As its name indicates, it is composed exclusively of mechanics, mostly of young men, who in their debates evinced a degree of skill and eloquence worthy of praise. The frequent reference to historical authors shows that the art of public speaking is not the only good to be derived from a society of this kind. To furnish arguments for debate requires much study, and the amount of useful information thereby obtained can never be lost. It is indeed a cheering sight to see our young men, instead of partaking of the sinful pleasures of the card table, or the chequer board, instead of wasting their time at the grocery or the tavern, thus wisely devote their leisure hours to the pursuit of knowledge. To the originators of this society too much praise cannot be awarded, and under difficulties, which to many appeared insurmountable, they preserved and complete success has crowned their efforts. The society, I understand, numbers about 75 members, who for intelligence and polemic skill are unequalled by any lyceum which it has been my fortune to visit. These few remarks, thus loosely thrown together, may serve to call the attention of our citizens to this society, which has sprang into existence as if by magic, and which is capable, and I doubt not will produce beneficial results. Societies of this kind should be encouraged by every means in our power, and I am confident will be by the citizens of Marietta."

NOTICE.

There will be a public debate at the Masonic Hall, on the evening of the 7th day of April, commencing at 6 o'clock, when the following question will be discussed, viz.: "Have the Catholics been more persecuted than all other denominations combined (the Jews excepted)?" Ladies and gentlemen are invited to attend.

By order of the Mechanics' Lyceum.

MATTHIAS MOOT, Secretary.

Marietta, April 3, 1838.

CONCERT.

March 30, 1839.—

A Concert of Instrumental and Vocal Music will be given by the Marietta Town Band, under the direction of their instructor and leader, at the Presbyterian Church on Monday evening, April 8th, commencing at 7 o'clock. The assistance of a first rate Pianist is engaged for the occasion.

An address on the subject of Music, will be delivered by Mr. Beman Gates. Further particulars of the performance will be made known by a bill. Tickets at twenty-five cents each may be had of the Treasurer at the store of Messrs. Edgerton & Woodbridge.

A HINT ON HOME TRAINING.

"Mr. Prentiss—You will oblige a friend of the youth of our town and county by publishing the following—which is for the particular notice of parents, guardians and instructors, and is well worthy of their consideration.

"We believe that the slight regard in which strict truth is held among mankind is principally owing to the lies which are told to children by their parents during the first few years of their lives. Then is the time that permanent impressions may be as well made as at any later period. It is then, probable, that what is called the natural propensity of a child is unfolded. Many persons who have a great abhorrence of lying, and whip their children if they detect them in it, yet make no scruple of telling and acting to them the most atrocious falsehoods. There are but a few parents who do this in a greater or less degree, though doubtless without dreaming they are guilty of criminal deception. With many the whole business of managing their children is a piece of mere artifice and trick. They are cheated in their amusements, cheated in their food, cheated in their dress. Lies are told them to do anything that is disagreeable. If a child is to take physic, the mother tells him that she has something good for him to drink; if reluctant, she says she will send for the doctor to cut off his ears, or pull his teeth, or that she will go away and leave him, and a thousand things of the same kind, each of which may deceive once and answer the present purpose. Parents are too apt to endeavor to pacify their children by making promises of a ride, or a walk, or something else which will please them, but without any intention of gratifying them. This is lying, downright lying. People think nothing of breaking their promises to children, if the performance be not perfectly convenient. But they are the last persons to whom promises should be broken, because they can not comprehend the reason, if there be one, why they are not kept. Such promises should be scrupulously redeemed, though at a great inconvenience, and even when inadvertently made. For the child's moral habit is of infinitely more consequence than any such inconvenience can be to the parent."

SABBATH SCHOOLS.

The Society in Marietta for the Promotion of Good Morals, organized in 1814, made a long report of its work in 1819. From this report we make a few quotations:

"In April, 1817, the Society resolved to patronize Sunday-schools, and appointed a committee to establish and superintend two or more Sunday-schools in the town. On the 11th of May, 1817, three schools were organized and opened in Marietta; one, at Buell's school room, under the superintendence of William Slocomb; one at the Muskingum Academy, under the care of E. Huntington; and one at Point Harmar, under the charge of Dr. Cotton. To each of these schools several young gentlemen and ladies were engaged and attached as assistant teachers.

"The learners were employed in reading the Scriptures, committing portions to memory, and in such other lessons as are usually taught in such institutions. Several commenced with the alphabet and made good proficiency. The schools were continued 20 Sabbaths, to the last in September, when the season rendered it inconvenient for the children to assemble, on account of the distance some of them had to go.

"In 1818 only two schools were opened; one at the Muskingum Academy, under the care of Mr. Slocomb, and the other at Point Harmar under the superintendence of Mr. Judson. To the school in the Muskingum Academy 130 were admitted and to the one at Point Harmar, 78.

"The schools this season, as they were the last, have been composed of adults and children, male and female, white and black.

"Summary: The whole number of scholars in the two schools, 208; the whole number of verses learned in both schools, 45,784; highest number committed to memory by one scholar, 3,517."

The report is signed by David Putnam, S. P. Hildreth, and John Cotton.

They also make note of the fact that Mrs. Hannah Mathews had through the summer of 1819 maintained a Sunday-school on the Muskingum, six miles above Marietta, and that Miss Sophia Barker had done the same not far away on the other side of the river.

Proceedings of the Board of Commissioners for Schools in the county of Washington at their annual meeting held October 4, 1820, and Exhibition of the Sabbath-schools:

"The members of the Board and of the Sabbath-school Committee convened at the Congregational Meeting House in Marietta where the following report was read and accepted, viz.:

Report of the Sabbath-school Committee.

It is deemed unnecessary by your committee to make a long report to address any arguments to prove the utility of Sabbath-schools. This would be equivalent to produce a proof which has repeatedly been made, and may we not add, of which you have had ocular demonstration.

Your committee made the necessary arrangements for opening the school in the town early in the season, which commenced on the third Sabbath in October. William Holyoke has had the charge of the school at the Muskingum Academy, William Slocomb, on Point Harmer, and Wyllys Hall and Miss Sally Emerson at the upper point. The number of scholars who have regularly attended through the season is about 175.

Owing to the propensity which has existed in the schools generally to commit more to memory than would be done in a proper manner, your committee were induced to recommend that 25 verses be committed to memory by each scholar.

"A communication was received from Rev. William Boies, of Waterford, stating that during the summer months four Sabbath-schools had been kept at Waterford, and three at Wooster.

"It was further stated that much satisfaction was felt at the flattering success that had attended the first attempt to establish Sabbath-schools in that vicinity, and that strong desires had been expressed that they should commence earlier in the opening of another spring."

SUNDAY-SCHOOL NOTICE.

The friends of Sunday-schools in the County of Washington are informed that a County Sunday-school Union, has been formed auxiliary to the American Sunday-School Union, for the purpose of aiding in the establishment of Sunday-schools in the several townships within the County, and furnishing suitable Books for Libraries.

Any Township, or District Union, on becoming auxiliary to the County Union, and paying one dollar into its treasury, will be furnished with Books at reduced prices, and also be entitled to a loan from the Library of Books, to half the amount of those purchased.

It is hoped that all who are interested in the instruction of the rising generation in useful knowledge, will avail themselves of the facilities now offered for accomplishing that benevolent object.

Applications for Books should be made to Mr. Samuel Shipman, Agent of the Union.

SABATH-SCHOOL OCCUPATION, FOURTH OF JULY, 1828.

July 20, 1828.

The Sabbath Schools connected with the various denominations in Marietta and the surrounding country are invited to unite in celebrating the anniversary of our National Independence, on the 4th of July next. The Schools are requested to meet at the Court House in Marietta, at 10 o'clock A. M. precisely, where a procession will be formed immediately, and accompanied by a Band of Music will proceed to the First Congregational Church, where the Declaration of Independence will be read, and addresses appropriate to the occasion will be delivered; after which the procession will be again formed, and repair to the grove on Second street, where suitable refreshments will be provided.

SOCIETY FOR THE PROMOTION OF TEMPERANCE.

CONSTITUTION OF THE SOCIETY FOR THE PROMOTION OF TEMPERANCE.

June 7, 1822.

Preamble.—Believing that the use of intoxicating liquors for persons in health, is not only unnecessary, but hurtful—being injurious to health and vigor of body, the property, reputation and happiness of individuals and families, as well as to the moral character of society in general; therefore, resolved, that both for our own good and the benefit of the community in which we live, we the subscribers form ourselves into a society and adopt the following Constitution:

Article 1. The Society shall be known by the name of the Marietta Society for the Promotion of Temperance.

Article 2. The Society shall consist of all those persons of sound and sober mind and upwards, who will sign this Preamble, Constitution and Pledge.

Article 3. The officers of the Society shall be a President, two Vice-Presidents, a Secretary and Treasurer, an Executive Committee of four members, who together shall form a Board to devise such means and prosecute such measures as they may deem expedient to promote the general objects of the Society as expressed in this Constitution, with power to fill all vacancies in their own body.

Article 4. It shall be the duty of the President, and in his absence, a Vice-President, to preside at all meetings of the Society, and of the Board, and to call special meetings when requested by the Board or any five members of the Society.

Article 5. It shall be the duty of the Secretary to keep a copy of the Constitution in a book for that purpose, record the names of the officers and members, record also the transactions of the Society, and conduct its correspondence.

Article 6. The Society shall meet annually on the second Monday in April when the Officers shall be chosen by ballot.

Article 7. Nine members of the Society shall constitute a quorum for the transaction of business.

Article 8. We, the subscribers, pledge ourselves to abstain entirely from drinking ardent spirits, except as a medicine, and that, in all suitable ways, we will lend our influence for the promotion of temperance.

Article 9. This Constitution may be altered or amended by the concurrence of two-thirds of the members present at any annual meeting.

"The Society of Marietta for the Promotion of Temperance was organized April 13, 1829. The foregoing constitution had been adopted as the constitution of the Society at a very large and respectable meeting of the citizens of this place previously held. The number of members at present is about 125, with the prospect that many more will yet be added. The success of the Society thus far has transcended our most sanguine expectations. A great change has been wrought and is still taking place in relation to the subject of temperance and the high importance of using every means to promote it among ourselves and in the community in general. And we are not alone. A general excitement prevails upon this subject throughout our land. The nation begins to awake to the evils which threaten us as a people. Enquiry is aroused—public opinion is undergoing a rapid change and the press has become a most powerful auxiliary to the good cause. Societies have been formed in almost every part of the Union for the promotion of temperance, with a view of checking the evils of intemperance which have come in upon us like a flood and which have threatened to sweep away the bulwarks of our free institutions. The only safety of our republic is in her public virtue. Without this our government must fall. With out this our beloved land will become one wide waste of moral and political desolation. The appeal of the temperance cause is to the very heart of every patriot and every lover of his country and of her free institutions, because its sole object is to diminish the causes that threaten to undermine and corrupt the virtue of the community.

"We understand that three other temperance societies are already formed in this county. We hope other places will follow immediately the example, until one is formed in every township in the county. Other counties in this State are moving forward nobly to this work; and surely Washington—the oldest county in the State—should not be the last in a cause which commends itself to the approbation of every thinking man.

"Let but the community in general awake to the importance of this whole subject to the vital interest of the present and future generations, and the five hundred societies which already exist would soon be increased to five thousand—and five times five thousand.

"The Board of Directors of the Marietta Temperance Society have taken measures to procure some of the ablest productions on the subject of temperance which have been lately published, and probably will be able to furnish individuals or societies with a few copies, aside from those which they hope to circulate among their own fellow citizens."

NOTICE.

July 11—1830.

A special meeting of the Marietta Society for the Promotion of Temperance, will be held at the Methodist Meeting House on Wednesday July 11—1830, five o'clock, P. M. An address will be delivered. Members are requested and citizens invited to attend.
E. EMERSON, President.

"It was found upon thorough and minute investigation, that, during the year which preceded the formation of this Society, according to the most accurate estimate that could be made, not less than 790 barrels of ardent spirit were sold by wholesale and retail to the inhabitants of this town and county, and were consumed within these limits. The wholesale cost of this amount of ardent spirit was estimated at not less than $5,600.

"In this estimate no account was made of the ardent spirit sold at retail in the groceries and taverns of the town. If this had been reckoned there is no doubt the quantity cost of the whole would have been very much increased. We have reasons to doubt that the estimated amount of sales was much below the truth as it was then reported.

"Within a few days last past the Board have taken measures to have a minute and very exact investigation of the amount of sales within the last year to the town and county, from all stores, taverns and groceries in Marietta who deal in the article; and from the most accurate estimate, that can be made, they find that the whole number of barrels sold to the town and county within the last year is 310. The cost of the whole, reckoning it an average wholesale price, namely, 20 cents a gallon, the same price at which the former estimate was made, is $2,170, showing a reduction in the sales of $3,430. And they have reason to believe that this whole sum has been actually saved to this town and county within the past year."

MARIETTA FEMALE SEMINARY.

"We know not when we have passed a more agreeable hour than on the morning of Tuesday last, at the school room of our friends, Mr. Lionel Tenney and his accomplished lady, the distinguished principals of the Female Seminary of this city. We had availed ourselves of the courtesy of an invitation to be present at the Examination with no slight anticipation of pleasure; for we had heard many things to the credit of the institution; but we must confess we were by no means prepared for much that we listened to and witnessed. Did our limits permit, it would afford us pleasure to detail in order all the exercises of the Examination. As is the case, however, we have space to refer only to the "Scrap Book," in which were recorded some of the literary productions of the young ladies of the Seminary, both in verse and in prose; and we must be permitted to observe, that some of the articles to which we listened would ornament the columns of any periodical in the land. The subjoined, which we are suffered to lay before our readers, and for which we are sure of their thanks, is a perfect gem, in its way. It is hardly inferior to the celebrated lines of Caroline Bowles on a subject similar. It is from the pen of a young lady of this city who, if she choose, may win a bright and enduring fame. Our columns are always open to her.

LINES

Suggested By the Corpse of a Motherless Infant

They have closed his mild eyes, his sad wailings are o'er,

He will need the kind watching of strangers no more;
They have laid him asleep in his coffin to rest,
With his little cold hands gently clasped on his breast.

His fair brow wears a sadness so chastened and mild,
One would know that he gazed on a motherless child.
Oh! why was that mother thus hurried away,
From the tender mercies that courted her stay?

Had Love's power no magic to loosen the clasp
That was freezing her heart by its withering grasp?
Could not that babe's wailing the mother have stayed?
No! the summons had come and it must be obeyed.

With a calm resignation she yielded her breath,
And triumphantly trod the "dark valley of death."
Like a fair smiling blossom she passed in an hour,
And the bud in its freshness soon followed the flower.

Me thought as it breather its young spirit away,
That a fair bright-winged seraph bent over his clay;—
That she tuned in its ear a glad song of the blest,
And then bore the sweet cherub away on her breast."

Exhibition of Miss Martin's paintings.

August 24, 1841.

The public of Marietta, Harmar, and vicinity, are respectfully informed that on Monday next, August 23d, the exhibition of Miss A. M. Martin's Paintings will commence in Marietta, in the house lately occupied by Charles Sullivan, Esq., on Second street, where it will continue for a short time only, previous to proceeding down the river. The rooms will be opened every day, between the hours of 10 and 12 A. M. and 2 and 4 P. M. There will also be an evening exhibition twice a week, on Mondays and Thursdays, from 7 till 9, when Music will be in attendance.

Admission tickets, 25 cents during the day, 37½ cents for the evening.

September 4, 1841.

(For the Gazette.)

"Mr. Editor:—I had the pleasure, the other evening, of visiting Miss Martin's paintings, which are now being exhibited in this place. I had heard them spoken of in terms of high commendation before, and of course was prepared to expect a delectable treat. But I must admit that my anticipations were more than realized. The singularly judicious taste with which they were got up—the neat arrangement—together with all the minute shades and colorings of the various parts—display ingenuity and skill (if I should be the judge), rarely surpassed, especially for one of her years and opportunities—or rather want of opportunities.

SCHEMES FOR THE BETTERMENT OF MANKIND.

From time to time the public have been enlightened about various schemes for the betterment of mankind. On the 14th of June, 1825, Robert Owen, an enthusiastic philanthropist and a friend of the poor and toiler, arrived in Marietta. By request he delivered a discourse at the Court House, which was very interesting. He explained, as much as possible in the limited time, his new system of society which he was about to introduce into this country. Mr. Owen at that time was about to found a new society at Harmony where all might have equal advantages. The design was worthy of the generous founder, but human nature with its sloth and selfishness proved stronger than his benevolent theories.

In the intellectual development of a community, the eccentric genius who is usually considered a "crank" may sometimes perform a useful service. He may at least awaken curiosity. The following is a fair sample of notices which were published by Mr. Page in 1822; and occasionally for many years thereafter:

ANOTHER NEW THEORY.

I have associated a few hours of my morning, by bowing seven times to the intellectual Sun. I invite a general attendance of enrolled members at the Court House every Sunday and Wednesday evening at early candle light. Controversy is inadmissible; but each member in rotation may (unless he declines it) sing, preach, or read from any book he pleases, and in union with any religious opinions, he may entertain, during his fifteen minutes. The church government is a pure democratic level. Much and various music is expected.

Given under my hand and seal of charity at Aurora's Temple of Knowledge opposite the Elevated Square (of Truth).

August 1, 1826.

There is at present a person in this city, calling himself by the name of Edward Postlethwayt Page, who wears a long and ample black gown, an unshaven beard, and subsists after the manner of the priests of Brahma, upon cold vegetables and water. He professes the combination of Vedical Magic and Geometry, and is confident he can remove the thick veil of ignorance which has been held before the eyes of the world for centuries. He lays great stress upon his discoveries of the numerical exposition of the Chaldee Astrologer's Alphabet, in his opinion the most grand and invaluable mystery of the famous Zodiac of Dendera. We have been favored with several of his essays, which however we have declined publishing, because we are not willing to lend currency to that which is beyond the limits of our comprehension. He terms himself, "High Priest of Nature," and holds a regular or irregular doctrine termed "The Eleusinean Code." All the truths which the ancient Egyptians knew, he professes to understand. He has lately been traveling over the U. States, last at the new settlement of the Valley Forge, making converts, and intends journeying on in his work with patience and industry. He is about to publish several works, to which several learned and scientific professors of New York and Philadelphia have subscribed;

amongst others, at about one with the following title—"The Jew's Harp of Nature—opening the Sibyl—our Bible's terrible Books—announcing the death of Christendom in seven years." Mr. P. himself informed us, the results of his sciences are so terrible in their nature, that we desire to learn nothing more of them. The world has now something else besides Capt. Symmes to talk of. Philadelphia Freeman's Journal

Mr. Prentiss:—In 1824 a little prior to Robert Owen's first arrival in America, I went to Washington, distributed my printed memorial to each member of that Congress, for a grant of a million acres of land in East Florida in behalf of my "Scientific Commonwealth." When read in the Senate, it expired for need of breath. I then embarked for St. Domingo, intending to petition Boyer; but was wrecked by a gale and lost $650. With the remainder of my damaged cargo, I visited South America, and found it a paradise for communities. But those superstitious people could not estimate how unity gives knowledge; knowledge, wealth, power and plenty.

The "Scientific Commonwealth," over which I preside (and Sol, like the head of anybody, must guide the rest of the planets), has commenced at Emblem Town, seven miles from Marietta, between Duck Creek and Maskingum River; and several families are now in full co-operation, one for all—all for one!—My school begins this week. We receive scholars to board, &c., on moderate terms; mutual instruction our method, with its monitorial discipline.—But we inculcate no other religion than that of nature, and reverence to the Great Spirit of the Universe; by which we learn to love each other, and do all the good we can.

Do me the favor to publish this communication. Not that we seek members. Too many, alas! will seek us. The Community I was three months associated with at Valley Forge, near Philadelphia, was overwhelmed by a rush of importunate applicants, and there was not fortitude enough to refuse them. All that have failed have been surcharged in the commencement.

August 30, 1828—

By my refraining from all hot and animal food; and from milk, butter, cheese, eggs, inebriating beverages, foreign tea, coffee, and all tobacco, I prove, that this diet is best for the sturdiest (if their wheat bread, like mine, be coarse or brown); I ordain the revival of Prince Triptolemus's Eleusinean Mysteries as explanatory of Symbol Divinity.—Our College is forming, not amid the noxious fogs of Ohio's water-courses;—but on my healthy and level hill farm, called Emblem Place, by the new road, five miles from Marietta, exactly. I shall apply for a charter. I grant to this College near 500 acres of land in Fearing Township, (150 under fence) during my natural life, rent free. Each member works half the day and studies the other half.

I invite from among all nations the youths of either sex, who by the diet are eligible.

August, 1828.

P. S. Surely all newspaper editors will oblige me by giving this publicity. E. P. P.

May, 1820—

As introductory to the establishment of Halls of Science throughout Ohio, similar to Miss Frances Wright's at New York, I shall deliver her Oration, adapted to all such occasions, at the Court House (if those in charge of the same permit), on Monday next, at sun down.

E. P. Page to the Public.—Greeting.—With the will of God (whose Church our priests and priestesses of Theism are about to establish)—on each future Sunday, during the hours of the divine service, I shall appear at the School-house nearest our Town Point; then and there to officiate as high priest of the Theists.—The Bible will be read in due order, a Latin verse first, and then its English verse. (The great John Locke said, that a mother might teach herself and children Latin by such a method.) The prayers, psalms, and hymns, and sermons will be cautiously selected from other Churches, that no trumpery trash may be imposed upon the audience. Music when practicable. Astrology and Magic are purely the science of analogy, applied to the Emblems, or picture language of nature. But the tremendous depth of this science forbids that the vulgar should be taught it until they can understand it. On these occasions I shall exclude these twin sisters. They appertain to our initiated members.

To the Faculty of Marietta College

Gentlemen:—My regard for good manners, arising more, I think, from a native benevolence, than from adventitious circumstances, has checked my movements toward you, at least until your college became, as now, an established institution of learning.

Lukewarm I permit you no longer to be towards my discovery. Either declare it true or false in a public and official manner.

Justice to Science—justice to the public, to your scholars, and to me, demands that ere I leave Marietta to impart my system, I obtain of you some credential as a testimonial that my science of sciences is genuine, and is a part of the ancient oracles, that was lost and is found.

In the name of Truth, I exhort you to investigate my Oracle of the Millennium, now in the Press; and if by remissness and a cold indifference, you indirectly omit to perform that sacred duty to your God, your country, and to me.—Then I pledge myself to declare war against your college, as unworthy the station it has assumed.

As individuals I esteem you;—but as a collective body, I only respect you when conservators of science. I have been patient long enough. Is my astronomical discoveries true or false? Answer that.

If you say false, prove it.—If you say true, then I demand a letter to that purport from you collectively, addressed to the Faculty of every other college. There is no alternative.

With due respect and loyal consideration, I lay the honor to be your obedient humble servant.

Marietta, March 23rd, 1840.

Our genial and public spirited friends, Dr. H. B. Shipman, who has recently been called away from us, has left the following sketch of Mr. Page:

"There died in Marietta May 17, 1857, a man of fine presence, robust, sturdy and purely English in physique, of high culture and fitted by education to adorn any society, but hopelessly insane on figures.

"Edward Postlethwayt Page, High Priest of Nature and Emperor of the Sun and Moon, was a remarkable man. A gentleman in every respect, affable, courteous, exceedingly kind and polite, an intelligent talker on almost all subjects, until suddenly he would strike off upon his one absorbing topic, squaring the circle and its accompanying vagaries.

"In early life he had gone to Calcutta in the employ of the East India Company and there, of full habits, he was stricken down with sunstroke. He had a purely mathematical mind and was much given to the study of Brahmanic and occult science. As the result of this sunstroke, Mr. Page became what we knew him here for many years, a wreck of a bright intelligent man.

"His home was on the corner of Sixth and Warren streets, under the shadow of that magnificent elm tree still standing. He called it 'Emblem Place.'

"His wife, too, was insane, and for years he kept her confined in a small brick house standing back of the dwelling. The writer of this article well remembers her rushing into the College Chapel with disheveled hair and the clanking of chains (for she had an iron clasp about her ankle and a chain attached), poorly dressed and beseeching us to protect and hide her. She was followed by her husband, who almost rudely took her away, scolding and upbraiding her.

"This unhappy wife soon after died and Mr. Page in later years married Miss Jane Carter. This last union proved a happy one.

"Sometime, perhaps in 1856, conscious of the infirmities of age and wishing to continue the authority and title he claimed for himself he called together a few of his best friends along the young men, and in the bookstore of W. H. Gurley formally abdicated his great office of High Priest of Nature and conferred the title upon the blushing writer of this article. It was done with gowns, caps and cowles and in a dark room, the door guarded by one of the number with a musket.

"Mr. Page was a man of more than ordinary poetic talent and of fine imagination. This was evident in all his conversation, however erratic, and if once he saw your appreciation and pleasure, he became doubly interesting from this sense of your recognition. He was uncommonly genial and pleasant, especially when, as he thought, he had discovered some new idea in his mystic lore. Then all of his nature flamed out and his conversation was rapid and excited, often running into poetic and fanciful couplets.

"At a time in his early life in Marietta (I cannot get the exact date of it) he wrote an amatory poem, 'The Love of Nature,' quite a long one in six cantos and in which are some really fine things, though occasionally dropping into his eccentric language and figures. It was impossible for him to continue a sustained, sensible thought.

"His portly figure, fine presence and genial manners, courtly ever, made him a distinguished person upon our streets for many years.

"He was born in England, July 13, 1782.

WASHINGTON COUNTY CHILDREN'S HOME.

The citizens of Washington County have for many years taken a just pride in the beautiful Children's Home on the Muskingum, a mile above the city. But not all of them are aware that as a county home, it is the pioneer of all similar institutions in the State. Its inception is due to the unselfish labors of one whose life is briefly sketched by Seymour J. Hathaway in the following:

Memorial Address.

Catharine Fay Ewing, familiarly known as "Aunt Katie Fay," was born at Westboro, Massachusetts, in the year 1822; she was married to A. S. D. Ewing in 1862; died April 4, 1897. If there was nothing more to say of Mrs. Ewing than to give these dates and state that she lived a noble, religious life, or that she was a woman of a benevolent turn and determined purpose in life, if this was all, there would be no reason for my standing here today to speak of her career. No, my friends, what we want to know is not the simple annals of a well spent life. We want to know what this woman has done to advance the condition of humanity, or what addition she has made to the total sum of human progress.

TURNING POINT IN HER LIFE.

Her ancestors hailed from Plymouth Rock. Her family came to Ohio when she was a child. At the age of 20, she became a missionary among the Choctaw Indians, where she labored for 10 years. While engaged in this work, a tragic incident occurred, causing the death of a homeless child, which aroused all the sympathies of her nature, and she resolved to do what she could to rescue dependent children from suffering and degradation.

She left the mission field and went to Kentucky to teach school. After teaching two years, she came back to Ohio with what money she had earned, determined to begin her work as soon as possible. About this time an uncle and an aunt left her two small legacies.

With the money thus accumulated she bought 15 acres of land near Marietta and built what she was pleased to call, her "Children's Home," and she so named it, to indicate its character and what she proposed it should be—a home for homeless children.

ORIGIN OF THE TERM—CHILDREN'S HOME

This was the first time the term was used to designate a child-saving institution. Prior to that "Orphan Asylum" had been the accepted designation, but since that never "Orphan Asylum" but always "Children's Home." Even the reformatories for children are now called "Industrial Homes." However, it makes little difference whether this was the first time the term was used or not. It was left for Aunt Katie Fay to illustrate what such an institution should be and thereby induce a great State to adopt her system.

Mark right here the tone, the fine tone, if I may be allowed the expression, of her character, her utter unselfishness, the splendid abandon of her purpose! What would most people have done under the circumstances? Devote legacies, long in expectancy, together with hard earnings, to save other people's children? No, money that comes in such a way is carefully laid by, to tide over possible disasters in life. Not so, however, did Catharine Fay. She devoted her money and her life to absolutely their noblest uses, and left every other contingency to take care of itself.

CHILDREN IN COUNTY INFIRMARIES

Soon after her arrival in Marietta, she visited the Washington County Infirmary. What do you suppose she found there? Well, I'll tell you. She found what could have been found, in the year 1857, in every poorhouse in the land. Dependent children of all ages associated with and creeping on the floor, among the old, decrepit and vicious inmates. To fully realize what that means, you should visit a county infirmary and become somewhat familiar with the surroundings, see the righteous poor and the vicious poor, the driveling idiots, the trifling meanness of human nature as shown in underlings and half-wits of a community, gathered together and mingling indiscriminately, all at the end of life's ambitions, no hope, no expectation, nothing beyond but death and the pauper's grave. Truly you might write over the portal of such a place as this: "Let him abandon hope who enters here," and yet up to the day that Catharine Fay visited that infirmary, throughout all the States and Territories of the land, such a place as that was deemed good enough for children who by the accidents of birth, but through no fault of their own, had been left destitute and could find no other refuge.

She found 26 children in the Washington County Infirmary, and she registered a vow in Heaven that if her life was spared, such a state of things should not long exist. If the plight of these innocent children did not touch the hearts of any others, she would take up their cause single-handed and dedicate her life and property to their rescue. And what has been the result? Through all the fair State of Ohio it is now against the law to keep children in the county infirmary.

OTHER GREAT REFORMERS

How singular was Catharine Fay's motive and disposition to that of Florence Nightingale, who visited the hospitals and saw the miserable condition of the inmates. It touched her heart and she resolved to do something to reform the methods of conducting hospitals. She devoted her life and means to the work, and what has been the result? The reform has progressed until now we have the most perfect appliances that man can devise for the alleviation of suffering and the cure of disease.

So with John Howard. He visited the prisons, and the woeful condition moved him so deeply that he determined to devote his life and fortune to the work of reforming prisons, and now what has been the result? We have the most humane and enlightened prison methods prevailing the world over.

So with Clara Barton, the great philanthropist. She hears of a fearful calamity, such as lately overtook the Armenians, and it appeals so strongly to her and arouses her so thoroughly that she goes half around the world to dispense the relief that a Christian civilization gives in money and supplies for the hungry and destitute in that distant land. The work of such self-sacrificing benefactors of humanity does not die with them.

Nor will the work of Catharine Fay Ewing die with her. The time is coming when there will not be a State in the Union where it will not be against the law to keep a dependent child in a county infirmary, and when every State will provide by law for the saving of homeless children.

CONDITIONS IN 1857

In the year 1857, as at present, most people were too busy with their own affairs to give much attention to the rescue of dependent children. They had children of their own. They, no doubt, said to themselves, when they gave the subject any attention at all, somewhat as follows: "The poorhouse children may not have a very good time, but that was better than nothing, and the taxes collected from all alike paid for their support, and it was not the taxpayers' fault that the children were in the poorhouse. Let those who are paid for keeping the infirmary care for them and don't bother honest, hard-working people with the woes of these little paupers. We have children of our own to support." Such heard-headed and you might say cruel logic held sway in the year of our Lord, 1857.

To better understand the subject, let us inquire what were the conditions in regard to child saving that year. I refer to the year Catharine Fay began her work. Not a single State in the Union had acknowledged the responsibility of the State for the saving of homeless children. No general law stood on the statute book of any State, providing for the establishment of child-saving institutions, the dependent children of these great commonwealths were relegated to the tender mercies of the poorhouses. If there were such laws I have failed to find them. At all events they were of such half-hearted kind that their reputation never got very far from home, and not until the year 1866, the date of the passage of the Ohio Children's Home Act, did any such law, worthy the name, appear on the statute book of any State.

THE FIRST HOME

After buying the land, putting up the buildings, and getting the children from the County Infirmary, Miss Fay's work began. Twenty-six children to be cared for, fed and clothed, not for one month only, but for 12 months in the year, and she continued right along for 10 years. She found homes for her children in private families as fast as she could and followed them up year by year. Her career in this respect shows how a determined spirit makes way for itself. When people saw she was making a success of the movement, they came to her aid, and the county authorities helped her.

DEVELOPED INTO A STATE INSTITUTION

Now witness how events developed this first Children's Home into a State institution. The directors of the County Infirmary, having no power outside of what the law gave them, had for a number of years been paying Miss Fay money from the public funds to help support the children taken from the Infirmary, and they had no law authorizing them to do it. Then toward the close of the War of the Rebellion, she had 35 soldiers' orphans in the Home, and she thought it was a shame that these children should not have better support than she could give them. So she conceived of the idea of asking the Legislature to make her Home a regular county institution, separating the children entirely from poorhouse control. The county authorities approved of the plan because it would legalize what they had before been doing illegally. The patriotic citizens of the community approved of it because of the humiliating situation of the soldiers' orphans, who, although committed to the care of Miss Fay, were virtually inmates of the Infirmary. Mrs. Ewing resolved to make the effort to induce the State of Ohio to adopt her system and pass a general law authorizing any county in Ohio to establish a Children's Home.

Here was the supreme effort of her life crowned with success. This was the turning point in the history of the great movement, which made it permanent and handed her name down to fame. For her Children's Home, and the benign purposes it involved, if left to itself, in the ordinary course of events might have died with her; but when her Children's Home was adopted by the great State of Ohio, that established it forever. It also established the idea that the State is responsible for the homeless child—a great victory for civilization. The Ohio law of 1866 was the first of its kind, and the example of Ohio has been followed by other States until now it is the exception to find a State that still allows dependent children to be kept in the poorhouse, and nearly every State has now a general law providing in one way or another for the saving of homeless children.

HISTORY OF CHILDREN'S HOMES.

By "Aunt Katie Fay" Ewing.—Read before the Children's Home Convention.)

In the fall of 1853 I was laboring as a missionary among the Choctaw Indians, when one day a physician called to see me to visit a poor family just across the line, where the mother had died, leaving a family of five small children. These little ones she had committed to his care, and he was trying to find homes for them. The mother was a New England woman, and for the first years of her married life everything went well; but the husband became a drunkard; and poverty followed as the sure result. They removed from one place to another, until these last days of trouble overtook them on the frontiers of Arkansas. A few days before, the husband had taken the only axe they had, and leaving the family without any wood, or any way of getting any, had deserted them. In this situation our good doctor had found them, and he soothed the last hours of the woman with the promise that he would provide for the children. He had now found homes for all but a little one, two years old, as lovely a child as the sun ever shone on. My heart was drawn to her at once, and I longed to take her and give her a home. For days I prayed over it, and tried to devise means to accomplish it; but I found it was impossible, for I was but a poor teacher and hundreds of miles from my own home.

The child was finally taken by a man and his wife, who soon after began to sell whiskey to the Indians. One day as they were drinking, they ended in a fight, and the darling child was thrown upon the steps of the house and killed. The distress of mind I suffered over this sad affair so affected my health, that I was obliged to leave my work among the Indians, and return home; but the desire and purpose had arisen in my heart to have a home where I might care for such orphaned and homeless children. After this every effort was directed toward that object, every dollar was laid up with miserly care. For two years I taught in Kentucky and with the means thus obtained purchased 15 acres of land, and on this began to build my home. The Lord, knowing my needs, sent me two legacies: one from my uncle and one from my aunt. My aim at first was to have a home where I could take children and support them myself; but one day I went to our Infirmary where I found 26 children of every condition amid older people of the vilest and most profane characters. To see these children, made in God's image, polluted by such contact, was more than I could bear. I went at once to the trustees of the Infirmary, and got their consent to give me the children at $1 a week. They were to find them one pair of shoes and two suits of clothes; they were to pay one-half the doctor's bills, and all funeral expenses, and I was to do the rest. I had begun in the fall of 1857 to build a house upon my place; but there was a small frame house of two rooms on the farm when I bought it. In this I established myself, and on the first day of April, 1858, I received there nine children sent to me from the Infirmary. They were all under 10 years of age, four of them mere babies. These children, with my hired girl, and the men who were building my house, made a family of 19. The Lord wonderfully provided for us. One barrel of flour, given to me by Jasper Sprague, lasted our large family three months, when I had nothing to get more with, and we had enough, too.

Our neighbors, many of them, were not friendly, and had strange ideas concerning my work. They thought there could be no good motive in taking children to keep as I was doing, and that I must be making money out of it, and out of them, too, as they helped pay the taxes. So they tried every way they could to injure me. Our gates would be opened at night, and hogs and cattle let in upon our garden and fields. Our chickens were often killed. Once when I went away to take one of the children to a home, I found when I came back that all but eight of our 60 chickens were dead.

In my agreement with the trustees, I was to send the children to school. Nothing was specified, how or where, but my plan was to have them taught at home during the winter, and send them to a district school in summer. When the term began, I took all the children of the proper age, five in number, and went with them to the school house. I found however, that the trustees of the school had left word that none of them could remain, as they were paupers, and could not be in the same school with their children, so I took them home.

But I did not intend to be scared out of this thing. So, taking two of the children by the hand, I led them all into the school house, gave the teacher the children's books, and left them there. As I went out one of the trustees met me at the door, went with me through the men and then left me to go home alone; thanking God that he had protected me from harm.

As soon as possible I went into town, and, by the advice of friends was made guardian of all the children large enough to go to school.

The next Monday I took them to the school house, and there I found the trustees. I showed them the proof of my guardianship and told them to reject the children if they could. They had not thought of all this and did not know what to say. So I left the children there. About ten o'clock they came home crying, and said they had been sent home and asked me if I was old "Goody-poor-house" for that was what they called me at the school.

The next week the trustees summoned me to court, where I was kept four days away from my home, where there was sickness, and no one there but hired help. One of the children died the third day after I got back. The case was decided in my favor, and I was allowed to send the children to school. So passed away with many trials the first and second years, and after that things began to brighten. In August, 1858, my house was finished and we moved into it, much rejoiced to have at last room enough for the family.

In June of 1860, my family was attacked with diphtheria, and we were not free from sickness from that time till November. I was taken sick among the first, and before I was able to be up, both of my hired girls left me. The day the last one went away I crawled down stairs, and found things in a dreadful condition. The children gathered around me so pleased to have me with them again, and with the help of the two oldest, a girl of 12, and a boy of 13, I went to work to get things in order; but soon the sick up-stairs needed my attention. I was too weak to walk. I had to creep up on my hands and knees. There lay six dear children very sick, one of whom died the next day. Thus it went on for three weeks. No help could be hired, for all were afraid of contagion. All the help I had in caring for these 23 children, eight of them sick, was the aid the children themselves could give me, though Mrs. Clogston, a neighbor, came and did the washing and ironing for me as a favor. Many days I had no one to speak to but the children. The hardest time came one evening when I knew that one of the little ones could not live through the night. I dreaded to be alone, and just at night I sent one of the boys to ask a neighbor to come and stay at least a part of the night with me.—She told the boy to go back and tell "old Kate she was paid for taking care of the children, and now she might do it." When the boy told me this, I broke down and cried until one of the children came and put his arms around my neck, and said: "God can take care of us." "So he can," said I, "I will trust in Him." Nor did I trust in vain, for before dark Dr. Beckwith came, bringing his wife with him. When

I told them what had happened, we all three cried together, and after the doctor had prayed with us, his wife offered to stay till he came again. I shall never forget that night, or the kindness of Mrs. Beckwith in staying with me. Four of the children died during this season of sickness. There were many extra expenses, too, during this time, and then came the laying in of winter stores and providing winter clothing, so I was very grateful to the trustees of the poor when they sent me a present of $50. During the winter 12 of the children had scarlet fever, but by God's blessing only one died. Hardly were we through with that, when the measles appeared and 21 were sick with that at once, one of them my main dependence for help. But the Lord helped me through with it all, and gave me strength according to my day. Many kind friends He raised up for me, who by gifts of money, donations of clothing and provisions helped me to supply our wants.

About this time, however, the war broke out, and people's thoughts and sympathies were so enlisted for the soldiers that we did not receive so many donations, while prices were so high, that one dollar only went as far as fifty cents had before. The number of children, too, increased, as so many of the soldiers' families were left destitute. I felt compelled to ask from the commissioners, 25 cents more a week, and in August, 1864, this was granted. The farm supplied us with many things for our food, and in one of these hard years of the war, our crops were nearly double what they usually were, while all about us were very poor. We had cows to supply us with milk, and a few sheep given to us helped to furnish the warm stockings needed for the little ones in the winter. The health during these later years was better, though often those who came into the family were in poor physical condition, and some times did not live long after they came under my care. No child, however, as late as 1866 had died who had been at the home over a year.

In 1863 the comfort of the family was much increased by sinking a well, making a cistern, and building a school house, where during the winter months the children were taught. To meet the expense of these things, I had, at first, $37 given to me by friends for the well; but a debt remained hanging over me for some time, causing me much anxiety, but $150 given me by friends in Harmar, and $250 raised by an entertainment in Marietta, furnished the means that cleared me of debt, so that on my birthday in 1865, I could say, "I owe no man anything."

Among the pleasant things that the kindness of friends brought to me was a visit to some of the benevolent institutions of our State at Lancaster and Columbus, the commissioners paying my expenses, and the ladies of Marietta supplying my outfit.

As the number of children increased during these years, and the expenses were so much greater, it became more and more apparent that the means of support at my command were inadequate to the necessities of the case. The connection it held with the poor-house, too, was undesirable. It put the children under a kind of stigma that was hurtful, as well as unpleasant to them. So many of them, too, were soldiers' children (at one time two-thirds of the whole number, 35 being of this class), and these I felt deserved something better of their country than had yet been provided.

I became greatly desirous, therefore, that we might be made entirely separate in name and fact from the poor house, and have a distinct fund appropriated to our use. So early as 1864 I conferred with the commissioners about the expediency of applying to the legislature to bring about this change. A bill to this effect was therefore presented to the Legislature by William F. Curtis, but owing to some misunderstanding in the State institutions, it was laid aside. The next year it was presented again, but rejected. In the year 1866 the matter was again brought forward by S. S. Knowles, who in March of that year wrote to me to announce that his bill providing for the Children's Home had passed the House by a vote of 72 to 10, and was now a law. So the plan which I had thought of only as a relief for our own Children's Home, became in God's good providence the means by which such institutions have been multiplied all over our State.

The home where I started in was about 10 miles from Marietta. This was thought to be too far away, after it became a county institution, and a place was bought for it two miles and a half from town. Thither on the 3rd of April, 1867, the children were removed, but as my health was poor, I resigned my post, and remained at the old place.

EARLY ACADEMIES.

The private school and the academy have performed a very important service for education in Washington County, as they have in all the earlier settlements in this State. First among these was Muskingum Academy, founded in 1797, from which Marietta College is directly descended.

In 1844, Harmar Academy was built on the corner of Franklin and Maple streets. Students to the number of 166 were in attendance in this academy in 1847. Rev. Henry Bates for a long time was principal. John Crawford, Henry Fearing, Douglas Putnam, Harlow Chapin and Silas T. Jewel were the trustees. When the system of union schools was adopted the Academy building was used for the high school department, and when the high school was discontinued on the west side of the river, it was still used as a public school building until 1891, when it was destroyed by fire, and the Fort School was erected on the site of Fort Harmar.

The Western Liberal Institute was organized by the Universalists of Marietta and chartered in 1850. The first trustees were G. W. Barker, Owen Franks and James M. Booth. Paul Kendal was first principal. It afforded, for about 10 years, instruction in the higher branches to many students of this and adjoining counties. The building occupied by the Institute was on the southwest corner of Second and Butler streets.

Of Beverly College or Academy, for in its time it has been called by both names, we have an interesting description in the sketch of the Dodge family, found in Chapter XII. It was formally opened in November, 1842, with J. P. Whitten as president; Charles B. Barclay, professor of rhetoric; Rev. Milton Bird, professor of moral science; and J. Lofland, professor of languages. While the institution was under the charge of Prof. E. S. Cox, who has since won a wide reputation as a city superintendent and a specialist in English, Beverly Academy sent to colleges and universities a large number of very well prepared students. The writer can recall two valedictorians of their respective classes who received their training under the care of Professor Cox. A few years later, when under the charge of Principal R. J. Smith, the Academy won an enviable reputation for the large number of well prepared teachers that went from its class rooms to the county examinations.

Bartlett Academy was organized in Wesley township in 1856. Joseph Penrose, Joseph K. Bucy, Isaac Emmons and James King were the first Board of Trustees, and Jefferson M. Heston was the first principal. For many years a large number of students were gathered here, many of whom afterward became teachers. Z. G. Bundy was for a long time instructor in Bartlett Academy, also William Eldridge.

For a few years Prof. Samuel Maxwell taught an academy where the Children's Home now stands. Of Mr. Tenney's academy a description is found in contemporary extracts from the American Friend, appearing in this and the preceding chapter.

All these institutions served a useful purpose in their day; in fact, they were indispensable to the intellectual development of the community in which they stood, and it is no reproach upon their public-spirited founders and teachers that they have given place to a wider system of public education, which is free to all. Without this preliminary work of the private school, the seminaries and the academy, the public high school of today would never have existed.

Muskingum Academy had a history which is unique. At first it was an academy and house of worship, the only one in the community; then it was rented at a nominal rate to some person or persons who would teach therein a private school of higher grade. About 1830 the teachers who had used this building, finding their quarters straitened, began to seek other accommodations and we hear of an "Institute of Education," with primary and higher departments, and with some hints of Pestalozzian theory and practice. We hear of globes and apparatus, of nature study, in fact, although they did not then call it by that name. There was a manual labor department, too, and for a long time great expectations were built upon this new plan of education. The subsequent changes from the Marietta Collegiate Institute to the Marietta College of 1835 are told in the extracts taken from papers of that day and from the history of Marietta College which follows.

THE MARIETTA INFANT SCHOOL.

April 10, 1830.—

"Mr. Prentiss,

"Dear Sir:—It is nothing strange, after an acquaintance with you of more than four years, that I have discovered that you are always interested in those institutions which promise to be a public benefit. On this account I feel the more at liberty to address you on the subject which stands at the head of this hasty notice. For the want of time I must confine myself to a mere passing notice. I hope to be able to take up the subject of the analytical method of instruction, which is introduced into this school, in some of its practical details in the succeeding numbers of your paper.

"At present I can only say that the Infant School in this place is in successful operation, with about seventy-five pupils, the present number.

"It is now open for the reception of scholars both from the town and from the country, if any parents abroad should feel a sufficient interest to send their children. Some have already applied for the admission of their children, who live themselves out of the township.

"The terms are two dollars and fifty cents per quarter. Scholars will be received of any age, between three and twelve years. Some even older than this will be received, if their previous education does not unfit them for being benefited here. Also some have been and will continue to be received younger than three years, if the health and maturity of the pupil seem to justify it.

"The branches which are taught will be more particularly defined hereafter. It is sufficient now to say that at least all the branches of education, taught in our best common schools, will be taught here, but on a principle which imparts knowledge far more rapidly to the mind of the learner, and suited to make a much more deep and abiding impression. It is a primary object in this section to endeavor to impart distinct and vivid impressions to the mind by the means of sensible objects. For this purpose an extensive apparatus is provided, suited to the several kinds of instruction given—spelling, reading, defining and the elements of Natural History, Geography, Arithmetic and Grammar. To this I also expect a very considerable addition in the present month.

"Every Wednesday, in the forenoon, the school will be open for the reception of visitors.

All persons are invited on these occasions to attend, who feel any interest in this exceedingly important and interesting subject.

"The school is under the superintendence and instruction of Miss Phebe Battelle, of Newport, and Miss Eliza Buck, of this place; assisted by Archibald Cowan, a lad eight years old, a pupil of Mr. Bacon. It is hoped that Mr. Bacon himself will spend a few days in the school, the latter part of this month.

"I am happy to say that the Infant School meets with the very general approbation of our citizens, and has already secured the confidence of the community in general. If any have doubts, I am fully persuaded that they will vanish with one hour's personal observation of the operations of the school.

"The mode of instruction is entirely new; but not more new than the plan of government which is adopted, and which is found to be more efficient than any other. All corporal punishments are excluded.

"It is my intention, if ever the school more than pays the expenses already incurred and the salaries of the teachers to whom I am personally responsible, to expend any surplus funds in adding continually to the apparatus for the benefit of the school.

"The above remarks I have been obliged to make in the greatest haste, and hope to be able to satisfy the minds of inquirers on any points of interest at another time.

"Yours with much respect and esteem,

"L. G. BINGHAM.

"P. S.—The founder of the Infant School system in the United States gives it as his opinion that the most desirable number of pupils for a school is one hundred and fifty. None need therefore hesitate about sending their children on account of the present number."

A JEWELLER'S OPINION.

Marietta, June 12, 1830.—

"Having this day attended the examination of the Infant School in this place, I deem it doing an act of public utility to report its conditions and prospects. Of the many schools which I have visited in other States, none have

I found conducted in a manner better suited to impart knowledge, to strengthen the mind by exercising its various powers, and to correct any wayward disposition. This school has been in operation one quarter only. It commends itself. To become satisfied of this, it is needful only to become fully acquainted with the manner in which it is conducted. In this short time the school has attended to reading, spelling, defining, arithmetic, grammar and geography. The examination in these branches was highly creditable. In addition to these, they had attended to several others which are not usually taught, and which are suited to exercise and improve the understanding and the judgment, as well as the memory. Among these were the classification of Natural objects, Chronology and Astronomy. The school readily answered questions on the first, respecting some articles which they had not before seen, and told the origin of the several parts, whether it was animal, vegetable or mineral. In Chronology they gave the general divisions of time, the periods, principal events and dates. In Astronomy, they gave the names of the primary and secondary planets, their distance from the sun, magnitude, and times of revolving, &c. These things were explained to them by means of a simple orrery. It was truly gratifying to see these children, in their ready answers, manifest so much knowledge on these subjects. But it was in Geometry that their answers most struck me with surprise. They defined the terms, and applied them in triangles, circles, arcs, chords, cubes, cones, pyramids, &c., with astonishing readiness. On the review of the whole, I am confident that these children had acquired a greater amount of knowledge in one quarter than is usually acquired in common schools in twice or thrice the time. Do any ask how this can be done? Let them come and see the means and they will cease to wonder. Besides the teacher of writing, they will find three teachers in constant attendance. They will find an extensive and beautiful apparatus by which the teachers explain many things which could not be explained without it. They will find that children here learn things and not names merely, as is too common in other schools, however good. They will find also a system of government suited to produce the happiest results. It is strictly parental and free from all corporal punishments. Good order is maintained, not by severe appeals to the bodily senses, but by bringing the motives to right conduct to bear on the child's sense of what is proper and right. Thus the foundation is laid, by leading the school to act in view of rectitude, for the most happy results to its members and to society. This is done by the peculiar tendency of this system to cherish the most kindly affections toward each other, toward their teachers and the human family."

THE MARBETTA EXTENSIVE SCHOOL.

June, 1830.—

The next quarter or term of this School will commence on Thursday, the 24th of the present month. The public examination of the School will be held the day previous, at which all who are interested are respectfully invited to attend.

The price of tuition for the next quarter will be two dollars, for each scholar.

A system of writing and drawing simple objects will be introduced into the School next quarter, and an additional charge of fifty cents will be made on those.

The next term will be eleven weeks, and the School will be held on Wednesday afternoon, which will make the time employed in instruction same as twelve weeks upon the present plan.

INSTITUTE OF EDUCATION.

AT MARBETTA.

Comprising Four Departments.

September, 1830.—

"1. The Infant School.—In this department scholars will be received from two years old and upwards, who will attend to spelling, defining, reading, first principles of Geography, Arithmetic, &c. An extensive apparatus has been provided for the use of this department. Parents are at no cost for the means of instruction, such as books, maps, charts, spelling cards, Natural History, prints and other means of illustration. These are purchased for the School. Charges $2.50 a term.

"2. The Primary School.—Promotions will be made from the Infant School into the Primary School, and others will be admitted, whose advancement in elementary knowledge has been such as qualifies them to attend to higher studies by the use of books. The same general methods of teaching and illustration will be employed here as in the Infant School by the aid of suitable apparatus. The pupils will attend to spelling, reading, Grammar, Geography, Natural History, &c. Parents will provide such books, slates, stationery, &c., as shall be prescribed in the course of study. Charge $3.00 a term.

"3. The High School.—Promotions will be made from the Primary School into the High School and others will be received, who are qualified to enter. It is intended that this school shall be equal to the best Academies and High Schools of the East. For this purpose an extensive apparatus has been purchased for this department, at an expense of about $200, comprising:

- One set of Chemical Apparatus,
- One set of Geometrical Apparatus,
- One set of Astronomical Apparatus,
- One set of Philosophical Apparatus, including
The Air Pump,
- One set of Large and Elegant Maps,

the most recent and complete that have been offered to the public, and exhibiting the entire surface of the Earth. The map of the United States is the most valuable that has ever been published, and exhibits all the recent surveys, railroads, canals and internal improvements, together with views of seven of our largest cities and maps of their environs and many items of information. Other articles of apparatus have been procured which need not be added to this list. In the High Schools all those branches of Education will be taught which are common to schools of this kind; such as Geography, by the use of maps, Globes and the Blackboard; Arithmetic, English Grammar, Elements of Geometry, Astronomy, Rhetoric, Logic, Natural Philosophy, Chemistry, Composition, the Latin and Greek Languages, &c. A Classical Teacher will be always in employ for this department. Pupils will be at their own cost for such books as shall be prescribed for the class to which they belong. Charge in English Studies, $4.00; in the Languages, $5.00.

"4. The Young Ladies' School.—Promotions will be made from the female members of the High School into the Ladies' School, and others will be admitted of suitable qualifications. The studies of the High School will be pursued and perfected here, and others introduced which are peculiarly suitable and important in Female Education. No pains will be spared to make this department worthy of the patronage of the public. The apparatus of the High School will be also for the use of the Ladies' School. All experiments will be performed before the two schools combined, but in all other respects the institutions will be entirely distinct, and they will occupy apartments which have no necessary connection with each other. Pupils will furnish such books as shall be prescribed for the studies which they pursue. Charge $5.00 a term. Added to these

"A Writing School will be taught in a room fitted up for the purpose as a distinct branch of instruction. The system which has been introduced and taught with so much success the past quarter will be continued, and a well qualified teacher of Penmanship will be constantly employed in this department. Pupils will furnish their own stationery. The charge to members of the Schools, fifty cents for this quarter, whether they continue a week or a term—to others, $2.00 for thirty lessons. When the advantages of this department are known, the charge to members of the Schools will be considered a mere pittance. The proceeds of this department at these prices have not half paid the expense of its support.

Regulations

1. No Scholar will be received into any department for less than a half quarter.
2. In ordinary cases, no Scholar will be admitted into the Writing School under ten years of age.
3. No deduction will be made for lost time, except in case of illness of more than a week's duration.
4. It is desirable, when convenient that payments be made in advance.
5. Visitors will be admitted into the Schools on the first Wednesday of every month, between the hours of 9 and 12.

"The next term will commence the 23d of September and continue eleven weeks. A spacious and commodious building will be fitted up for the Schools. The pupils will be divided into classes, and four rooms will be occupied for study, three for recitation, and one for writing. Six teachers will be employed. Some will be engaged in the rooms for study; others in the rooms for recitation. A graduate of Ohio University of competent qualifications will conduct the recitations of the High School and the illustrations.

"N. B.—It may appear at first that these charges are too high. But when the expense and the advantages of this school are known, it will be seen that they are very moderate. The system not only contemplates but effects a real saving of time and money to its patrons. To myself, it promises nothing, for the present at least; but the opportunity of doing something for the much neglected cause of education—as may appear from the fact that the avails of the Infant School hitherto have fallen short of meeting the expenditures by more than one hundred dollars. It will be obvious that in pursuing the present plan the expenditures will be very much increased.

"Dear Sir:—I have recently received a polite invitation to attend the examination of the various departments of instruction in the 'Institute of Education' in this town—and really the exercises were conducted in such a manner that the highest honor and credit are due both to the enterprising and indefatigable instructors, and also to the interesting pupils committed to their charge.

"My first visit was to the Infant and Primary School. The children (some apparently not more than four years old) answered questions that have puzzled many an aged mind. They drew maps, read, sung, and in short performed the whole of their duty with surprising accuracy and facility."

MANUAL LABOR ASSOCIATION.

CONSTITUTION OF THE MANUAL LABOR ASSOCIATION OF THE YOUNG MEN'S HIGH SCHOOL.

July, 1831.—

1. This Association shall be called the Manual Labor Association of the Young Men's High School at Marietta, Ohio.

2. The object of the Association shall be the promotion of health and vigor, both of body and mind, by a regular system of manual exercise.

3. The officers shall be a President, Vice-President, Secretary, Prudential Committee, Monitors and a Committee of Appeal, all of whom shall be chosen the last Saturday of every term.

4. The President, and in his absence the Vice-President, shall preside in all meetings, and call special meetings whenever it shall be necessary.

5. The Secretary shall record the proceedings of the Association.

6. The Prudential Committee shall consist of three: the President, Vice-President, and Secretary, whose duty shall be to provide stock and materials for the shop, make contracts, set the daily valuation upon the labor of each member, manage all the business and finances of the Association, and make a report of their proceedings at each stated meeting.

7. The number of Monitors shall depend upon the divisions, which the Association may make from time to time for the convenience of labor.

8. It shall be the duty of the Monitors to collect a fine of 12½ cents for every absence and 6¼ cents for every tardiness; unless the delinquent shall assign one of the following excuses, viz.: Sickness, absence from town, or company from out of town: the Monitors shall pay the fine thus collected to the Prudential Committee. Their duties shall be confined to their respective divisions.

9. The Committee of Appeal shall consist of three, whose duty it shall be to remit fines, when the excuse of the delinquent is satisfactory to them, though it may have been rejected by the Monitor. They shall also have power to judge of the reasonableness of any other excuses than those named in the preceding article. They shall audit the accounts of the Prudential Committee.

10. Any individual who may be proposed to the Association by the President, may become a member by vote of the majority of the members, by signing the constitution.

11. Any individual, not in debt to the Association by fines or otherwise, may be dismissed by vote of the majority of the members, and all shall cease to be members of the Association, when they cease to be members of the Institute of Education.

12. If any individual through carelessness or inattention, or indifference to his work, shall be considered by the Prudential Committee unprofitable to the Association, such member, on motion of the Prudential Committee, may be dismissed, by vote of two-thirds of the members, from the Association.

13. No member, during the appointed hour of exercise, shall perform any other labor, than that assigned them by the Chairman of the Prudential Committee, or some one employed by them as Superintendent, nor at any other time except by special permission from this Committee. They may also assign and take an amount of labor out of the shop, according to their discretion.

14. Every member shall labor for the Association two hours of every day, when study is prosecuted in the Institute, at such hours as may be fixed by resolutions and by-laws.

15. A delay, of five minutes, beyond the time for commencing labor, shall be accounted tardiness, and fifteen minutes, absence.

16. No tools shall be carried out of the shop, or removed from the benches to which they belong, except by direction of the Prudential Committee or one chosen by them to act as superintendent, whom they may appoint at their discretion.

17. No individual, not a member of the Association, shall be permitted at any time to use the tools, for labor in the shop, or enter the shop during the hours of labor.

18. A valuation or estimate shall be made of the labor of each member at the close of the hours for exercise, every day, by the Prudential Committee, which shall be entered in a book kept for that purpose to their credit.

19. At the close of each quarter a dividend shall be made of the monies received, to each member, according to the credit he has received for labor by the Prudential Committee, whose duty it shall be to make this apportionment. Before the apportionment is made, the Prudential Committee shall pay off the expenses of the Association.

20. By-laws and Resolves, not inconsistent with this Constitution, may be adopted by a vote of a majority of the members.

21. No alteration or addition shall be made to this constitution, without a vote of three-fourths of the members of the Association, nor until such alteration has been proposed one week.

22. Every member shall feel it his duty to do all in his power to promote the interests of the Association, and cheerfully submit unto its rules. No conversations shall be allowed in the shop, except such as relates necessarily to the work, and that in a very low tone of voice. Each member shall be intent upon his work in the hours of labor, and not interfere or concern himself with the work of others.

23. Every member of the Young Men's High School in the Institute of Education shall be eligible to be elected members of the Manual Labor Association, without distinction of age.

BY-LAWS OF THE MANUAL LABOR ASSOCIATION.

1. The hours of labor shall be from five to seven in the afternoon.

2. Every member shall be governed and directed in his labor by the Superintendent of the Prudential Committee.

3. The Prudential Committee shall make an estimate of the labor of every member, immediately after the close of the last hour of each day, at which time every other member shall retire.

1. Every tool shall have its particular place, and each member shall replace every tool which he has used, at the close of labor.

5. If any member shall fail to observe the above by-law, he shall forfeit three cents for each failure, to be deducted out of the estimate of his day's labor.

6. Every member shall report to the Prudential Committee, at the close of each week the amount he has carried out of the shop, a record of which shall be made by the Secretary.

7. Any member may work in the shop out of the ordinary hours of labor, by permission.

8. No member may take any of the stock for any private purpose.

9. It shall be the duty of the Prudential Committee or Superintendent to lay out the work of each member.

10. The Prudential Committee shall make all contracts and sales of articles made by the Association.

11. No member shall grind a tool without permission from the Prudential Committee or Superintendent.

Prudential Committee,

Charles Deterly, President,

William H. Bay, Vice-president.

Alonzo Bingham, Secretary.

Committee of Appeal, O. A. Miller, Nathaniel P. Charlot and William Allen.

RULES OF THE INSTITUTE OF EDUCATION

1832—

1. Every scholar on entering the school room, in the morning and at noon, shall immediately commence his or her studies without making any communications whatever with others.

2. No scholar may be absent from his or her boarding house on any evening after the ringing of the study-bell, without permission from a Teacher, or a requisition from a parent.

3. Every scholar is expected to attend the ordinary exercises of some place of religious worship on the Sabbath.

4. No scholar may be absent at any time from the ordinary exercises of the school.

5. No profane or indecent language may be used by any scholar.

6. Every scholar must honestly report daily two and a half hours study out of school.

7. No scholar may say aught against the official character of the Monitors except to the Teachers.

8. It shall be the duty of every scholar who knows anything detrimental to the interests of the school—or of a scholar disobeying any rule without acknowledging it—to make known the facts to some one of the Teachers, if required.

9. If a scholar fails of complying with any one of these rules, an excuse must be rendered in writing on the first entrance of the scholar into the school room.

"The object of the above rules is not to abridge the privileges of scholars, but to secure to them the objects their friends had in view in sending them to the Institute.

"We wish it to be distinctly understood by those who resort here for the purpose of study, that a strict adherence to all the rules of school is indispensable.

"It may be expected that some one of the teachers will always be present at the social visits of the students.

MANUAL LABOR.

"Hitherto many of the young men, by laboring a short time every day in the Manual Labor Shops connected with the Institute, have been able to defray in some instances all, and in others nearly all, the expenses of board. All are encouraged to labor for their health. We have received a considerable amount of donation to furnish the students with tools and the means of defraying their expenses.

"Young Men in the West, who are destitute of the means of obtaining sufficient education to transact the common business of life, or to become teachers of Common Schools, may resort here with the assurance that by industry and application, they may defray nearly all their expenses while attending to their studies."

INSTITUTE OF EDUCATION.

"At a meeting held at the Institute of Education in Marietta, in pursuance of a notice previously given by the Proprietors, on Thursday evening, March 15, 1832, Dr. S. P. Hildreth was appointed Chairman, and Douglas Putnam, Secretary.

"Mr. M. French read to the meeting a paper, submitting to their consideration certain propositions in regard to the Institute of Education.

"Rev. L. G. Bingham, at the request of the Chairman, made an interesting statement in relation to the general interests of the institution and the cause of education.

"The meeting was addressed by C. Emerson, Esq., A. Nye, Esq., and Dr. Cotton.

"On motion, it was Resolved that the communication of Mr. French, and the matters contained therein, be referred to a committee of seven members.

"The following members were chosen as this committee: Caleb Emerson, Arius Nye, J. Cotton, D. Protsman, W. Thomas, Robert Crawford and James Whitney.

"Resolved, That when this meeting does adjourn, it adjourn until Friday evening of next week.

"Meeting adjourned.

Friday Evening, March 23.

"Meeting held at the Institute of Education, agreeably to adjournment.

"The Committee appointed at the last meeting presented this report, which was read:

The Committee, appointed by a resolution of the citizens of Marietta, held in pursuance of request and notice published by the proprietors of Marietta Institute of Education, beg leave to submit the following report:

We are fully impressed with the importance of improved establishments for education. The political institutions of our country, and the spirit of the age, can only be well sustained by an enlightened population. While it is admitted that the people of our country are comparatively enlightened, it must also be conceded that the average standard of intelligence among us is far below what it ought to be.

Every citizen of our country should be so taught and educated as to put him within reach of any station to which his native talents and the want of the community might call him; and beyond the reach of quackery, whether political, religious or professional.

To the attainment of the most important end, it is highly requisite that a class of men, hardly to be found at present, should be raised up and qualified—we mean, teachers by profession—persons who are taught to teach—who will devote their time and their energies to the business of instruction.

When due improvement shall have been made in the number and qualifications of teachers, and in the modes of instruction, a large portion of the time spent by children in school, and especially in more advanced periods of youth, when their labor is profitable, will be saved.

To these general and particular objects, it is understood, the Marietta Institute is to be particularly devoted.

That Marietta is a favorable situation for an extensive establishment for education, will be doubted by no one, who is acquainted with its pleasant and healthful location, and who sees that it is the center of an important region, in Virginia and Ohio, to which the channels of communication, by land and water, so favorably converge.

On the immense advantage of such an establishment, not only to the vicinity, but to the surrounding region, we need not enlarge. The success of the proprietors in founding and sustaining a well arranged and well conducted Institute, capable of embracing present and prospective improvements and on a scale commensurate with the wants of the surrounding country, would most eminently conduce to the best interests of the community.

In the short period of its existence, the Marietta Institute, during the short period of existence, has been successful beyond the anticipation of its friends, has acquired a reputation abroad, highly conducive to its future prosperity; and that the number of applications for admission, to the higher departments especially, is likely far to exceed the present accommodations. In order to make room for the number of students, which may be expected to apply for admission, the erection of a building, beyond the present means of the proprietors, seems absolutely requisite. While in submitting this matter to the consideration of their fellow citizens, the proprietors are not understood to expect any definite pledge of support, they are desirous of ascertaining the actual bearing of public sentiment in this neighborhood, in relation to the enterprise—it being understood that the present and probable means of the proprietors are deemed adequate, or nearly so, to the construction of the walls and outer finishing of the building, say in dimensions seventy-five by forty feet, three stories in height—we should apprehend the undertaking to be one of favorable aspect, and likely to attract attention and aid from a munificent and enlightened community.

It is well known that the attention of our Eastern fellow citizens, at this time is keenly directed to the progress and prospects of the mighty West.—There are many men—and men of substance too—who are desirous of removing hither; not for their own sakes, but for the benefit of their children. Enlightened statesmen and philanthropists, there, can not but see clearly that the power of the Union is fast concentrating in the great valley of the Mississippi. In the older States of the East, with all the advantages of increased capacity for population, conferred by the existence of large manufactories, the people find their limits far too strait for them—and turn their eyes to the West, as the grand receptacle of their surplus population—as the home of their posterity.

In view of these considerations, it is not wonderful to find, that our Eastern brethren feel an intense interest in the prosperity of the West; and that they contribute with a munificent hand to the furtherance of any and every enterprise, calculated to advance the light of knowledge, and the moral and intellectual elevation of its inhabitants; nor should we deem it chimerical to hope that a well-directed Institute of Education, at Marietta, would be generously cherished by Eastern liberality. Independently of all positive donations, much might be expected from the Eastern patronage, to such an establishment, in the enlargement of its number of students. There are, it is believed, many Eastern parents, who are desirous that their sons should be located in the West; and with this in view, would gladly embrace the opportunity of placing them here to prosecute their studies, and, at the same time, to learn the manners, customs, and prospects, and become inured to the climate of the West.

When the misapprehensions regarding the health of Marietta shall have been dissipated and the existence and success of the Institute are eminently conducive to this result;—when the reputation of this place, abroad, shall, in this respect, equal its imputed elevation, in intellectual and moral points of view;—which it shall be generally known (contrary to recent reports), that Marietta has abundance of pleasant building ground, far above the reach of all modern floods—there is reason to believe it will have very considerable accessions of valuable population; provided, more especially, that the Institute shall grow and prosper in any degree commensurate with the present prospects. Families may be expected to locate themselves here, for the express purpose of enjoying the advantages of the Institute for the education of their children. It may also become a favorite resort for the Summer residence of families from the lower regions of the Mississippi.

It seems a prevailing opinion of the present time, that establishments, like the one in question, are best managed, in their practical details, by individuals directly interested in their immediate and prospective success. Nevertheless to become extensively useful, they must partake of a public character—more especially when aided by public benefactions, or donations for public benefit. In this view it is highly proper that the proprietors should pledge themselves and their successors to a correct, liberal and expansive plan of operations, divested of all partisan influence and aiming to advance the general interests of society.

In case, also, that donations, of considerable amount shall liberally be made to aid in the erection of the proposed building, it is proper that measures should be taken to secure the building and appendant lands and fixtures, for the objects intended by the donors—or such an interest at least, as would be proportionate to the donations.

The objects last named may both be attained; it is believed, through the instrumentality of the board of trust of which we are about to speak.

We beg leave, here, to notice a suggestion of the proprietors of the Marietta Institute, namely, that when desired by the donors, the said proprietors, for every ten dollars donation, would stipulate the gratuitous instruction of one scholar for one quarter in the High School or Young Ladies' Seminary, as calculated to be viewed in a very acceptable light by men of liberal minds—inasmuch as they may thereby be enabled to promote the education of children, less favored in regard to property, and at the same time to advance and sustain an establishment highly conducive to the public utility.

In the expectations of receiving donations in aid of the erection of the contemplated building, and other objects connected with the Marietta Institute, the proprietors have suggested the expediency of having a disinterested Board of Trust, constituted for the purpose overseeing and reporting the application of all such funds. In this the Committee concur, and recommend the approval, by this meeting of seven persons, nominated by the proprietors, to constitute such Board; who shall be competent to fill vacancies in their own body.

And to secure such pledge for a correct, liberal, and expansive plan of operations divested of partisan influence, and aiming to advance the general interests of society, as already stated, we recommend, that the assent of said proprietors to such stipulations or general rules, in relation to this subject, as may be agreed upon between said proprietors and said contemplated Board, be digested and made public.

All which is respectfully submitted.

On motion it was Resolved, That the proprietors of the Institute, be requested to sign the report, and express their concurrence in the views suggested by the committee.

As proprietors of the Institute of Education in Marietta, we express our full concurrence in the views and measures recommended in the above report.

L. G. BINGHAM.
MANSFIELD FRENCH.

"The proprietors then nominated the following persons to act in accordance with the report of the committee, as a Board of Trust of the Institute of Education in Marietta—who were approved by the meeting—viz :

Caleb Emerson,	Arius Nye,
James Whitney,	W. Thomas.
S. P. Hildreth,	Douglas Putnam.
John Cotton,

"On motion, Resolved, That a certified copy of the proceedings of this meeting be deposited with the chairman of the Board of Trust, and that a copy be furnished to the proprietors of the Institute.

"Resolved, That the proceedings of this meeting be published in the newspapers of this town.

"S. P. HILDRETH, Chairman.

"DOUGLAS PUTNAM, Secretary."

THE MARIETTA COLLEGIATE INSTITUTE.

September, 1832.—

"It will be seen by an examination of the Catalogue of the Marietta Collegiate Institute, just published, that the number of pupils for the past year was 230. Of this number 117 are inserted as being from abroad. Eight different States have been represented in the Institute, viz: Massachusetts, Vermont, New York, Pennsylvania, Maryland, Virginia, Ohio and Kentucky. In the High School 33 have been in the Languages.

"A very considerable number of those who have been pupils of the Institute are now engaged as Teachers in Common and Select Schools in different parts of the county. It has an object, which is steadily kept in view, to raise up qualified Teachers who may go abroad to do good wherever they may find a field to be occupied. The demand for Teachers of a high order is increasing very much throughout the West. We hail this as a happy and auspicious omen of good to the land. A great change for the better has taken place within the last five years.

"The Institute is designed to afford the means to both males and females of qualifying themselves for the various walks of usefulness in life. It is understood that the next term will open under far more favorable auspices than ever, as it regards the number and qualifications of the Teachers in the Institute. On this account it is expected that the advantages will be greater than they have been at any former period. It will be evident to any one who will reflect a moment, that the expense of carrying forward the operations of such an institution, employing so many teachers, must be very great. It is hoped that an enlightened and liberal public will appreciate the advantages of this institution, to the town and all the surrounding country, and will bestow upon it a liberal patronage.

"It is the intention of all concerned to take early measures to make the Marietta Collegiate Institute an entirely public institution, so as to perpetuate its advantages on a permanent basis. This, it will require some time to accomplish, and thus carry out the original design and wishes of the founder. But this, desirable as it is, cannot be done until the Institute has taken a strong hold upon the public mind, and the importance of possessing and cherishing such an institution is deeply felt. Its influence has been already seen in this town. It has given new life to business. It has enhanced the value of property and waked up in some measure the spirit of improvement. It has brought into the town and put in circulation a considerable amount of money. But there are influences, which belong to the mind and heart, of a far greater value, and advantages, the worth of which is not to be estimated in dollars and cents."

"It is a fundamental principle of this institution, that each male student be required to labor three hours of five days of the week; and in order to secure uniformity in this Department, the parents and guardians of those classes will be required to secure from those, under their care, the same amount of labor at home, as if they boarded in the Institute. The avails or profits of labor will be credited to each student according to the estimate of the steward.

"The Department of Manual Labor is deemed of peculiar importance in a Literary Institution.

"1. As a means of diminishing the expenses of the student, and enabling him to contribute materially, by his own efforts, to the cost of an education.

"2. As tending to form business habits, and prepare young men for the duties and avocations of life.

"3. The principal benefit, however, appears to us in its tendency to preserve the health of the student, while engaged in literary pursuits; it is the only effectual mode of preserving a sound mind in a sound body, while engaged in a long and laborious course of study and mental effort.

"4. In this point of view, the Manual Labor scheme commends itself as an invaluable appendage to a Literary Institution."

Of the Marietta College.

Messrs. Editors:—

I am not at all surprised to find the great beauty of Marietta, and the kindness and politeness of its citizens. I have been acquainted with much refinement of taste displayed here;—and perceiving this, have been induced to believe that a few remarks addressed to you would be acceptable. The object of them would be merely to call your attention to the improvement which may yet be made in the cultivation of "la belle science" Music.

There is much musical talent latent (if so I may speak of it), much, that if called forth into action, would prove to be of a high order. Why cannot this be effected? All that is wanting is a concert of opinion and, when I reflect on doing this work, why may we not form an Harmonic Club? Let all the musical talent be collected, and surely the result must be productive of study.

Thus, suppose ten or twelve only should meet;—two or three might perform well on the flute, others on the violin, or piano, or violoncello, or flageolet, or clarinet. Now, if we met, by a union of all these instruments, with the exercise of a little patience and perseverance, form an Orchestra, which may be productive of pleasure and its labors.

I believe, Messrs. Editors, that you are musical men. Will you not then, a moment, stop to effect the improvement of music here. My ideas on this subject, I will readily admit, are crude; but such as they are I respectfully submit, trusting they may be matured and carried into effect.

AMATEUR.

"In answer to our correspondent 'Amateur,' we acknowledge ourselves to be admirers of what he terms 'la belle science,' and should be happy to see the young gentlemen of this town join hand in hand in order to effect this object. We shall hold ourselves in readiness to take our part in the promotion of this object; and shall be glad indeed to witness the performance of the 'Orchestra,' if ever one can be formed. We think with 'Amateur,' that an Harmonic Society would be a source of pleasure and usefulness to all its members."

PUBLIC MEETING.

The citizens of Marietta and its vicinity are respectfully informed that a public meeting in behalf of the Marietta Institute will be held at the Hall of the Marietta Library, on Wednesday, the 6th, of February, at 6 o'clock, P. M.

It may not be generally known that this Institution which has hitherto been under the exclusive control of Messrs. Bingham and French, has been recently incorporated by the name of the "Marietta Collegiate Institute, and Western Teacher's Seminary," and placed under the direction of a Board of Trustees, appointed by the Legislature, with a view of rendering it a Public Institution, and thus enlarging the sphere of its operations, and extending its usefulness.

In pursuance of this design, the Trustees have thought it expedient to call a public meeting of the citizens, in order to lay before them the plans of the Board for their consideration. As it is believed that the growth of this infant institution is intimately associated with the advancement of useful knowledge in the Western Country, and especially with the prosperity of this place, a general attendance is earnestly solicited.

INSTITUTION OF EDUCATION.

"Below will be seen an account of the proceedings of a meeting of the citizens of Marietta and vicinity, on Wednesday evening last, on the subject of the Institute of Education, together with the plan, furnished by the Board of Trustees, of its general arrangement. The Institute of Education, heretofore, has been a private institution, in the hands of individuals, and although conducted with much propriety and usefulness, and highly beneficial to the public, it has been found to be entirely too much cramped for the requirements of the West, especially as the Manual Labor Plan is one of the great advantages of its establishment. In order to extend its usefulness, and open a door for the youth of our country, who are unable to educate themselves by pecuniary means, the institution has been made public, and a charter obtained from the Legislature of Ohio now in session; and other steps are taking, as fast as time and circumstances will permit, to make it permanent, and a highly useful institution. To the consideration of the enlightened and benevolent citizens of our country, the proceedings of the citizens and plan of the Board of Trustees is submitted, under the impression, as it has already met with the hearty support and encouragement of all who have been made acquainted with its general principles and arrangements, that it will find many more friends in 'the far West.'

"The following are the proceedings of Wednesday evening:—

"A large and respectable meeting of the citizens of Marietta and vicinity, in behalf of the Institute, was held agreeably to notice, in the Library Hall, on Wednesday evening. After a short address from the chairman, stating the objects for which the meeting was convened, eloquent addresses were made by Rev. Mr. Spaulding, and Rev. Mr. McAbey, on the practicability and importance of elevating the standard of education in the West, as connected with the great and interesting objects proposed by the Board of Trustees. Rev. Mr. Smith, at present a Teacher in the High School, then addressed the assembly in an eloquent and appropriate manner on that peculiar and important feature of the proposed plan, the education of Teachers for Common Schools in the Valley of the Mississippi, especially as connected with manual labor. He was followed by Rev. Mr. Vail of Lane Seminary, near Cincinnati, who exhibited in a peculiarly striking and lucid manner the advantages of the Manual Labor Plan, and illustrated and enforced the whole subject by a great variety of facts, calculated to show the practicability of the plan, and the certainty of its ultimate adoption, by all the literary institutions in our land. Mr. Vail then presented a plan for the present institute as adopted by the Board, the entire completion of which will require the sum of $20,000—and stated his conviction that if eight or ten thousand dollars could be raised in the Town and vicinity, the remaining balance might be procured in the Eastern Cities.

"The following resolution was then proposed and unanimously adopted: That with a view to carry into effect the plan proposed by the Board, a special effort be made, to raise the sum of $20,000 in the East and West within twelve months.

"A second resolution was then proposed and adopted: That an effort be made to raise the sum of eight or ten thousand dollars, in the Town and vicinity within three months.

"It was then proposed that a book for subscriptions be presented to the assembly, and in a few minutes between six and seven thousand dollars were subscribed by individuals present.

"It is believed a deep interest was felt in the proposed object by all present—an object which manifestly has an important bearing on the highest interests of this Town and vicinity, and on the intellectual and moral condition of the Western Country.

"The plan proposed by the Trustees is as follows:—

"1. An English Department, in which young men can obtain a thorough English education, to prepare them, in the most perfect manner, for the avocations of life; and especially, to train Teachers for Common Schools in the Western Country.

"This Department is believed to be of the highest importance.

"2. A Classical or Collegiate Department, combining all the advantages to be found in the best Colleges in the Western Country.

"3. An Academic Department, to prepare young men for either of the two higher departments and for other purposes.

"The Female Department, it is designed to render as extensive and useful as practicable.

"A peculiar and highly important feature in the plan of the Institute is that of manual labor. It is expected that every male student will engage in manual labor three hours per day, and all the avails of such labor will be placed to his credit. Experience has shown the immense value of this feature in a literary institution.

"1. It tends to preserve the body and mind of the student in a sound and vigorous state, and enables him to prosecute a long and laborious course of study without, in the smallest degree, impairing the vigor of his constitution.

"2. It prepares young men in an eminent degree for the active duties of life, and renders them much more efficient and useful members of society than they would otherwise become.

"3. As it enables young men to defray, for the most part, the expenses of an education, it opens a wide door for all who are desirous of acquiring useful knowledge.

"There are hundreds of thousands of youth in our land, shut out from our Colleges and Academies, from want of the requisite pecuniary means, who by the adoption of this plan will be enabled to educate themselves, and become qualified for eminent usefulness in the church and world.

"This is a brief and imperfect sketch of the general plan for the Institute, which the Trustees propose to adopt as soon as it shall be found practicable; a plan replete with many and great advantages, and which presents a reasonable and just claim to the patronage and support of an enlightened and Christian public."

MARIETTA FEMALE SEMINARY.

"At nine in the morning, the school is opened with reading the Scriptures, and prayer, succeeded by a Bible lesson. Here, some historical part of the Bible is taken; simple questions are asked; interesting points freely discussed, and such inquiries answered, as the ladies propose. After a recess of ten minutes, the whole school is divided into three sections, for mathematical recitations. One in Playfair's Euclid, one in Adams' Arithmetic, and one in Colburn's Mathematical Arithmetic.

"After another recess, twenty minutes are allotted to calisthenics, a course of exercise, promotive of physical health, and easy and graceful manners. The remaining time till noon is occupied by composition and spelling.

"At the commencement of school in the afternoon, twenty minutes are spent in repeating items of intelligence from periodicals, and in attention to such general things as require attention.

"All are then engaged in a grammatical exercise, which is followed by a recess.

"A part then study, while a larger part form a class in writing. After another recess, the school is again formed into three sections, for recitations in Smith's Anatomy, Watts on the Mind, and Woodbridge's Geography. The daily accounts are then taken, such as communications in school, tardiness, hours of study, out of school, &c.

(Note.—This advertisement evidently referred to the Manual Labor Department of the Marietta Collegiate Institute. In that day the Institute was sometimes called the High School.

"The school is closed with passages of Scripture, being repeated by the young ladies, singing and prayer.

"The plans of the school are such as commend themselves to the good sense of the pupils, and usually secure their hearty co-operation."

MARIETTA COLLEGE.

"The annual Commencement of this institution was held on Wednesday last. The degree of A. M. was conferred on the following young gentlemen: Abram Blakely of Wilksville, O., John T. Cotton of Marietta, O., Samuel Hall of Norwich, Mass., and Hubbard Lawrence, of Stanstead, Lower Canada.

"The exercises, which occupied the whole day, were very interesting to the numerous and attentive audience, and were conducted in a way that gave, we presume, general satisfaction to all concerned. The graduates acquitted themselves not only with much honor, but in a manner which reflects the highest credit on the Institution and the abilities of the Faculty, as well as their own indefatigable exertions in the acquirement of a liberal education; as did also the other young gentlemen who participated in the exercises on this occasion.

"The inauguration of the President of the Institution, Rev. Joel H. Lindslev, D. D., took place in the afternoon, previous to the conferring of degrees.

"As a place for acquiring a good education the advantages of location, salubrity of climate, picturesque scenery, pleasantness and healthfulness of the place, and the moral and religious tones of its society, Marietta is certainly second to no town west of the mountains.

"For the purpose of illustrating the truth of the assertion, that the location of this town is much more advantageous than many other places where public institutions are located, we remark that although we may reiterate that which has been before stated, still it is a matter of no inconsiderable importance and is worth a repetition—that Marietta is accessible by water in three directions, besides stage accommodations. We are induced further to remark, as a proof of our assertion of the preferable facilities of this place, over many others, for the conveyance of young ladies and gentlemen, and their baggage, to and from our Seminaries of learning located here, that on the morning after the close of the session, fifty-four or five young ladies and gentlemen (principally young gentlemen) embarked on board the steamer 'Roanoak,' downward bound."

MARIETTA COLLEGE.

"The annual Commencement of this Institute occurs on the last Wednesday (the 31st inst.) of the present month.

"On the evening of Tuesday preceding, there will be exercises in declamation, by members of the Junior, Sophomore, and Freshman Classes, in the manner of prize speaking as practiced in several of the older Colleges of the country. It is believed that these exercises will excite no inconsiderable interest; and should they secure public favor here, as they have done elsewhere, they may probably be perpetuated, and prizes be annually awarded to the best speakers.

"In addition to the usual exercises of the graduating class, a Baccalaureate address will be delivered to the class, by the President.

"An Inaugural address will also be delivered by Prof. I. W. Andrews, recently elected to the chair of Mathematics & Natural Philosophy.

"In the evening, an address before the Society of Inquiry is expected from Pres. McGuffey, of Cincinnati College."

HISTORICAL SKETCH OF MARIETTA COLLEGE.

The New England people who settled Marietta were strong believers in higher education. The presence in the town of a high-grade

Christian College is no accident, but the direct outgrowth of the efforts and sacrifices made by the settlers almost from the beginning to secure for their children the advantages of a classical training.

HISTORICAL SKETCH.

Two years after the close of the long Indian war, which for four years had absorbed the resources and energies of the pioneers, measures were taken to establish a school of higher education. On April 29, 1797, a meeting of interested citizens decided upon the erection of a building, and the same year the old Muskingum Academy was built, which stood on Front street, just north of the Congregational Church. There, for more than a quarter of a century, the classics and other high school branches were taught. The first preceptor of the Academy was David Putnam, a grandson of Gen. Israel Putnam and a graduate of Yale College in 1793. Out of this Academy, as a lineal descendant, came, after a time, Marietta College, which is proud to acknowledge these deep-laid roots. Muskingum Academy was in continuous use under various preceptors until 1832, when the building was sold and used as a dwelling until 1887.

COLLEGE INSTITUTE.

In the year 1830 there was established by Rev. Luther G. Bingham the "Institute of Education." It embraced four departments; the two higher being known as the High School and the Ladies' Seminary. In April, 1831, Mansfield French became associated with Mr. Bingham as proprietor. In the spring of 1832, after the High School had been in operation about a year and half, at the instance of Messrs. Bingham and French an advisory board of trust was appointed, consisting of Caleb Emerson, James Whitney, Dr. S. P. Hildreth, Dr. John Cotton, Arius Nye, Weston Thomas and Douglas Putnam.

On November 22, 1832, a meeting was held at which steps were taken for the incorporation of the institution under the name of the "Marietta Collegiate Institute and Western Teachers' Seminary," and the charter was obtained December 17th. The Board of Trustees consisted of nine men: Dr. John Cotton, Douglas Putnam, John Mills, Luther G. Bingham, Caleb Emerson, Arius Nye, Jonas Moore, Anselm T. Nye, and John Crawford.

On the 16th of January the organization took place by the choice of John Cotton, M. D., president; Douglas Putnam, secretary; and John Mills, treasurer. At the same meeting a resolution was adopted asking Messrs. Bingham and French to state the terms on which they would transfer their Institute property to the Trustees. A few days later these terms were accepted, and the property was duly transferred, though the former proprietors were requested to continue in charge until the close of the school year.

Before the institution was opened in the fall of 1833, four young men had been appointed to the work of instruction, all members of the Theological Seminary at Andover. Two of these, Henry Smith and D. Howe Allen, had been teachers in the High School at Marietta. The first of these was made professor of languages; Mr. Allen, professor of mathematics; Milo P. Jewett, professor in the Teachers' Department; and Samuel Maxwell principal of the Preparatory Department. Mr. Smith was a graduate of Middlebury College; Messrs. Allen and Jewett, of Dartmouth; and Mr. Maxwell, of Amherst. When the Institute was opened, October 16th, Messrs. Smith and Maxwell entered upon their work of instruction, while the other two remained in New England, presenting the claims of education and religion in that region. The beginning of a new educational year was a change in two respects. Before, the place of instruction was the Library Hall on Front street; now it was a large new building on the College Campus. Then it was one of a group of educational enterprises under the direction of private owners; now it was a public institution, under the control of a chartered corporation.

THE NEW CHARTER.

The charter obtained in December, 1832, was defective in giving no power to confer degrees, and in having a clause allowing the Legislature to repeal it. In February, 1835, a new charter was granted by the State, giving the necessary power to confer degrees, and without the objectionable clause authorizing a repeal. The name was also changed from the Marietta Collegiate Institute and Western Teachers' Seminary to Marietta College.

In the spring of the same year, Rev. Joel H. Linsley, then pastor of the Park Street Church, Boston, Massachusetts, was elected to the presidency. Thus when the fall session of the institution was opened as Marietta College in 1835, the faculty consisted of five members: a president, who had charge of the department of moral and intellectual philosophy; a professor of the Greek and Latin languages; a professor of mathematics and natural philosophy; a professor of rhetoric and political economy; and a principal of the Preparatory Department.

A CHRISTIAN COLLEGE.

The College was founded in the interests of religion as well as of education. From the first it was intended to be a Christian college. The trustees, in their first published statement, August, 1833, say: "The Board wish it to be distinctly understood that the essential doctrines and duties of the Christian religion will be assiduously inculcated, but no sectarian peculiarities of belief will be taught." In their annual report, issued September, 1835, they say: "The honor of originating Marietta College is not claimed by the Board of Trust; its existence cannot properly be ascribed to them or to any combination of individuals, but to the leadings of Divine Providence." The trustees seem to have been influenced by considerations of duty from the beginning, and their earnest, unceasing and self-denying labors, with the remarkable generosity shown in their oft-repeated gifts, prove that they regarded themselves as engaged in a work laid upon them by the Great Head of the Church.

This broad Christian attitude has been maintained ever since. The College is distinctly non-sectarian; four different denominations are represented in its Board of Trustees and four in its present faculty. On the other hand, the Christian ideal is held most firmly and endeavor is made to influence positively young people who study here.

THE BUILDINGS.

The present Dormitory building was begun by Messrs. Bingham and French in 1832 and was completed by the trustees of the College Institute in 1833. Until 1850 it served all the purposes of the institution, and it has been in continuous service up to the present day. The original campus consisted of a strip 150 feet wide, running from Fourth to Fifth streets, a little south of the center of the square. There were then three dwelling houses on the Fourth street side of the square, besides a brick mill on Putnam street. In the winter of 1834-35 the house of Billy Todd, near the corner of Putnam and Fourth, was purchased. It was used until 1870 as the president's house, and for students' rooms until 1874, when it was taken down. The lots south of the original college yard, with a brick dwelling house built in 1817, were purchased in 1836. The house was used by the Preparatory Department from 1870 until the erection of Andrews Hall, in 1891. Before that, this department had occupied the brick mill building on Putnam street, which was taken down in 1869. Erwin Science Hall, begun in 1845, was first occupied by the College in 1850. The Library or Alumni Memorial building was erected in 1870, and Andrews Hall, in 1891. All of these buildings were built almost exclusively with home funds. The first money raised at Marietta was to purchase the Institute property. What was obtained abroad was used for the support of the professors and other kindred purposes. The college property was further enlarged by the purchase of the athletic field in 1890, and of the Observatory and adjoining lots on Fifth street in 1892.

In the spring of 1882, William Chamberlain Gurley, having given up business and returned to Marietta on account of ill-health, interested a number of gentlemen in the study of astronomy. A company was formed, and an observatory built the same year. This passed into the possession of the College in 1890, and was afterward removed to its present site. Mr. Gurley became the director in 1891, holding the position until his death, in 1898.

THE COLLEGE LIBRARY.

Dates from the beginning of the College itself. The first catalogue issued in 1838 states that the Library "contains about 3,000 volumes embracing an extensive and choice selection of Philological works, procured by the Professor of Languages on his recent visit to Europe." That the trustees so early should devote so large a sum, $1,000, to the purchase of classical books is an indication at once of their broad conception of what the College should be and of their generous spirit. The money used for this first large purchase of books came from the estate of Samuel Stone. The growth of the Library has been steady since that time; in 1860 there were 17,000 volumes; in 1885, 33,000; today there are over 60,000, including some 7,000 in the two society libraries, making it the largest institutional library in Ohio, and excelled by only five west of the Alleghanies. The books have come from many sources—College purchases, gifts by many individuals, donations from the United States government, this library being one of its designated depositories. Three collections are worthy of special remark.

In 1850, Dr. Samuel P. Hildreth, a prominent physician of the city, in connection with his donation of fine museum collections gave several hundred scientific books to the Library, to which he and his son, Dr. George O. Hildreth, afterward made considerable additions, including a number of manuscript volumes of correspondence with scientific men in this country and abroad, as well as letters pertaining to the early history of Ohio.

A second collection, the gift of a living donor, who is still adding to it, consists of 1,400 volumes in the realm chiefly of philosophy, psychology, science and literature, carefully selected and of great value.

A third collection is the magnificent gift received in June, 1900, from Hon. Rodney Metcalf Stimson, who was librarian of the College from 1881 to 1892 and treasurer from 1881 to 1900. This collection of 19,000 volumes is especially rich in the history of the Northwest Territory, and in this field is excelled by only one collection in America. Other lines are represented in the collection, particularly curiosa.

From the library of Dr. Asa D. Lord, for many years prominently connected with educational work in the State, his widow gave to the College 1,000 volumes and 500 pamphlets, mostly of an educational character, including many rare journals and reports.

The manuscript materials of the Library are numerous and of great value. They include the records of the Ohio Company and many journals and letters, belonging to the pioneer days. The most of these came from the estate of William R. Putnam, lineal descendant of Gen. Rufus Putnam.

During these years of progress, the Library has more than once outgrown its quarters; and now again it is difficult to find a place for a new book, so crowded are the shelves.

The Museum has been the result of slow accretions from many sources, the most notable single contributions being those of Dr. Samuel P. Hildreth and Dr. and Mrs. B. Frank Hart. It is now of great interest and value, although lacking sufficient space for proper display.

FINANCIAL HISTORY

The College was founded by men who believed it was needed and who were ready to give their faith by their works. The first effort to raise funds was made in 1833, when $8,000 was given in Marietta, half of the sum coming from the trustees, who assessed each other, Messrs. Mills, Moore and Bingham giving $1,000 each. From that time onward, friends in Marietta have given more than half of the total sums raised for the support of the College and for the erection of buildings. The College has been the pride of the city and has never been allowed to utterly fail in spite of many trying experiences. It would be impossible to name even a majority of the host of givers; a few are conspicuous by reason of the size of their gifts: Samuel Train of Medford, Massachusetts; Thomas W. Williams of New London, Connecticut; Truman Hillyer of Columbus; Cornelius B. Irwin of New Britain, Connecticut; Daniel B. Fayerweather of New York, together with Douglas Putnam, Col. W. R. Putnam and Col. John Mills of Marietta.

Special mention should be made of the gift of Dr. Daniel K. Pearsons of Chicago, which, though not very large in itself, $25,000, was the incentive for raising nearly $125,000.00 for the College in 1899, putting the College out of debt and adding a most substantial sum to the endowment.

In this connection mention should be made of those who have, as trustees and officers, given time and thought, as well as money to the College, who in dark days and bright have held to high purposes and have carried the institution to success. The service of Douglas Putnam, as secretary of the corporation from 1833 to 1894, is perhaps without a parallel in America.

The College was never in so good condition financially as at present, although needing much more to provide adequately for its maintenance and growth.

THE PRESIDENTS

Dr. Linsley guided the affairs of the young College for 11 years. Much of his time was given to securing the funds for the endowment of the institution, but he made a lasting impress upon College and community through his great power as a preacher. His successor Rev. Henry Smith, was one of the first professors, and was connected with the College for 22 years, serving as president from 1846 to 1855, after which he was for many years professor in Lane Seminary. He was a man of the finest scholarship and of most commanding eloquence, with an unusual fidelity to obligations and loyalty to convictions. The high ideals cherished by the founders is shown by their liberal policy in giving Professor Smith, after he had been here two years, a leave of absence for a year from July 1, 1835, for study abroad. The event has proved this act wise, for one of the fruits of that year was the issuing some years later by Professor Smith of an edition of "Curtius' Greek Lexicon." And the publication of that lexicon was the means of bringing to Marietta as a student Rodney M. Stimson, who has proved one of the most devoted officers and generous donors the College has had in all its history.

The third president was Rev. Israel Ward Andrews who, like President Smith, had been connected with the College from the beginning. He came to Marietta in 1838, and for a full half century gave his life and thought, his work and his sympathy, to the College. He served as president for 30 years, from 1855 to 1885. He was most careful and exact as a scholar, with high ideals to which he clung tenaciously. To him and to President Smith chiefly, although their colleagues share in it, is due the credit of holding the College unflinchingly to high standards of scholarship in times when many another lowered its requirements in weak concession of a popular clamor. Dr. Andrews, being a man of strong personality, left a deep impression upon the character of many generations of Marietta students. His historical address at the semi-centennial of the College is the basis for much of the present article.

President John Eaton came to the College from the post of United States Commissioner of Education, and served from 1885 to 1891. He was followed after a year by Rev. John W. Simpson, who led the College for four years, to 1896. Prof. Joseph H. Chamberlin, as dean, acceptably performed the duties of president until the election of Rev. Alfred T. Perry, in June, 1900, as the sixth president of the College.

THE PROFESSORS

It would be impossible to speak of all the worthy men who have in these 66 years composed the teaching force. Many of them have won national reputations through their work here and elsewhere, which brought honorary degrees from the best colleges in the country, and many more have won the love and respect of their students for both character and scholarship. Notable for length of service, as well as the quality of their work, are Professor Kendrick, with his 33 years, from 1840, as active, and 16 years longer as emeritus professor, to his death in 1889; Professor Rossetter, with his 13 years, from 1869, is still remembered with affection; Professor Beach served 11 years, from 1869. To these must be added, of the living, Prof. John L. Mills, 16 years, from 1865; and from the present faculty, Professor Biscoe, who has served now 27 years; Professor Andrews with his 22 years; Professor Chamberlin with 20 years; and Professor Phillips with 17 years. These long professorships, which tie together the generations and preserve the continuity of college ideals, are of inestimable value to any institution. Others who have served a shorter time have been not less worthy of honor and have done their share in advancing the interests of the College by labor and sacrifices. The salaries paid have always been so meager as to make sacrifice, though gladly made, a matter of real necessity.

THE STUDENTS

When the new charter was given the College in 1835, there were two classes organized for work. One of these graduated in 1838, and since that time there has been an unbroken succession of classes. No year has failed to send out its new alumni at Commencement time. The total number of graduates in the 64 classes, from 1838 to 1900, is 824, an average of about 13. The first class numbered four, and is the smallest class. There have been eight classes over 20. The class of 1898 numbered 28.

The graduates of a College make its reputation, and Marietta has reason to be proud of the record of her sons. Although there have been no Presidents of the United States among her alumni, there are two governors, William Irwin, Governor of California, 1875 to 1879, and A. B. White, '78, now Governor of West Virginia. Four have been members of Congress, and 10 members of State legislatures. Goshorn, '54, Director-General of the Centennial Exposition; Loomis, '83, Minister to Venezuela; Dawes, '84, Comptroller of the Currency, are illustrations of high political advancement in other lines.

While in later years an increasing proportion of graduates here, as elsewhere, have gone into business, many of them to win distinguished success, still the professions have claimed by far the larger part. Two hundred and seven have become ministers, 117 lawyers, 68 physicians, 104 teachers. We note among them 36 college professors, eight college presidents, among whom are Dr. Joseph H. Tuttle, '41, president of Wabash for 30 years, 1862-1892, and William G. Ballantine, '68, president of Oberlin, 1891-96; George H. Howison, '52, professor of philosophy, University of California; E. B. Andrews, '42, David E. Beach, '59, professors in Marietta. Seven of our lawyers have reached the bench. Wilson, '46, in Oregon, and Follett, '53, in Ohio being judges of the State Supreme Court. Through her graduates the influence of Marietta has gone out to the ends of the earth, more than 20 of them having been foreign missionaries,—John F. Pogue, '42, 33 years in the Hawaiian Islands; Dr. John H. Shedd, '56, 33 years in Persia; and Dr. Charles A. Stanley, '58, 39 years in China, having served the longest. With these should be mentioned Dr. John P. Williamson, who served as missionary to the Indians in the West for 41 years.

MARIETTA IN THE WAR

Located so near the border, it was inevitable that the issues of the war should be warmly discussed in the halls of Marietta and that enthusiasm should run high. Of the 42 graduates in the four classes, 1860-64, 31 entered the Union Army, to say nothing of those who left the college before their course was completed for the same purpose. Marietta was represented in the Union Army by 87 alumni, 39 of whom won commissions. Warner, '45, became major-general; Fearing, '56, Dawes, '60, and Newport, '60, brigadier-generals. Our roll of honor includes Captains Waldo, '53, Greenwood, '59, and Whittlesey, '61; Lieutenants Condit, '60, and Turner, '62, who were killed in battle. Ninety-four non-graduates served in the Union Army in addition to the above. What college can equal this record? Six Marietta alumni served in the Confederate Army, Col. Henry Fitzhugh, '47, being a Commissioner of the Confederate States to England.

Considering the total number of graduates, the figures quoted here and in the section above are indicative of the real power of the College in the past to give an adequate training and a high purpose to its students.

THE LITERARY SOCIETIES

In the first years of the College there existed a society under the supervision of the faculty, known as the Philomathean Society, which, however, was divided into two divisions. Dissensions in these led to the disruption of the society and the formation of the two present societies Alpha Kappa and Psi Gamma, in 1839. From that day these have furnished the opportunity for literary and oratorical training of the greatest value to the students. They have engaged in joint debates and contests in friendly rivalry, and have co-operated in the editing of the Olio and other similar enterprises.

THE YOUNG WOMEN

In 1890, Rev. John L. Mills, for many years a professor in the College, established Elizabeth College for Women. It was always in close affiliation with the College, and in 1893 passed into the control of the College as the Marietta College for Women. On account of the expense involved in the maintenance of two independent institutions under one management, a consolidation was effected in 1897, the young women being admitted to the College, which then became co-educational in the strict sense.

THE ACADEMY.

From the beginning it has been necessary to have a Preparatory Department connected with the College, because the schools of the region do not give adequate preparation for a college of this high grade. This has shared the fortunes of the College, being always considered an integral part of the institution. Connected with it there has been at times a Commercial Department, or an English course or a Normal course, not fitting for college, but for the most part, it has limited its work to courses leading up to the College doors. At the beginning a department of Manual Labor was instituted, which, however, proved quite unpopular with the students, and after a few years was given up.

THE COLLEGE SPIRIT

When an institution has been described in its buildings, its professors, its students, after its external history has been traced in its every detail, there still remains a something—the atmosphere, the spirit, the real soul of the institution—which has not been mentioned. It is difficult to describe this, and yet this is a most important part of a college. Its source and its growth cannot be specifically identified. It can be said, however, that this intangible character which belongs to Marietta College is recognized as sweet and wholesome and inspiring. Its traditions are good, its customs sober and cultivated, and those who study here receive a corresponding uplift.

THE COLLEGE OF LABOR

It is the purpose of those who control the affairs of the College to maintain its high scholarship, its thorough training, its Christian atmosphere, its non-sectarian spirit. Although there have been many changes in the 66 years, they have not been departures from these essential principles. Students now do not attend chapel by candle-light at 5 a. m., which, however profitable to the spirit, was certainly irksome to the flesh; but the Christian service is a daily exercise still. Manual labor is not exacted of each student as at the beginning; but self-help is a recognized feature of to-day, and the student who works his way loses nothing in college society because of that fact. The course of study has been broadened, the elective system has been introduced, but the essential ideal of the College has been maintained of a training for right living. The classes are somewhat larger than at times in the past, yet not so large as to destroy that personal contact between professor and student which is the glory of the small college.

The College, which has been so closely identified with the life of the community in all these years, is bound to it now by close ties. The College has received a generous support, far the largest part of its buildings and endowment having come from Marietta people. It has returned to them a service not measured in dollars—the educational opportunity, the holding up of high ideals, the elevating influence of culture. May the ties binding the two together grow stronger with the years, and may the service each renders to the other be more full of blessing!

TEACHERS AND EDUCATORS.

We have already mentioned some of the pioneer teachers in district or neighborhood schools. The first teacher in a school of higher grade was David Putnam, a graduate of Yale College, and grandson of Maj.-Gen. Israel Putnam. He became preceptor of Muskingum Academy in 1797, within less than 10 years after the beginning of the settlement and only two years after the close of the long and harrassing Indian war. From this school, Marietta College has been the natural development and we might almost say that the same is true of Ohio University at Athens; since the men who were most active in the founding of Muskingum Academy also took a prominent part in the founding of both of these institutions for higher education.

David Putnam's son, Douglas, was for more than 60 years the secretary of Marietta Collegiate Institute, or, as it was afterward named, Marietta College. Until 1894 every diploma issued by that institution bore his signature and was presented from his hand. Of his munificent benevolence to Marietta College a benevolence which inspired him not only to give many thousands of dollars in money but, what was better, his wise counsel and guidance, and the warm affection of his heart, every former student and every instructor has grateful recollection.

In the early period after school houses had been built in some places by public funds, but before adequate provision had been made for the support of teachers, it was the custom of the directors to engage a teacher for a specified term, giving the teacher the privilege of charging each pupil a specified rate of tuition. Pupils from other districts might be admitted on condition of paying in addition to the tuition a certain sum per month or week, for the use of the school room. Among the noted teachers thus employed we may mention William Slocomb, of whom Mr. Woodbridge tells a pleasing story in the preceding chapter, and Theodore Scott, who continued to teach very successfully a private school, long after the establishment of the union system, in which he had taken an active part.

Perhaps the best known teacher of common schools in our county for about 40 years in the latter half of the last century, was John Dean Phillips, a graduate of Marietta College in the class of '54, and a teacher from that time until 1888, when he died at the age of 56. In 1859, he was called to take charge of the Greene Street grammar school, at that time considered a very difficult position for any teacher, yet he proved himself at once a master in his chosen profession. It is safe to estimate that in the 34 years which he devoted to teaching, not less than 3,000 pupils received from him personal instruction in the common English branches. Almost from the first his school was crowded, since students came to him from every part of the county. In 1868 the enrollment was 145, and the average daily attendance, 92. He seemed to delight in the size, as well as in the order of the school; he was never more happy than when he was crowded against the wall by the throng of pupils, and he declined every offer of assistance. In 1879 he accepted the superintendency of the Harmar public school but continued to devote the greater part of his time and attention to the grammar school grades, where the same success attended him and even larger numbers thronged to his instruction until the room could hold no more. When in the summer of 1888 failing health warned him that it was time for him to rest, he offered his resignation; but this was not accepted until he made it peremptory. He did not live long to enjoy the rest and retirement he sought; he was called home August 14, 1888. It will be a long time before his enthusiastic labors will be forgotten by his grateful pupils.

Mrs. Jane Russell, who taught for many years in the Washington Street school building, is remembered with pleasure and gratitude by hundreds of people in Marietta, who as boys and girls were so fortunate as to sit within the circle made light by her presence and enthusiastic sympathy. It was truly said that to have gone to school to Mrs. Russell was to have obtained the best start possible to acquire an education. In 1868 Mrs. Russell was married to Col. E. S. McIntosh, one of the most prominent business men of Washington County. She died in Beverly, June 26, 1902. She was a daughter of Maj. John Clark.

Dr. Henry Smith, the second president of Marietta College (1846-1855), performed a great educational service to this community, and indeed to the State, through the collection of books which he purchased in Europe for the library of Marietta College, as well as through his subsequent donations and legacies to the endowment. Few people understand the true value of the first important addition to the library. The books which he, as agent for the trustees, purchased in that early day could not now be bought for 10 times the amount which he paid for them. Among those books are Aldine copies of the Latin classics, printed by the celebrated Manutius in Venice before Shakespeare was born.

President I. W. Andrews, connected with the College as tutor, professor and president for a full half century (1838-1888), was instrumental in securing larger additions to the endowment and equipment of the College than any other man of his time.

Beman Gates, whom we of the present generation remember chiefly as the quiet, cultivated man of business, railroad director and bank president, has done much in the educational work of this county, as a teacher of music, leader of a band (one of the first in the county), as leader in the choir in the First Congregational Church, as secretary of the Washington County School Association, whose minutes are published in another part of this volume, as editor of the Marietta Intelligencer, and as trustee of Marietta College, to which he was a generous donor and in whose management he took a very active part. Among these gifts was the beautiful lot upon which the College Observatory now stands.

Hon. Rodney Metcalf Stimson, who is still with us, has been his own executor in the collection, arrangement and cataloguing of 20,000 volumes, which he has given to Marietta College. The richness of this collection, especially in American history, is only beginning to be appreciated. Students and specialists are coming from a distance to consult the rare volumes, printed and manuscript which are found in the Stimson collection. Dr. S. P. Hildreth, who was one of the committee appointed at an early day (as mentioned in another chapter), to prepare a report on the subject of education for the use of the General Assembly of Ohio, has in many ways contributed to the educational wealth of the country. He was a close observer and carefully recorded his observations. Among the older writers of scientific subjects, Sir Charles Lyell and his contemporaries, Dr. Hildreth is frequently quoted as an original authority, and his collection of manuscript, including, as it does, autograph letters from so many of the leading men in the first half century of our national existence, can hardly be overestimated. Every chapter in this book, except those exclusively devoted to more recent affairs, is indebted to the wise forethought of Dr. S. P. Hildreth and to the filial piety of his son, Dr. George O. Hildreth, who in his 90th year still manifests a lively interest in the subject to which his attention from childhood has been directed. For some time Dr. George O. Hildreth has been thinking of preparing a new edition of his father's publications, but we fear that this purpose cannot be carried out on account of his feeble health.

Among the principals of the Marietta High School, George Rosseter, afterward professor of mathematics in Marietta College, is remembered by his grateful pupils for his enthusiastic, sympathetic spirit. Judge M. D. Follett and Rev. George R. Gear are remembered as principals of the High School, as active members of the Board of Education, and as trustees of Marietta College.

The pioneers brought with them their New England habits and traditions. Books and papers were to them among the necessities of life. Hence the early founding of libraries.

In 1823 Mr. Wilcox kept open a reading room which was supplied with many eastern papers and also with the Edinburgh and North American Reviews—an important step in popular education.

Terms of subscription.—To citizens generally, $5 per annum. To clerks and students, $3, and to apprentices, $2.

This reading room was a kind of a literary club room; for it was announced that, "Gentlemen visting Marietta will always find a welcome reception in the Reading Room—especially when invited and introduced by a subscriber."

This attempt at co-operation among the readers and students was continued by the Marietta Magazine Club which, organized in 1842, has continued to the present day. One honorable name, that of John Mills, descending from father to son, has been connected with this educational enterprise nearly 80 years. In the Magazine Club, the magazines are passed from member to member around a definitely appointed circle. The fee for many years has been $3 per annum. The example of this pioneer magazine club has led to the formation of the Lotos Club and of others, not only in Marietta, but in other towns and even in distant places.

The character of the reading matter which was found in Marietta in the first half century of its history may be inferred from the following:

Sterne's Works, 6 volumes.
Locke's Works, 4 volumes.
Blond's Lectures, 3 volumes.
Good's Study of Medicine, 5 volumes.

If Mr. Woodbridge had any light literature, he does not mention it although he does offer flour, New Orleans sugar, and whiskey.

ARTISTS.

The education of a community is not complete unless there be added to the moral and intellectual training some cultivation of the æsthetic side of humanity. Early in our history, traveling portrait painters paid us visits, but very few of their works remain to the present day. As early as 1830, Charles Sullivan of Marietta was an amateur landscape painter and one of his paintings, now hanging in a room of the First National Bank of Marietta, has been photographed for this volume. It is chiefly valuable for the history which it tells.

Miss A. M. Martin, who taught herself the use of pencil and brush and whose first efforts at portrait painting with charcoal on the kitchen wall were the delight of her acquaintances, gave promise of wonderful success, but her best friends must confess that she made the great mistake of her life when she refused to take lessons from the best masters. She went to New York many years ago and there won some reputation as a portrait painter but not that wide renown of which her earlier productions gave so fair a promise.

The earliest portrait painter who lived among us was Sala Bosworth, the father of Mrs. (Major) E. C. Dawes of this city, and C. H. Bosworth, president of the Chicago, Peoria & St. Louis Railroad. In many a family in this city and in other counties, the portraits painted by him in his early manhood are the most highly prized heirlooms. Born in Halifax, Massachusetts, September 15, 1805, he came to this county with his family in 1816. He studied painting at the Art Academy in Philadelphia in 1826 and was the artist to whom the public are indebted for the portraits of Gen. Rufus Putnam, Judge Ephraim Cutler, Col. Joseph Barker, and many of the pioneers. The pictures of the "Campus Martius," "Farmers' Castle at Beloe," "Wolf Creek Mills," "The Blennerhassett Mansion," and "Marietta at the Point in 1792,"—originally printed in "Hildreth's Pioneer History" and in numerous other works, were all copies from his drawings, made from data supplied to him from the pioneers. He held various offices, as county auditor, and postmaster at Marietta under Lincoln. He died December 22, 1890, in his 86th year. He was gentle, unselfish and much beloved.

The artistic talent seems to remain in the Bosworth family. William Bosworth, a Marietta boy, a grandnephew of Sala, was the supervising architect to whom the people are greatly indebted for that vision of beauty revealed in the Pan American Exposition, and who is now busily engaged in devising plans for the exposition at St. Louis.

In the art of music, although Washington County can boast of no great genius who has won a national reputation, yet we may be thankful that there has been such a wide diffusion of musical culture as has added much more to the refinement and happiness of the whole community than could have been contributed by even the greatest isolated genius. We may even hope, with good reason for our expectations, that one native of Marietta, Master Francis McMillan, who received his first inspirations and lessons in music from his gifted mother, an amateur of no mean ability, will soon win that world-wide renown of which his youthful performances give fair promise.

The reports of the Washington County

School Association, from whose manuscript records we have made long quotations, show that a very large number of farmers and other intelligent business men took a very active part in educational affairs. Not only Ephraim Cutler and Dr. Hildreth, but business men from every part of the county were as much interested in education and progress as the few professional teachers. It was a farmer of Belpre who founded what was perhaps the first library in the great Northwest Territory, and he was soon followed by the settlers about Amesville. The schools were placed upon a broad and solid foundation because all the intelligent citizens took an active interest in the work. The perpetuation of the educational institutions, and their adaption to the changing needs of successive generations will ever demand the active co-operation of the patriotic citizens as well as of the professional teachers.

The isolated position of the pioneers soon taught them to depend upon their own labors for almost every form of food, shelter and clothing. For meat they depended principally upon the game to be found in the forest, the supply often proving very scant. The streams were more plentifully stocked with fish. The only grain they could raise in considerable quantities before 1796 was Indian corn.

MILLS.

The grinding of corn in a hand mill was so laborious that the citizens of Belpre began to look for a site for a water-mill. They found one, which appeared suitable, on the Little Hocking a mile and a half from the Ohio and here Griffin Greene and Robert Bradford employed the millwrights Baldwin and Applegate to construct a dam and a mill. The work was interrupted by the Indian war, but in 1791 Capt. Jonathan Devol, with the advice and assistance of Griffin Greene, erected a floating mill which consisted of two boats fastened near each other, side by side, with a water-wheel between them which was turned by the current of the river. Thus power was secured for putting in motion the mill which stood in the larger of the two boats. It is said that from one to two bushels of corn could be ground every hour after the boats had been anchored in the channel between Farmers' Castle and what is now called Blennerhassett's Island.

A mill of similar construction was built for the use of the settlers at the Campus Martius in the time of the Indian war but the current of the Muskingum was hardly sufficient even when the boats were taken to a riffle above the fort. For a time they depended on hand mills, when they could not spare a large party to take the corn to the Wolf Creek Mills. As for wheat, no considerable amount was raised before 1796.

In 1790 Robert Potts began a dam and grist mill at Mill Creek, two miles up the Muskingum, but the work was interrupted by the war of 1791-95.

While the settlers at Plainfield (afterward Waterford, now Beverly) were planting and building, Col. Robert Oliver, Maj. Haffield White, and Capt. John Dodge, began to erect a water mill on Wolf Creek about a mile from its mouth, thus with wise forethought providing a very important utility for the second association which had moved out from the main colony. This mill was so necessary to the settlers that even in the time of the Indian war armed parties would go to the mill, and while one party would grind the corn the others would stand guard against the enemy.

CLOTHING.

For clothing, they early learned to make use of deerskins, which, when well dressed, proved comfortable and durable. Flax was raised almost from the first and this the housewives of that day knew how to spin and weave. Even a little cotton was raised for clothing but the summers proved too short for its successful cultivation. Soon the few sheep that had been brought over the mountains increased into little flocks. The wool was carded, spun, and woven at the homes for a number of years until woolen mills could be built at the streams. In the second decade of the last century these had sprung up at different places in the county as will be seen by those who look over the list of advertisements found in the succeeding chapter. As early as 1791 a tannery was erected by Col. Ichabod Nye, on the Plain some distance northward from the Campus Martius.

For many years hemp was raised in considerable quantities, and rope-makers were busy in supplying the ships that were built at this place.

SALT.

In 1794 the scarcity of salt prompted Griffin Greene, Robert Bradford and Joel Oaks to start out from Farmers' Castle under the guidance of Peter Anderson, John Coleman, and Joshua Dewey, in quest of a salt spring which was said to be on the waters of the Scioto. They found such a spring about 25 miles from where Chillicothe now stands, and saw abundant evidence that it had often been visited by the Indians. A rumor about the existence of this spring had caused the Ohio Company to pass the following resolution to prevent the formation of a salt trust:

Whereas, It is believed that the great "salt springs" of the Scioto lie within the present purchase of the Ohio Company; therefore,

Resolved, That this sixth division of land to the proprietors is made upon the express condition and reserve, that every salt spring now known, or what shall hereafter be found within the lands that shall fall to the lot of any proprietor, they he and are hereby reserved to the use of the company, with such quantity of land about them as the agents and proprietors shall think proper to assume for general purposes, not exceeding three thousand acres; the person on whose land they are found, to receive other lands of equal value.

Later surveys proved that this spring was not within the Ohio Company Purchase, but the settlers found another supply not far from Duncan's Falls, as noted in another chapter.

BOAT-BUILDING.

One industry, boat-building in one form or another, begun with the settlement, has continued until the present time, and although there have been seasons of depression, is now a prosperous business. The progress of this industry is described by Maj. Jervis Cutler, one of the 48 pioneers, in a book published in Boston in 1812, but probably written by him in 1809 or 1810.

MARIETTA IN 1809.

(As described by Maj. Jervis Cutler.)

Passing down the Ohio from Wheeling to Muskingum, there are only scattering settlements on the rich lands near the river.

The town of Marietta, situated at the confluence of the Muskingum with the Ohio, has greatly increased in population and wealth. Before the settlement commenced, the ground on the eastern side of the Muskingum was laid out in the form of a city, containing one thousand and lots of 90 feet front and 180 feet rear. The squares were oblong, separated by spacious streets, which intersect at right angles. A large square was reserved for a market, and several others, in different parts of the city, for public uses, or pleasure ground. There are now, on the city ground, more than one hundred houses, and about one sixth part are built with brick and stone. Many of the houses are large and built in a handsome style. The form in which the town is built adds much to its elegance, and the gentle rising of the city ground back from the Ohio affords an extended and delightful prospect of the rivers and distant hills, which is greatly heightened and enlivened by the shipping and various kinds of water craft floating on the streams. A part of the town is built on the opposite side of the Muskingum, and the houses not inferior in elegance to those on the city ground.

Marietta is the seat of justice for the county of Washington, and has a Court House and Jail. There are two religious societies; the largest is Congregational, who have erected a handsome meeting house. It has an academy, which is also improved as a house for public worship.

Within the area of the ground laid out for a city, at the northeast part of it, are a number of the ancient works so frequently found in the Western Country. They consist principally of two large oblong squares and an elevated mound, in the form of a cone. The largest square contains forty acres, and the smallest, twenty. They are enclosed by walls or ramparts of earth, without any ditches, from six to ten feet in height, and about thirty feet in breadth at the base, with twelve openings, or gateways, at regular distances from each other. From one of the angles of the largest square nearest the Muskingum, is the appearance of the walls of a covert way, leading towards the river. The highest part of the remains of these walls is twenty-one feet, and forty feet in breadth at the base. The mound of earth, in form of a sugar-loaf, is thirty feet in height, and the base 115 feet in diameter. It is situated at a little distance from the smallest square. These works are included in public squares and have been carefully preserved; but a small opening has been made in the conic mound and found to contain human bones. Although these ancient works fill the beholder with astonishment, others have been discovered of far greater magnitude. On a branch of the Muskingum, about ninety miles from Marietta, there are these ancient works extending about two miles in length, and the ramparts and mounds of a much greater height than those found here. Vestiges of ancient works of different forms and sizes, and at small distances, are to be found over the whole State, and in many other parts of the Western Country.

Marietta is favorably situated for commerce and manufactories. The depth and gentle motion of the water, in the mouth of the Muskingum, and the cheapness of excellent ship timber render this one of the best places for ship-building on the Ohio river. A number of large ships and brigs were built in a short time, and the employment was rapidly progressing until a stop was put to it by the embargo. Three rope-walks, of nearly a thousand feet in length, were erected, and the numerous mechanic branches, connected with the highly important employment of ship-building, were established. The Muskingum (which means, in the Indian language, "Elk's Eye") is of immense importance to this town. The current is moderate, rarely overflowing its banks, and may be navigated with keel-boats and other craft, during the summer as far as Zanesville, sixty miles from Marietta. There are falls, but happily formed for erecting water works of every description. Above the falls the river is again navigable, not only in the main stream, but in many of the numerous branches which meander through a rich and level country in their way to the river. The largest branch is the Tuskarawa, which, with only a portage of seven miles and a half, communicates with the Cuyahoga River, emptying into Lake Erie. The immense quantity of produce which this fertile tract of country is capable of yielding for the market, and the easy transportation, cannot fail of rendering Marietta a convenient place of sale or deposit, from whence, by ships built here, it may be sent abroad. Materials for many different manufactories may be procured here with so much facility, and from the well known spirit of industry and enterprise prevailing among the people, there can be no doubt of their establishment in process of time. A bank was established here in 1807, with a deposit of 100,000 dollars, from which essential benefits have been derived. There is a post office, two printing offices, and two weekly papers.

Ascending the Muskingum from Marietta at the distance of five miles, is Captain Devol's shipyard, where a number of large vessels have been built, and one of them of more than two hundred tons. The workmanship and timber of these vessels are said not to be inferior to any that have been built in the United States. Their frames were black walnut, which is said to be as durable as the live oak and is much lighter. The plank of these vessels are said to be of an unusual length and firmness. The forests here abound with the best timber, such as white oak, black walnut and locust, and the prodigious height and size of the trees admit of the selection of any dimensions which can be wanted. Excellent masts of yellow pine are easily procured. Iron ore is found, in places, in almost every part of the State and a sufficiency of bar iron can be obtained without difficulty. But the want of a greater number of furnaces and forges keeps up the price higher than it otherwise would be. As much tar as can be wanted is brought down the Allegheny River. The people can with ease, raise as much hemp and flax as would be sufficient to supply the whole of the United States.

The lands on the Muskingum above Marietta are rich, thickly settled and well cultivated. At a distance of twelve miles is the town of Adams, and twenty-three miles, by water, is the town of Waterford, within the purchase of the Ohio Company. At a small distance above this purchase, the bottom lands are narrow, and the hills are many of them steep, tufted with pine, for about thirty miles. They then begin to recede from the river, and bottoms increase in width to Zanesville; at the distance of a few miles west of the river the face of the country is swelling hills, with a rich soil, and the growth principally beech and oak.

The hills on this river abound with coal, and much of it of an excellent quality. It is said a vein of coal has been found crossing the bed of the river, remarkable for its purity. The pieces of the coal have the appearance of varnish, somewhat resembling japan, and when laid on the fire, a kind of fusion is produced, which continues until it is consumed by evaporation, with out disagreeable smell, and deposits scarcely any cinder or ashes. Coal has been sold at Marietta at about three cents the bushel, and is much used by the inhabitants for fuel, in preference to wood, when wood can be purchased at one dollar per cord.

Descending the Ohio, at the distance of ten miles below Marietta, is Zelpre. This beautiful village is several miles in length, extending to the Little Hockhocking River. The people are principally farmers. The good management and excellent culture of their farms have been much admired. An early attention is paid to raising different kinds of fruit trees. Orchards of apple trees of large extent have been planted, which are now becoming extremely productive. The fruit is of various kinds and of the best flavour. Prodigious quantities of cider are made, and when the fruit is properly collected and carefully made, the liquor is of the first quality. They have likewise large peach orchards for making peach brandy. In this part of the State apple trees and all garden fruit trees thrive surprisingly, and the flavour and size of the fruit are considered superior to that of the Atlantic States. The gardens yield all the culinary plants in high perfection. The various sorts of melons are delicious and grow to a large size.

Opposite to Belpre is the beautiful island owned by Mr. Blennerhassett. The name of this unfortunate man, whom Colonel Burr by his artifices seduced to engage in his nefarious schemes, is well known. This may render some description of this beautiful seat the more interesting. The following was written by a gentleman, on a tour from Philadelphia, and published in the Ohio Navigator.—

"Blennerhassett's Island.—On ascending the bank from the landing (a quarter of a mile below the eastern end), we entered at a handsome double gate, with hewn stone square pilasters, a gravel walk, which led us about one hundred and fifty paces to the house, with a meadow on the left, and a shrubbery on the right, separated by a low hedge of privy-sally, through which innumerable columbines and various other hardy flowers were displaying themselves to the sun. The house is built of wood, and occupies a square of about fifty-four feet each side, is two stories high, and in just proportion; it is connected with two wings, by a semi-circular portico, or corridor, running from each front corner. The shrubbery well stocked with flowering shrubs, and all the variety of evergreens natural to the climate, as well as several exotics, surround the garden, and has gravel walks, labyrinth fashion, winding through it. The garden is not large, but seems to have had every delicacy of fruit, vegetable and flower, which this fine climate and luxurious soil produces. In short, Blennerhassett's Island is a most charming retreat for any man of fortune fond of retirement, and it is a situation perhaps not exceeded for beauty in the world. It wants, however, the variety of mountain, precipice, cataract, distant prospect, and so forth, which constitute the grand and sublime."

From Belpre to the Great Hockhocking the country is uneven, and some high hills near the Ohio, but the soil is generally good and the growth is large. Excellent farms are made back from the Ohio on both the Hockhockings, and on their branches where there are large bottoms, and rich swelling hills.

On the Great Hockhocking, thirty miles from the Ohio, are the two college townships granted by Congress to the Ohio Company for the endowment of a university. Athens, one of these townships, is beautifully situated on a bend of the river, commanding an extensive prospect. The settlements commenced in 1797. The town is laid out in regular form; the never-failing springs of excellent water are numerous; and the soil extremely rich and fertile. The number of families in the town is supposed to be about one hundred. An act incorporating the university was granted in 1801. A building has been erected for the instruction of youth, who are at present under the care of a perceptor. The bottom lands on this river are more extensive and of a better quality than those on the Muskingum.

IMPORTS FROM THE EAST.

After all these efforts to make this little community a self-supporting economic unit, there yet remained numerous articles of prime necessity to a community such as that about the Muskingum, utterly unattainable except by importation from the East. Books were indispensable to a colony from New England; glass, iron and steel in various forms were also necessary; all these must be brought in wagons over the mountains from Philadelphia to Pittsburg and down the Ohio in keel-boats, or from Baltimore by the way of Winchester in Virginia. A little later the most important thoroughfare was the National Road from Cumberland, Maryland, to Wheeling.

In payment for these commodities the pioneers could send to the East furs and ginseng from the forest, and to New Orleans or the West Indies corn, pork, potatoes, lumber and flour. The traces of this Southern trade were seen in the Spanish coins which were abundant in this country until 1859-60. These coins stamped with two pillars, supposed to be the origin of our conventional dollar mark ($), included not only halves and quarters, but also eighths and even sixteenths of a dollar. These last two coins, called respectively the "levy" and the "fip," were often used as the measure of prices. Hence in the old-time price lists such rates as 6¼ cents, 12½, 18¾, 31¼, etc., were very common. Congress at last got rid of these coins in the years just before the Civil War by "demonetizing" them, or rather, by making them a legal tender for less than their bullion value. For example, the quarter, which from long wear had lost weight, had an average value of about 23 cents. They were a legal tender for but 20. As a result of this legislation, the Spanish coins were sent to the mint for re-coinage.

So persistent, however, is the force of habit that our grocers still make use of 12½ cents as a favorite price, but in practice the buyer usually finds that it means 13.

The products for New Orleans were usually floated down the river in flat-boats which were sold as well as their cargoes. At least two generations of boys in this county used to look forward with eagerness to the time when they would be large enough to go "down the river" on a flatboat. At first the return trip was a long and dangerous one overland through Mississippi, Tennessee and Kentucky, but a little later they could come on a steamboat.

STEAM MILL.

It was not alone in ship and boat-building that the pioneers showed enterprise. A steam mill was erected in 1811 and began work early in 1812; apparently the first mill of the kind in this part of Ohio. The following account of this work is given in the American Spectator:

Marietta, December 14, 1811.—

"We are happy to announce that the building of the Steam Mill Company has been completed, and that the engine, having been put in motion on the evening of Saturday last, was found to operate fully to the satisfaction of the engineers and proprietors. The millstones are not as yet received and some apparatus is yet to be prepared, but we believe the mill is expected to be in operation at no very distant day.

"On Tuesday, the 7th instant, the steam mill was put in operation for the first time, and its success met the most sanguine expectations of the proprietors. It was built by William Green, of Zanesville, and is universally allowed, by good judges, to be far superior in workmanship to the one at Pittsburg. There is as yet but one pair of stones in operation, which were taken from the banks of Raccoon Creek, in this State. They will grind a bushel of grain in three minutes. It is said that steam mills of similar construction will be erected the ensuing summer in the towns of Steubenville, St. Clairsville and Cincinnati."

What kind of tracks through the woods were dignified with the name of roads may be conjectured from the following letter to General Putnam, giving directions for opening one, which was, perhaps, among the best of its day:

Albert Gallatin, Secretary of the Treasury, to Rufus Putnam, Surveyor General.

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, April 10, 1803.

SIR:

As you have taken the pains of having the road from Marietta to St. Clairsville surveyed, I will thank you to contract with the lowest bidder for opening the same, and making it passable for a wagon, provided that the price shall not exceed five dollars per mile. The amount of that contract and the account of the surveyor, being both certified by you, will be discharged by the Register of the Land Office at Steubenville, who has received instructions on the subject.

INDIANS.

The War of 1812 caused some uneasiness for a time about the Indians as we can see from the following notice.—

Marietta, December 14, 1811.—

"Some people of our city have taken no small alarm on account of a number of Shawnee Indians hunting in this vicinity, some of whom were in town yesterday. As they have with them their saws and paposes, we believe there is no cause of apprehension on their account. When asked why they do not go and fight with the Prophet they answered, 'Toh! he bad man.' A considerable number of them are hunting within 60 or 70 miles of this place."

About the same time Governor Meigs issued a proclamation warning the people not to molest the Indians nor sell them spirituous liquors.

In one of these visits to Marietta the Indians inquired for a boy who had been captured in 1790 near Belleville, Virginia, and brought back to Marietta by Colonel Meigs in 1796. They were directed to Joseph Kelly, who then lived in the house which is now No. 419 Second street, and were delighted to find their old playmate "Lalaque," as they called him.

The ensuing statement, appearing in a newspaper of that day, shows that the estimated number of Indians in Ohio, in 1811, was 2,000.—

Ohioans	550
Wyandots	300
Senecas	250
Miamis and Delawares	200
Shawnee	700
Total	2000

The uneasiness was increased after Hull's unaccountable surrender of the forces at Detroit; but this was soon quieted by the achievements of Commodore Perry and General Harrison, who drove the enemy from our borders.

TRADE STIMULATED BY THE WAR OF 1812.

The war furnished a ready market for all our surplus products, not only flour, meal, pork and beef, were purchased at good prices but even home-made blankets, if not much worn, were readily purchased for the soldiers and paid for in cash. At that time the wool of the newly imported Merino sheep was worth $1 a pound. The inevitable result followed,—extravagance and a desire for articles brought from the East. There was a rapid increase in the number of banks and in the volume of their circulation. Indeed at this time the popular idea of a bank was not an institution for the collection and distribution of credit, but a device for manufacturing what was called money.

WITHDRAWAL OF SPECIE TO THE EAST.

At the close of the war, when our products no longer found a ready purchaser at home at high prices, our people continued to import large quantities of goods from the East and the natural result followed: an unfavorable balance of trade. At first people wondered why so many wagon loads of specie were hauled eastward from this part of Ohio. In fact, the banks were transferring their specie reserves to pay the debts which the people themselves had contracted, for goods in the East. At last a day of reckoning came; the paper of Western banks, received for a while at a heavy discount, was finally refused altogether in payment for goods purchased in the East. The bills of Western banks were all sent back and Eastern exchange could be purchased only at exorbitant premiums.

In 1816 the evils arising from importing more than we exported was evident in this condition of exchange. Specie or bills which would pass east of the Alleghanies sold at 10 per cent. premium over the bills of local banks. To remove this evil, an effort was made to organize the Commercial & Exporting Company of Marietta, with 2,000 shares of $50 each, four-fifths of each share to be paid for in produce. Little seems to have been accomplished by the attempt although very good men were appointed to solicit subscriptions to the stock—Daniel H. Buell, Sardine Stone, Benjamin Daves, Asa Cheadle, William Ford, Jr., Cornelius Houghland, Ephraim Cutler, William Browning, Daniel G. Stanley, William Dana, and Henry Jolly.

The irredeemable paper currency would not be taken in the Eastern cities. The factories at home were willing to take either Ohio bank notes or produce. If all kinds of factories had been here the circle of trade would have been complete and the paper money would have answered every purpose. But there were many articles, such as cutlery, finer fabrics, china and glassware which could not be purchased in Ohio and for these our fathers were not sending enough products over the mountains, or down the river.

"Agricola," in the American Friend for July 19, 1816, notes the fact that a large quantity of gold and silver had recently left this place for Philadelphia and that it would never return because the people of this county were not exporting surplus products; that nothing but unchartered bank paper would remain here. The specie which had come here to pay the soldiers and buy provisions for the war had been sent eastward to adjust the trade balances and then came—a crash.

It was estimated that the total amount of gold sent eastward from Ohio between June, 1818, and June, 1819, was $800,000.

HARD TIMES.

The American Friend (June, 1819) said: "Take the present times all in all, and they are truly alarming. * * * * * This we know, let luxury and extravagance be laid aside and a true system of industry and economy be pursued, and it will operate most powerfully against the hard times."

This year and the next a list of banks whose notes were recived at par in Marietta was published, and there were many changes in the list from week to week.

Late in the summer of 1819 a meeting of merchants was held in Marietta when it was resolved that notes of the Cincinnati banks, of the Lebanon and Miami Banking Company, of the Urbana Banking Company, of the Dayton Manufacturing Company, and of the Zanesville Canal & Manufacturing Company should only be received at 15 per cent. discount, and the Farmers' Mechanics' & Manufacturers' Bank of Chillicothe at 25 per cent. discount. In January of that year the Legislature of Ohio had passed a law making it a misdemeanor punishable with a fine of $500 to "receive in payment any bank note for a less amount than the sum expressed to be due in the body thereof," but the law seemed to have no terrors. Perhaps the merchants thought that if a fine were imposed they could pay it in some of the legally protected bank paper which would not cost them much, but which the officers of the State must take at their face value.

In 1820 a parody of the "House that Jack Built" appeared in many papers. The following is a sample:

These are the farmers, all poor and forlorn,
That sold to the Traders, all shaven and shorn,
The Beef and the Butter, the Pork and the Corn,
That was bought with the Rags, all tattered and torn,
That was issued as money, noon, evening and morn,
By the cunning Directors that manage the men
That own the Bank that Jack built.

The confusion in currency and the lack of legal tender money compelled people to resort to barter. In October, 1820, a committee consisting of Rev. Samuel P. Robbins, David Putnam, William R. Putnam, William Slocumb and Augustus Stone, was soliciting help for a mission among the Choctaws. A boat of 40 tons burthen was to be sent with the contributions, and the committee had this to say to their benevolent fellow citizens: "During the present state of pecuniary embarrassment, money is not particularly solicited, further than to answer the purpose of transportation; but a portion of the common products of our soil, which the God of blessings has so bountifully bestowed."

Among the commodities mentioned by the American Friend as receivable in payment of subscriptions in 1819-20-21 were: Pork, flour, cornmeal, oats, tallow, country linen, lard, wood, maple sugar, city orders, bacon, geese feathers, wool, leather, flax, wool cloth, firewood and deer skins.

In December 1820, "A Farmer" writes of the financial crisis in a letter to "Jeremy Slack Yardstick, Esq.:"

"It is useless, at present, to enter upon an explanation of all the causes which have led a happy and flourishing people into a state nearly allied to general bankruptcy.

"Many of the members of the Legislature must duly reflect that much of the present general pressure has originated with them: they chartered bank after bank without providing for the redemption of the bank paper. When charters alone would no longer give confidence, they assimilated the honor of the State with these banks, by making it become a stockholder therein. Their measures gave currency to this spurious paper. It gave a fictitious rise to property, activity to honest enterprise, and furnished unbounded means for fraudulent speculation, of a species which it ought to be deemed a misnomer to call else but barefaced swindling. All at once this fictitious capital was forcibly drawn from circulation, owing to the numerous frauds to which its issue gave rise—and the fictitious impulse which it gave ceased with its circulation.

In 1820-21 there was a strange condition of public sentiment with reference to the appraisement of property seized for debt. It frequently happened that such articles would be appraised at two or three times the highest price they had ever maintained in the open market. Of course the goods thus estimated at a fictitious value could not be sold even at one half the appraisement, and the creditor was helpless.

Many persons at this time advocated the abolition of all legal process for the collection of debts, so that the honesty of the debtor might be the only security.

In 1822-23, as a result of the "sickly seasons," some inhabitants of this county sought new homes in the higher land far from the river. It was urged by some persons that an artificial route should be made to an Eastern market, the better to escape the danger of infection from New Orleans.

In 1822 the stage coach appeared in our county, first on the road to Wheeling.

Bear and otter skins were still found in the market.

SEARCH FOR SILVER.

About this time the Muskingum Mining Company made an expensive search after silver by sinking a shaft near Chandlerville. Some of the best men of Marietta and Zanesville were engaged in the enterprise. It is easy to ridicule the experiment after the result is known, but if we examine the evidence presented at the time they began the work, we must confess that there was a reasonable prospect of success and that in making the investigation they showed a commendable public spirit.

Among the new industries was a mill for extracting linseed oil, erected at Newport in 1821-22 by Joseph Barker, Jr.

THE SCOTCH IMMIGRATION.

There was still public land to be obtained within the county, 1,440 acres being sold in the first half of the year 1822, and large tracts owned by the members of the Ohio Company or their assignees, were still unoccupied. The year 1823 is marked by the arrival of many emigrants directly from Scotland—a valuable addition to our population.

The following note from Nahum Ward was written in February, 1823, in Scotland, whither he had gone to sell Washington County lands:

"I have had all my lands laid off in a book' in parts of 50, 80, 100 or 1,000 acres, and in the bond which I give them I stipulate that if they do not find the tract as I have described it in the bond, that I will refund the money, on their arrival on the land, and the bond shall be void. I have none but very decent men going out."

We can readily believe that Mr. Ward's opinion of the men he was sending hither from Scotland was correct, for they have left many worthy descendants in our county. The arrival of the first party at their new home is mentioned in June, 1823, and in November, George Richardson, William McKay, George Duncan, Archibald Fisher and Daniel Nichol report themselves well pleased with the land they have purchased.

After 1821 partial relief came to the distressed farmers through an increased demand for our products at good prices, but the confusion in currency occasioned by the multiplicity of local banks continued to annoy the commercial world until 1863. To the credit of the banks of Marietta, it must be said, that they weathered the storms better than those of some other towns.

It is interesting to note that for more than 20 years there was discussion in favor of an improvement in the navigation of the Muskingum. As early as 1819 such improvement was advocated. In 1824 the steamboat "Rufus Putnam," went in a time of freshet to Zanesville and returned in safety, thus showing the power of a steamboat to stem the current of the Muskingum even when it was at the highest. The officers and passengers were received with great honor at Zanesville and hopes were entertained that soon the river might, by a system of dams, be made navigable at all seasons of the year. But this hope was not realized until 1841.

CHANGE IN METHOD OF TAXING LAND.

In 1825 the unfair system of taxing land by the acre, rather than by its commercial value, a system especially hard upon the owners hill land, in Washington County, was changed to our present system of levying taxes upon the assessed valuation. For this change we are especially indebted to the earnest labors of our Representative, Ephraim Cutler. It might be supposed that much of this land was held for speculative purposes but such was not the case. In fact the greater part of the fertile bottom lands had been given to actual settlers as described by Colonel Barker.

These donation lands were given in lots of 100 acres to actual settlers whether members of the Ohio Company or not. This movement to encourage settlement and preserve this part of Ohio for the Union was begun by the free action of the Ohio Company and afterward continued by Congress. The result was beneficial to the country but it left to those officers and soldiers, who had invested the earnings of eight years of hard military service, a few acres of land about Marietta, and the uncleared and unoccupied land of the hills.

For a long time the tide of immigration passed this land, and settled on the alluvial plains of the Scioto and Miami. After 1823 a new and hardy race of farmers began to take possession of these hills and transformed the lair of wolves and panthers to beautiful farms, bearing abundant crops. In 1825 tobacco became a paying crop and there was much attention paid to new varieties and improved quality of seed. Another attempt was made to form an agricultural society; President Joseph Barker announced that the county fair would be held near the Court House on the third Wednesday of October, 1826, and that pens would be provided for the stock which might be brought. At this period the Belpre cheese was as well known along the river, as the Western Reserve and the New York Cream have been in later times.

IMPROVEMENTS.

Th advertisements which appeared from time to time fixed approximately the date of the first appearance of many of the improvements and luxuries which soon came to be regarded as necessities.

Iron plows, a great improvement on the wooden mould-boards, were advertised in 1827. A baker, who had been plying his trade before 1825, advertised his wares in that year and in 1827 informed his friends that he had ice for sale in the month of June. In 1828 appeared the first notice of a "theater" at McFarland's Hall. The play announced is the comedy of "Paul Pry."

We have said that it took 20 years of agitation to secure an improvement of navigation on the Muskingum. It took more than 30 years of earnest work on the part of the citizens of this county to secure a railroad, connecting us with the East. As early as 1827, even before a rail had been laid at Baltimore, our citizens were awake to their interests and were striving to convince the officers of the projected railroad that it was best to have the Baltimore & Ohio Railroad strike the Ohio near Marietta.

In 1827, two of our merchants, Augustus Stone and Dudley Woodbridge, were offering to sell goods at wholesale as well as retail, thus showing the increase in the number of country stores.

In 1829 a new foundry appeared, at first on the west side under the management of a skilled workman from Steubenville. The next year A. T. Nye assumed control of the business, and it has been continued under the direction of his sons and grandsons to the present day.

As late as 1830 an advertisement for a runaway slave appeared in the Marietta papers, but no other had appeared since 1820. In the next decade one more advertisement of that kind was published.

In 1829 there was a movement for the erection of a free bridge over Duck Creek, but this reform, which we now consider so necessary to our commercial progress, was delayed almost 40 years.

In the period between 1825-30 the strife between religious bodies grew unusually bitter and the controversialists eagerly sought the columns of our weekly papers and taxed the patience of the editors if not the readers.

It is evident from many letters and communications that the Masonic body occupied a very prominent position throughout the first 40 years of our history, being almost the only society, beside the churches. Apparently the discipline of this society was strict; the names of members expelled were advertised in a way which public sentiment would hardly tolerate today.

TEMPERANCE MOVEMENT.

Until about 1830 such strong drinks as whiskey, apple brandy, and peach brandy, were as freely advertised as any other commodity. They were freely received in payment for debts or for goods. The hospitality of the settler would have been considered scant if the guest were not offered some form of spirituous liquors and the best merchants thought it proper to treat their customers at the close of a trade. But in 1830 the whole community had been awakened to a sense of the evils resulting from intemperance and societies sprang up in different parts of the county to repress its inroads upon the home.

A CHANGE IN THE POPULATION OF THE COUNTY.

The year 1830 marks a change in the population of Washington County. Just before this time, Scotch emigrants had begun to come to the hill land, and next came a large number of German farmers. Both of these have formed an important addition, not only to the productive power of this part of the country, to its wealth in houses and chattels, but, what is of more importance, to its wealth in citizenship. From the very first they have shown themselves true Americans, ready to decide political questions on their merits according to the evidence presented and not at the dictation of a boss. The best evidence of their character as citizens is found in the beautiful homes scattered over the hills from one end of the county to the other; in the school houses and churches found in every township; in the abundance of those things which satisfy the wants of mankind and even of those which contribute to his intellectual development and refinement.

In 1830 there were some industries not now seen in our county; they have been replaced by others which have proved more remunerative. At that time hemp was produced in considerable quantities; flax also was cultivated, both for the oil and fiber; castor-oil beans were also raised in such quantities as to be manufactured into oil. About this time attempts were made at the cultivation of silk and it was found that the climate was suitable for that business, but the demand for labor in other occupations was so great that it did not prove remunerative. Silk culture failed because laborers could not be hired here at 10 cents a day. Some attention before this time had been paid to the improvement in cultivation of sweet potatoes but as yet no experiments had been made in storing them in large quantities, hence the trade was temporary and not very large.

By 1830 bears had disappeared from the north side of the Ohio River, at least in this part of the State. A few wolves still roamed over parts of Washington and Morgan counties and committed depredations upon the increasing flocks of sheep, but the number of these plunderers was small and the flock masters looked forward hopefully to the time when the few vagrant robbers could be exterminated. To hasten this end, public-spirited farmers had contributed from their private means to raise a fund, which was deposited in the county treasury, for the purpose of giving a bounty of $10 to everyone who should be so fortunate as to secure the scalp of a wolf.

By this time the depressing effects of the "sickly seasons" (1822-23) had almost disappeared; a succession of years when general health had prevailed had encouraged settlers to come into the county and filled the older inhabitants with a more hopeful spirit for the future.

A new era was about to begin—an era of improvement in labor-saving machinery, of better means of communication and exchange. The canal and railroad were about to take the place of the bridle path through the wilderness.

Further notices from the American Friend and other contemporary papers will give us a vivid picture of the times:

A writer, in December 20, 1816, complains that under the existing system of taxation, poor unimproved land in this county was made to pay a tax of from four to 10 per cent. of its market value.

At a meeting of landholders held in Greenleaf's Hall, December 28, 1816, vigorous resolutions were passed condemning the method of taxing by acres rather than by valuation. Nahum Ward said he paid out $100 in bringing the resolutions before the Legislature but no relief was obtained until 1825.

On February 14, 1817, the ice on the Ohio near Marietta was 19 inches thick. The following notice appeared under date of March 21st: "No mail has arrived at this place from the East since our last." A few days later was printed the following: "The Bank of Marietta commenced the payment of specie on Thursday morning, March 27th."

In 1817 there was organized the "Emigrant Society of the County of Washington, Ohio," for the express purpose of "administering relief to sick and distressed emigrants, of giving employment to their poor, and of counseling and giving information to those who may not have obtained an adequate knowledge of the situation of the various parts of this State."

A letter from New Orleans gives an interesting view of the increasing commerce of the Western Country concentrated at a point at New Orleans. In no previous year has the produce been brought in such quantity to this market."

The total expenditures of the county for the year ending June, 1817, were not quite two thousand dollars; to be exact, they were $1,980.23<sup>1</sup>/<sub>2</sub>.

May 2, 1817.—

General St. Clair has for some years past received from the State of Pennsylvania $400 per annum. The Legislature of that Commonwealth, at its last sitting, added $350 a year to his pension.

N. Y. Columbian, 1817.—

A merchant from Marietta, Ohio, has just left this city with several tons of goods (it being his second trip), who takes them from Albany by way of Geneva and Hamilton on the Allegheny River, to his place in the State of Ohio.

In a newspaper of 1817, "Fair Play" stated that it was known that certain individuals had purchased all the salt which could be made at the Kanawha works and then had raised the price to $2 a bushel. He asked the General Assembly to interfere and protect the public against these "pests of society."

Relief came from another quarter, within a few months, as the following extract from the Zanesville Express will show:

NEW SALT WORKS.

We are pleased to learn the success of the undertaking of Jacob Ayres, Esq. He has with great labor obtained a stream of salt water which yields more than one barrel per minute, and in quality inferior to none hitherto discovered. We are assured that he will manufacture from two to three hundred bushels daily, and that the business will be in operation in the present week. Those citizens oppressed by the present price of this useful commodity will be gratified to hear that they can soon be supplied from his works at a price not higher than $1.50 per bushel.

HUMANE SOCIETY.

June 5, 1818.—

MR. PRINTER.

Please to give the following a place in your paper and oblige an old subscriber:

We are about to establish a society in our good township of Warren, which we intend styling the "Humane Society," the principles of which will differ materially from those established in some of our sister towns—for whereas, their avowed principles are to take in strangers; the most prominent of ours will be to turn them out, for where any of our waste cabins are cleared of a family of troublesome paupers, we make it a rule instantly to put a fire to it, which has not only a very salutary effect, but is attended with other very admirable consequences, as it rids us at once of the following, viz., squatters, vagrants, sometimes scoundrels and generally fleas.

ZENO.

AGRICULTURAL SOCIETY.

In the spring of 1819 a meeting, of which Capt. Jonathan Devol was chairman and Anselm T. Nye, secretary, was held in Marietta to form a "Society for Promoting Agriculture and Manufactures."

To formulate plans, the following committee was chosen:

William R. Putnam, Marietta.
Benjamin Dana, Waterford.
Maj. A. W. Putnam, Belpre.
Alexander Henderson.
Col. Simeon Deming, Wooster.
Ephraim Cutler, Warren.
Capt. Ebenezer Battelle, Newport.
Col. Joseph Barker, Union.
Christian Schultz, Virginia.
Dr. David Creel, Virginia.
Dr. Joseph Spencer, Virginia.
John Griffith, Virginia.
George Neal, Virginia.
Isaac Morris, Virginia.

American Friend, November 27, 1818.—

"The example of the suspension of specie payments, by the banks of Cincinnati, has been followed by the Franklin Bank of Columbus, Farmers', Mechanics' & Manufacturers' Bank of Chillicothe, and the Muskingum Bank."

The mails were so irregular at this time that seven consecutive numbers of a weekly paper from Washington came at one time. Mr. Wilcox, the postmaster, explained that the mails were brought as far as Winchester by coach; that between that place and the Potomac more mail would some times accumulate than a single horse could carry.

"Since the year 1810, the territorial extent of this county has, in the laying off of new counties, been reduced almost one half.

"We have no disposition to lower the estimation in which other parts of the State are held. We would only say that this quarter in our opinion is too much underrated—and when our agricultural practice shall become more improved—when our farmers shall have learned the most rational and profitable application of their industry—when the advantages of raising sheep shall be duly estimated, our county will no longer be spoken of as a tract mostly barren and unfit for cultivation."

GRAND CIRCUS HUNT.

Notice is hereby given, that there is to be a circus hunt on the head waters of the Big and Little west branches of the little Hockhocking on Thursday the 8th day of February, 1821. It is hoped that all those who feel able to perform a march of four or five miles, both men and boys, will appear on the ground on Wednesday, the 7th of February, prepared to camp out for the night. The inhabitants of Warren, Belpre and Decatur will assemble at or near Mr. Hall's on the Waterford road;—those of Wesley Barlow, etc. will form the north line from John Smith's west to the road leading from the Ohio to Federal Creek, so as to intersect said road about six miles from the Ohio. Those of Newberry will form on said Federal Creek road. It is expected that all who have horns or conch-shells will bring them. No dogs to be brought on the ground. As it is the express object of this hunt to kill wolves and panthers, it is hoped that those who can not refrain from shooting deer will leave their guns at home.

Walter Curtis, Newberry,
William Johnson, Decatur,
Thaddens B. Pond, Barlow,
Amos Dunham, Warren,
Miller Clark, Belpre,
O. R. Loring, Belpre,
W. P. Putnam, Belpre,
John Stone, Belpre.

Committee of Arrangements.

A later report says that on account of want of system the hunt was not successful although wolves, bears, and panthers were seen in different places.

A rhyming satirist describes this hunt and at the same time pays his respects to the Ohio

Legislature for removing the bounty on wolf scalps:

CONVENTION OF WOLVES.

It was of late upon Hoedhoeking
The wolves in droves together flocking,
Resolved with laudable intention
To form a national convention
And gather all their sage directors
Lawyers, scribes, and quacks, and doctors,
That they might send our Legislature
A sort of complimentary letter.

Address

Last spring a might host beset us,
And, through the woods did chase and sweat us,
With guns, horns, pitchforks, spears and flails
They followed, pell-mell, at our tails
Then trembling, pale with panic fear
Heart-struck we fled, like driven deer;
But (not a single grinner slain)
All, all our fears (thank God) proved vain,
The rout went home, all cursed gruff,
For their day's work, and tired enough.

But noble sirs, what you hae done
We'll approve it as our own.
Your gen'rous souls omitted scalping
Your brothers, through the forest yelping.
And, frae our lugs took off the bounty
Throughout the State in every county
We bless and praise your matchless kindness
Tho' some sour knaves hae called it blindness.

We pray, guid sirs, that, while in session,
Ye frae this act, make no digression,
May this guid year, be as the last,
That we for mutton, may nae fast.

We'll leave the wool to make you hose
That you your feet and legs may swaddle
While to the Capital you paddle.
There, warm all winter, may you sit
And every day three dollars get
Though people growl at your high wages
And call you fools instead of sages:
Though vexed at heart, they fall to fretting
Because we praise their sheep by eating.
Yet never mind, while so it follows
We get the sheep, and you the dollars.

This poetic (?) scalping seems to have had its influence. At any rate, a few weeks later a bounty of $3 was offered by law for each scalp of a full-grown wolf.

From the following contemporary report there seem to have been plenty of squirrels in Barlow in 1822:

"At a Squirrel Hunt in Barlow, a few days since, at which about twenty men were engaged on a side, under the command of Captain Woodruff and Pond, an indiscriminate slaughter took place and four thousand two hundred and sixteen squirrels were slain. They appear to have been on the line of march from the West toward the East, and like all other armies, when necessity required, would quarter on the inhabitants of the country through which they were passing. Corn-fields are suffering much from their ravages. The Muskingum and Ohio Rivers do not stop their course. If ferries and bridges do not afford them free passage, they do not hesitate to plunge in and swim across. Although many of them have passed near our office, some climbed over it, and some have actually entered it. We have not been able to ascertain their point of destination."

"The demand for wool in this county, since the shearing, has been great and the prices good; instead of manufacturing it, as has been practiced for several years past, the wool growers have sold it for cash down, and have perhaps realized more than in any one season for a number of years past, by working it to the best advantage they possibly could. We do not know the quantity that has been bought up, but there are but few who have retained much for their own use. The prices given for wool, it is hoped, will induce the farmer to turn his attention to the rearing of sheep in greater numbers, and whether the present prices continue or not, they will always be found to be a source of profit.

"To preserve sheep from destruction by wolves, a fund was raised about a year ago, by private subscription, offering a bounty on wolves' scalps; the money paid in has all been expended, and nine scalps, old and young, above those paid for, have been proved and presented for payment. We mention this that sheep-holders may be aware of the state of the wolf fund, and, if they are disposed, to take measures for increasing it."

"We have been informed by some of our most respectable agriculturists in the county, and those who have made exertions to raise large flocks of sheep, that, for six or seven years they have been troubled but little by wolves and that they had entertained strong hopes, as the country had become thickly settled, that these voracious animals would not again trouble them; they have, however, within a year or eighteen months past suffered considerable by the visits of these destroyers—many sheep have been killed by them, and it requires the greatest care to secure their respective flocks from the reach of these animals. In order to effect the destruction of these animals, we are requested to state that in addition to the bounties now given on wolf scalps by the State and county, a fund is creating, a part of which has been paid into the county treasury, to give five dollars for each old wolf scalp—for each young wolf under six months, if killed alone, one dollar—if one young and one old together, two dollars for each young wolf scalp;—if one young and two old wolves together, three dollars for the young wolf scalp;—to be killed within the Counties of Washington and Morgan, or if started therein and pursued out of these counties, east of the Muskingum River. By this additional bounty each old wolf scalp will be worth about $10."

1830.—

"The wolves having begun to kill sheep along the easterly side of the Muskingum river, many of the sheep owners, and others, believe, that if sufficient encouragement, a little exertion and perseverance by all interested, especially those who have the art, and are experienced in catching wolves, they may soon be destroyed or drove from this section of the country, lying east of the Muskingum, in the counties of Washington and Morgan, which is supposed to be their habitual and daily range from North to South. With views to this effect, it is proposed to contribute themselves, and persons will be authorized in each township to ask the assistance of the inhabitants generally. The money will be deposited in the county treasury, and paid out to persons killing wolves upon the same evidence which is necessary to obtain the State bounty.

It is proposed to give in addition to the State bounty,

For every scalp of Wolf, one dollar.
For every scalp of Wolf, one dollar.
If a young and old together, two dollars.
For each scalp taken at the same time, and part more in addition for each scalp.

"Signed by

December 18, 1830.—

"David DeLong received $10 of the money deposited with the county treasurer (raised by subscription, for the purpose of giving a bounty on wolf scalps,) for killing an old slut wolf in Salem township on the 13th instant."

November 10, 1821.—

"Within the last six months, 600 heavy road wagons arrived at Wheeling, loaded with merchandise from the eastward."

In 1822 it is said that wool had been transported from New Jersey to Steubenville to be manufactured into cloth, and that the cloth had been re-transported to the East.

November 9, 1821.—

"Our farmers will perceive from an article under the New York date that there is a prospect of a demand from Europe for their flour. This news will be joyfully received—and if the demand should continue, as there is every reason to believe it will, the community will soon be relieved from the pecuniary distress which they have so long labored under.

"Flour is quoted in New York at $8 a barrel."

"For three months past flour and wheat have commanded higher prices in the United States than for many years. It has been sold in Baltimore as high as $9.50 per barrel, the price, however, is fluctuating; the latest account we have seen says it was selling at $7.25. The cause of the rise in flour is said to be the shortness of crops in England and other countries in Europe, and the opening of their ports for the admission of bread stuffs. We are heartily glad that our farmers can realize a price for their wheat something like an equivalent for its real value—but whether the present price will continue is doubtful; we fear it will not. Flour is selling at Zanesville and Marietta at $5 per barrel."

"Capt. Daniel Green left Marietta, March 21, 1823, with two flat boats loaded with flour and arrived at New Orleans April 12. The voyage is mentioned as one of great dispatch."

October, 1824.—

"Steam Coach.—Mr. S. T. Conn of Virginia announces that he has made an improvement in the application of steam, which, from its small dimensions and the concentration of power in the generator, gives a certain assurance of enabling him to propel carriages on any turnpike or other road which has no uncommon obstruction."

PHENOMENA.

July 15, 1824.—

"Earthquake.—At 17 minutes past 11 o'clock, this day, while we were engaged in working off our papers, we experienced a shock of an earthquake, for a few seconds, attended with a noise something like distant thunder, which appeared to come from the east, and proceeded to the west, and could be distinctly heard some time after the shock ceased. The shock was violent while it lasted. The oscillation appeared to be two or three inches."

Clarksburg Intelligencer, October 7, 1824.—

"Something Curious.—Within 200 yards from the road leading from Clarksburg up Elk Creek to Booth's ferry, and within five miles from the latter place, on the premises of David Hall, a company has been engaged for some time at intervals in boring for salt. At the depth of about 180 feet they opened a strong vein of wind, which instantly found vent at the top of the well in a tremendous roaring and spouting of water, throwing up perpendicular columns of that element to the distance of 50 feet. For some distance round this perpendicular shoot of water, plays an imperceptible gas or vapor so very inflammable as instantly to take fire whenever that element comes in contact with it."

"*Locusts.—This section of our country is swarming with locusts. In our immediate vicinity the trees are full of them, especially the apple and peach orchards, which have been very much injured by their perforating the small limbs and twigs to deposit their eggs. In each hole are deposited a large number—as many as 40 or 50. On the peach trees many small limbs have been broken by the weight of the young peaches, at the holes made by them. It is, as we believe, 17 years since the locusts made their appearance in such abundance as the present season."

GENERAL LA FAYETTE.

Marietta, Friday, May 27, 1825.—

"On Monday last, about nine o'clock, A. M., the Steam Boat 'Herald,' hove in sight of town, between two and three miles distant, and fired a gun, which was supposed to be a signal that General La Fayette was on board; as she NOTE.—Locusts have been especially abundant in this vicinity in 1846, 1863, 1880 and in 1897. They certainly have appeared in those years in far greater numbers than at any other time.

approached the name of 'General La Fayette' appeared in large letters and placed all doubts aside. No preparation had been previously made for his reception, in consequence of its being generally believed that he would travel through the interior of the State. The General, however, landed and was escorted to the beautiful mansion of Nahum Ward, Esq. (with whom he had become acquainted in Paris), where he continued about an hour, and received all those who chose to call on him. The news of his arrival was announced by the discharge of cannon, and the citizens began to flock around him, all eager to seize his hand and welcome him to the soil he so nobly defended—among them a few patriots of the Revolution paid him their respects, whose hands, when once he grasped them, he seemed unwilling to relinquish, and whose interviews were very feeling in themselves, and rendered the scene very interesting to younger classes. After being introduced generally to the citizens—and to the ladies who flocked to the place to 'see and welcome a veteran,'—he informed them that he was sorry to part with them so soon, and was again escorted by a large concourse of people to the beach, from whence he embarked on board the 'Herald,' and took his departure for Wheeling amidst the acclamations and cheers of the people and the roaring of cannon."

STEAMBOAT BUILDING.

March 22, 1822.—

"It is with pleasure we announce that Mr. John Green has commenced building a Steam Boat in this place. The enterprise of this gentleman, in his individual undertaking, deserves the applause and encouragement of the public. We understand the Steam Boat is to carry about 100 tons."

This boat was launched in May, 1822, and at that time its name "Rufus Putnam" was announced. In July she made the trip from Marietta to Wheeling in 16½ hours, surpassing all predecessors by nearly two hours. In 1822 first appears a weekly notice of the steamboats passing Marietta.

1823.—

"The Steam Boat 'Mechanic' belonging to the Marietta Steam Boat Company, built on the Little Muskingum River, was safely launched into her destined element on the morning of Saturday last (March 22, 1823) about one o'clock. The boat is built of excellent materials, well put together and of a very handsome model, 100 feet keel, and is designed to be finished in a handsome and convenient manner for the accommodation of passengers. She will probably be ready to stem the torrent by the 1st of June."

This boat went from Marietta to Wheeling in 15 running hours.

June 10, 1824.—

"On the 7th inst., at nine o'clock A. M., was launched from the shipyard of James Whitney, Esq., on Point Harmar in this Town, the beautiful Steam Boat 'Red River.' She was built by Mr. Whitney on contract for Capt. John R. Kimbal of Orleans.

"The 'Red River' is 150 tons, 115 feet long, 20 feet beam. Timbers, locust and cedar."

January, 1826.—

"On the 14th inst., was launched from the ship yard of James Whitney, Esq., in this town the two beautiful Steam Boats, the 'Coosa' and 'Warrior.' They were launched sideways and reached the water without the least material injury. The 'Coosa' measures 180 tons, the 'Warrior,' 115. They were built on contract by Mr. Whitney and Stone, in Mr. Whitney's usual style and very much to the satisfaction of the contractors (Capt. J. W. Bryne and Capt. Benj. Horner). They are destined to run, the 'Coosa' on the Alabama, the 'Warrior' on the Tombigbee and will be in readiness to depart in a few days.

"We are pleased to learn that Messrs. Phillips and Carroll, of Steubenville, have decided on establishing a foundry in this Town, to go into operation early in the ensuing year.

"From the acknowledged mechanical talents of these gentlemen for Steam Boat building and the local advantages this Town possesses over Towns higher up the river, for Shipbuilding and particularly for Steam Boat building we trust, contractors will find it for their interest in future to build at this place."

August 30, 1820.—

"There are now on the docks, and in the state of forwardness, in this town and vicinity, four steamboats, which for workmanship and materials will compare with any building on the Western waters.

"Two of the above mentioned boats are building by James Whitney, Esq., at his yard on the bank of the Muskingum—

"One on the bank of the Ohio, just below town, by Messrs. Drown, Olney, Parker and Thompson, all of whom are mechanics of the first order in their profession. She is about 180 tons burthen, of a fine model, and the materials of which she is built are of the most durable kind; she is built in so convenient a situation that she can be launched at the lowest stage of the river. We learn that the above company intend to continue the business of steamboat building at this advantageous site.

"One on the bank of the Little Muskingum River by Mr. John Mitchell. We are informed she is a large boat and designed for the lower trade, built of excellent materials and well put together. All of which are in a state of forwardness and can be made ready to launch on a short notice. We wish them success corresponding with their enterprise and exertions."

Marietta, January 7, 1830.—

"The Steamboat 'Atlantic.'—This splendid steamboat, from the shipyard of our worthy and enterprising citizen, James Whitney, Esq., under whose immediate and attentive eye she was built, had her keel laid in June—her timbers, moulded out of the finest seasoned yellow locust, set up, planked and fully prepared for her native element by the 20th of November—when she went off her stocks in a style of beauty and splendor equal to any of her sisterhood on the seaboard, amid the shouts and huzzas of an admiring multitude; and when the waves had ceased their salutation she was as beautiful as a swan, resting less than three feet in the water. Since that period she has been finished with materials of the best kind, and in a manner which does no small credit to our industrious mechanics, for neatness and taste of finish. Her cabins, staterooms, and promenades are spacious and noble; worthy of her commander, Captain Ryan, who gave unwearied attention to her. She has a run of 170 feet on deck, 28 feet beam, 9¼ feet hold, with guards 10 feet wide—and is 430 tons. Her engine is of superior order—mighty in power—having eight 22-foot boilers. She was built for Mr. Beech, Jeffersonville, Indiana, and took her departure from this place, descending, on the 5th; and is, unquestionably, one of the best boats ever built in America—and as such we have the honor to commend her to the notice of our brethren in the valley of the Ohio and Mississippi."

THE FIRST STEAMBOAT UP THE MUSKINGUM.

Marietta Gazette, January 15, 1824.—

"On Friday morning (January 9, 1825), the steamboat 'Rufus Putnam' left this place upon a stage of water favorable to the intention of the commander with freight and a large number of passengers and ascended the Muskingum River as far as Zanesville. The current of the river is much stronger than that of the Ohio, but she was able to stem it with ease.

"She returned to this place on Tuesday evening last, without accident, evincing the practicability of navigating this river, a portion of the year, by steamboats of 100 tons. After discharging her freight and passengers, she left here for Cincinnati yesterday morning.

"Thus a steamboat has performed a trip up the Muskingum, hitherto thought impracticable by those unacquainted with the power of steam engines."

NAVIGATION OF THE MUSKINGUM.

November 26, 1819.—

"A petition is about to be presented to the next Legislature of Ohio (says the Zanesville Express) praying for the passage of a law authorizing the removal of all obstructions in the Muskingum River from this place to its mouth. Some day, not far distant, it may enable us to see the triumphant genius of Fulton receiving its tribute upon the waters of the Muskingum."

The value of the produce sent down the Muskingum from Zanesville in boats at the time of the spring freshet in 1820 was estimated at $62,070. This includes 4,884 barrels of flour, 1,055 barrels of pork and 169 barrels of whiskey.

April 29, 1825.—

"The Muskingum from its mouth to that point (where the proposed canal is to cross) is already navigable for loaded keel-boats nearly the whole year—and by a few dams and locks between Marietta and Zanesville, at a comparatively trifling expense, may be made to answer all the purposes of a canal, during the whole year. This being practicable, it is evident that this section of country and this town especially, will be immediately benefited. It is hoped the attention of our citizens will be turned to this subject, as one in which they are all concerned."

July 8, 1825.—

"There is no doubt but the Muskingum may be made navigable at all seasons at comparatively moderate expense. Thus would a connection be formed between the Chesapeake and Ohio, and the Erie and Ohio Canals—making a complete chain to the lakes. The navigation of the Ohio is impeded by low water between Marietta and Pittsburgh much more than it is below."

July 25, 1825.—

"Chesapeake and Ohio Canal.—The citizens of the County of Washington are requested to meet at the Court House in Marietta on Monday the 1st day of August next, at 4 o'clock P. M. to consult on measures for obtaining a survey, to ascertain the practicability of bringing the proposed canal for connecting the waters of the Potomac with those of the Ohio, to unite with the latter river near the mouth of the Muskingum."

in Marietta on the 1st day of August, in pursuance of measures for obtaining a survey to ascertain the practicability of bringing the proposed Canal for con-

Ohio, to unite with the latter river near the mouth of the Muskingum." Ichabod Nye, was chosen chairman, and James M. Booth, secretary.

Dudley Woodbridge and Joseph Barker, Esqrs. be a committee of correspondence to co-operate with the people of Harrison County, Virginia, and others for the purpose of obtaining a survey to ascertain the practicability of extending the proposed Chesapeake and Ohio Canal to the Ohio River by way of the waters of the Little Kenhawa or Middle Island. And to take such measures to obtain that object as they shall deem expedient."

Resolved, "That the proceedings of this Meeting be published in the American Friend & Marietta Gazette." The meeting then adjourned sine die.

A petition will be presented to the next General Assembly of the State of Ohio, to authorize the State to create a company with authority to raise by subscription the necessary funds to improve the navigation of the Muskingum river, by dams and locks for the passage of steamboats from Marietta (at the mouth of the Muskingum) to the point where the Ohio Canal connects with the Muskingum River near the town of Dresden.

MANY CITIZENS.

NAVIGATION OF THE OHIO.

"During the last month a fund was raised by the citizens of this town for the purpose of improving the navigation of the river north-west of the island above this place, which has become so obstructed by logs and sand bars that it was impracticable, in low water, for boats to pass. It is with pleasure we state for the information of those concerned in boating, that the attempt of clearing the river of these obstructions has succeeded, equal to the wishes of those who generously made donations for that purpose—and that, since the logs from the head to the foot of the island have been removed, the channel has greatly improved, and a passage for boats is rendered safe and easy.”

THE TOWN IN 1826.

“To many our anticipations of the future growth of Marietta may appear absurd and visionary. Yet the importance and natural advantages of its situation are generally allowed. But the want of rich lands, such as those within the reach of business in Cincinnati, will prevent, as some suppose, any extensive growth of this town. It is allowed that the Miami country possesses generally better lands than those in this and the neighboring counties. But the difference is far less than the general estimate. It is supposed that with the exception of our bottom lands, we have not much that is worth cultivating. But a minute survey of this county would present many excellent and profitable farms among the hills.

The hill lands have been held in unreasonably low estimation among ourselves. It is true we have a considerable portion of rough lands and of poor land, so called. Rough lands, however, suffice well for pasture—and there are few tracts of sufficient size for a farm, which do not afford a tolerable proportion so level as to admit of comfortable tillage. But it has been said our hills are poor. Comparatively they may be—but not so poor but that they will bear good crops of wheat—nay of Indian corn—with judicious cultivation. The truth is, that—although not many, perhaps, have emigrated to this county in the hope of finding fat pigs, ready roasted, &c., and that ready-made clothes, well washed and ironed, were to be found on the bushes, all gratis—yet too many have come with notions too nearly allied to the foregoing; and were awfully disappointed to find that here, as elsewhere, man must earn his bread by the sweat of his brow—in short, that the country was so far from being the counterpart of the Garden of Eden, that much toil must be endured in order to subject it to the use of man. Even our rich bottom lands are but illy calculated to satisfy the wild expectations of many emigrants. Experience has proved that our hill lands are susceptible of profitable cultivation. One difficulty experienced in this part of the country has been—that the owners of the Ohio Company lands, living in different and distant places, or entertaining an extravagant opinion of the value of their lands, were not in a situation, or not disposed, to sell. There are many tracts which would have been settled long ago, if they could have been purchased. This difficulty is now, in a great measure, surmounted. If the cultivation of tobacco should become extensive, most of our cultivated lands will be brought into profitable use—the raising of sheep will succeed, and the growth of the town will be correspondent with that of the country.

“The Grand Ohio Canal will contribute essentially to the prosperity of Marietta. The improvement of the Muskingum River, by slack water navigation or otherwise, will undoubtedly be effected. It will be strange indeed if interesting results do not accrue to this place.

“There is no place on the western waters more favorable for building steam boats than Marietta. When the proposed foundry shall have been established, we doubt whether any other place shall enjoy equal advantages.

“Formerly the county of Washington supplied many articles to her neighbors; now we are sorry to say it—we buy a great portion of our flour from abroad. A steam mill is to be erected by Greene & Dodge, which we trust will stimulate our farmers to raise wheat enough, not only to supply our own wants, but to send abroad.

“A woollen factory, and many other manufactories, we trust, will follow in due time.”

MARKETING.

“To ascertain the prosperity of a country, in the vicinity of a town and of the town itself, one good rule for a stranger to pursue is to go to the Market Houses, on a market morning, and view the variety and quality of the productions of the country, exposed for sale by the farmer, and the avidity with which these productions are purchased by the citizens of the town for home consumption.

"In places of any magnitude, one, among the first and most important regulations of a Corporation, is that of marketing, which, if governed by wholesome rules, carried rigorously into effect, produces a source of greatest convenience to the town and profit to the country; it gives every citizen an opportunity of furnishing his family, for a given time, with provisions, and prevents monopoly, on one side—and, the seller, a time and place, to vend his articles with ease and advantage, on the other.

"In Marietta, although there is at present no regular marketing observed, no laws on that subject enforced, we believe that there are a sufficient number of inhabitants within the town to encourage an attempt. If the 'law regulating the Market' is once put into operation, the convenience to the town and profit to the country will be sufficient alone to guaranty its continuance. By putting the market law into rigorous execution, making it generally known, and holding out a little encouragement, few will be found possessing even a disposition to transgress, and our market will abound with all the necessary articles for family consumption, and will, with the aid of the Agricultural Society, excite an emulation to excel in the quality of provisions—and soon put an end to the practice of running from door to door to beg the sale of the most ordinary productions of the country.

"Much might be said on this subject, but believing the citizens of the town capable of judging on the propriety of it for themselves, we shall be satisfied for the present, with merely giving the above hints and requesting the attention of the Town Council to the subject."

MINISTERIAL LANDS

Some of the colonies had an established church even after the Revolution. Hence it did not seem strange to our fathers that in the deed made to the Ohio Company of Associates by the Board of Treasury for the United States, Section 29 in each township was reserved "to be appropriated for the purposes of religion." We fear this pious forethought now causes much more profanity than preaching in the tracts thus reserved. It happens that many city lots of Marietta lie within what is popularly known as the "ministerial section." The "owners" of the lots hold their land under a lease, the total ground-rent of which amounts to about $800 a year. This sum is annually distributed among the churches of the township in proportion to the adult membership. In one township the ministerial section was sold many years ago at 25 cents an acre and the proceeds were placed on interest. Hence the churches of that township receive state support to the extent of $9.60, but, as the distribution is troublesome, it is not attempted oftener than once in three years. Some townships have fortunately neglected to husband their funds and the rent "for the purposes of religion" is no longer collected. It would be in the interest of "religion and morality" if the other townships could be guilty of the same wise neglect, and thus suffer to relapse, under the statute of limitations, a claim which no longer serves any useful purpose.

As early as 1826 an effort was made to throw off this burden from the land in Marietta but the only result has been the permission given to obtain release by paying to the "Ministerial Trustees" a sum of money whose interest at six per cent. would equal the ministerial rent.

September 6, 1826.—

"It is hoped that the meeting notified for this evening, on the subject of 'Ministerial Lands,' will be duly attended. It is considered that existence of this kind of tenure, covering a great portion of the Town Plat, is very injurious to the interests and growth of the town. Many persons from abroad, it is believed, have been deterred from purchasing and making valuable improvements, because they could not obtain the right of soil. It is unpleasant to be called on yearly to pay a never-ending rent. It is not less unpleasant to apprehend that, after all, the present arrangement is liable to be broken up and a worse one substituted. Congress reserved Section 29, in each township of the purchase, to be given for religious purposes—we will thank anyone to show when, where, and to whom they have given it. The power of the Ohio Legislature to exercise any jurisdiction over it is doubtful. It is therefore desirable that Congress may be induced to authorize our Legislature, in an equitable manner, to sell the ministerial lands as they have already done the school lands. The proceeds can then be funded by the State, the interest paid and divided yearly, and the yearly costs of collection and management be saved. We believe it is a general sentiment that the original donation creates more harm than good in relation to the object it was intended to promote. We suppose, however, it cannot be lawfully diverted to any other public object. We do not expect it will. But the course proposed, we are satisfied, would essentially promote the interest of the fund as well as of the town and all concerned."

WASHINGTON COUNTY AGRICULTURAL SOCIETY.

The undersigned having been appointed a committee to make arrangements for the annual exhibition of the Washington County Agricultural Society, of the Third Wednesday of October next—now gives notice, that Pens will be provided for all the animals on which premiums have been offered, also, provision for the same free of expense.—There will be, on that day, an address, and a dinner suited to the occasion. The order of the day will be published after the 20th of September; in the meantime, and previous to the 13th of September, it is earnestly requested that the citizens of our county who have not become members of the Society, but have it in contemplation to give countenance and support to it, that they call at the store of Col. Mills, who is Treasurer of the Society, and pay him two dollars, the sum required for admission, and place their names on the Contribution.

Our prospects as a Society are flattering, and will, with the countenance and support of the public, have a very beneficial effect upon the interest of every class in the community.

SAMUEL P. HEDBETH,
JOHN MILLS,
NATHAN WARD,
Committee of Arrangements.

September 20, 1826.

"The Agricultural Society of Washington County will meet in the lower room of the Court House in Marietta, on the third Wednesday of October next, being the 18th, at 10 o'clock, A. M., for the admission of members, and for the transaction of business.

"At 11 A. M., the Society will form procession at the Court House, under Col. A. T. Nye, as marshal of the day, and, with music, proceed to the First Society's Meeting House, where the Throne of Grace will be addressed by the Rev. Mr. Bingham, and an address to the society by the President, Joseph Barker, Jr., Esq. At 12 o'clock will commence the inspection of the Stock, &c. &c. The several committees will report to the Society, to whom the premiums are to be awarded, in the Court Room, at 2 P. M., immediately after which the Society, with such guests as may be invited, will partake of a dinner prepared for the occasion, if fair, in the avenue of Mr. Ward's Locust Walk; if not fair, in the avenue of the Court House.

"The Committee of Arrangements will see that provision for all the Stock is ready, free of expense,—Pens for the stock will be prepared in the square back of the Market House. The Butter and Cheese, will, without doubt be presented in the best order, labeled with the maker's name, and deposited in the front room of the building opposite Col. Mill's House.

"The Butter and Cheese, which takes the premium on that day can be exchanged for cash at the highest market price—and no doubt all the butter and cheese of good quality, offered for the premium on that day, will meet with ready sale.

"The Committee of Arrangements are pleased to make known, that any new and useful implements of husbandry, or improvements on those now in use, or of Domestic Manufacture, Linen, Flannel, Carpeting, &c., &c., and the rare and extraordinary productions of the soil, which have not been named a premium, will most cheerfully and heartily be received at the room where the Butter and Cheese is deposited, and will be taken care of, and exhibited to the Society on that day.

"The fruits of the soil that may be presented to the table on that day will beg gratefully accepted.

"We are constrained to renew our request that our fellow citizens will come forth on that day and give countenance and support to the attempt we are now making for an improvement in our agricultural concerns; every class in the community is interested; and although highly flattered with the assurances of support, we cannot but urge every member to attend on that day with as many new recruits as have an interest in the welfare of the Society.

"NAHUM WARD,

"S. P. HILDRETH.

"JOHN MILLS,

MARIETTA FAIR.

October 25, 1826.—

"Cattle Show and Exhibition of Manufacturers, by the Washington County Agricultural Society.

"The undersigned were appointed a committee to make public the proceedings of the Society on the 18th instant; a day which was propitious, in every respect, to the best wishes of the members of the Society. The day was fine—the early morn was ushered in by the lowing of cattle, the neighing of horses and bleating of lambs. Our citizen Farmers were numerous with us at an early hour, and we were honored with the company of gentlemen from the adjoining counties and from Virginia.

"This being the first attempt at an exhibition of this kind in this county, and not knowing what calculations to make, hardly upon any point, allowance will be made—we anticipate hereafter better things,—nevertheless, the Society have great satisfaction in the exhibition generally, of what was offered for premium, and also for the generous displays of articles not offered for premium.

"At 10 o'clock A. M. the Society met in the Court Room, and received a handsome accession in numbers—elected the officers for the ensuing year; at 11 the procession was formed under Capt. F. Devol, as marshal of the day, and with music preceding marched to the church fronting the common, where we had music, prayers, and an address by the President, Joseph Barker, Jr., Esq., which was cordially received.

"More time having been taken up in examining the Stock, &c., &c., than was anticipated, the company sat down to an excellent dinner at 3 P. M.—At 4, the Society repaired to the Court Room when the several committees, by their several chairmen, announced to whom the premiums had been awarded—and who were requested by the President to come forward to the Treasurer, sitting at the table, and take their cash.

"The scene was truly interesting, and such as made a deep impression on the mind of everyone present of the beneficial effect of a society of this kind, fostered by the citizens generally, and properly conducted in a country even as young as ours.

"The season being reasonably dry, the products of the soil are light.

"The Premiums were awarded as follows:

To P. P. Putnam, of Union, $20 for the best Merino ram.

To J. D. Stone and Belpue, $1 for the second best Merino ewe.

To Henry Fearing, of Marietta, $1 for the second best.

To P. P. Putnam, of Union, $10 for the best ten Merino lambs.

To Benjamin Dana, of Waterford, $1 for second best.

To Levi Oden, of Waterford, $10 for destroying the greatest number of wolves.

To John Hensley, of Union, $5 for having the second the best greatest number.

To Charles Tidd, of Grandview, the sum of $20 for his horse, Rockingham, the best stud kept in the county the last season.

To George Henderson, $1 for second best.

To ——— McAtee, of Waterford, $10 for the best colt under three years of age.

To J. P. Mayberry, of Marietta, $10 for the best brood mare and sucking colt.

To Thomas Seely, of Waterford, $2 for the next best mare and colt.

To John P. Mayberry, $1 for the second best colt under three years.

To Charles Fuller, $10 for the best bull under four years.

To E. Battelle, of Newport, $1 second best.

To John Stone, of Belpre, $10 for the best cow.

To William R. Putnam, of Marietta, $10 for the best yoke of working oxen.

To Ebenezer Gates, of Marietta, $1 for second best.

To Joseph Barker, Jr., of Newport, $5 for the best calf.

To Samuel Brown, of Warren, $6 for the largest hog, supposed to weigh about 600.

To George Dana, of Belpre, $1 for the second largest.

To John Stone, of Belpre, one of Winan's Patent Ploughs, of the value of $10, for the greatest crop of corn.

To Stephan Dana, of Newport, $8 for the largest quantity of potatoes to the acre.

"The committee on sheep reported that the specimens of the various flocks exhibited great enterprise and attention; the sheep generally were excellent—they had no small difficulty in selecting for premiums.

"The committee on Butter and Cheese reported the premium of $5 to ——— Smithson for the best butter; to Mrs. Middleswart, $2 for the second best. Mr. Manby's and Mr. Lake's were very good. William Dana, of Newport, received the premium of $5 on the best cheese. Samuel Beech of Waterford, $2 for the second best. O. R. Loring, William R. Putnam and M. Mills, all of Belpre, exhibited excellent cheese.

"Mrs. William R. Putnam sent a beautiful specimen of linen, for which a small premium was awarded. Miss Harriet Brown, of Waterford, sent also a small specimen of very handsome linen, for which a small premium was awarded.

"Handsome specimens of cotton and indigo were presented by John Morris (colored man) of this town, for which a small premium was awarded.

"Specimens of leather, in fine order, were exhibited by Messrs. Dodge & Crawford,—and by Otis Wheeler, also by James Forgason.

"Handsome specimens of hats were exhibited by Messrs. Curtis & Dunn.

"Carpeting.—Mrs. Col. Mills, Miss Eliza McFarland, Mrs. Wilson and Mrs. Bingham sent in a handsome piece each; much praise was bestowed on the ladies for the carpeting—another year more attention will be paid the ladies for household manufactures.

"Several specimens of Yellow Leaf Tobacco, in excellent order, were exhibited by J. Barker, Jr., A. Chapman and M. Flanders.

"A. Warner, of Point Harmar, exhibited an ax, of cast-steel, which is recommended in high terms to the notice of the Farmers.

"E. Emerson exhibited specimen of his razorstraps very highly finished—a superior article.

"A. Cole, of Belpre, exhibited some excellent baskets, worthy the attention of our farmers, and for which a premium of $1 was awarded him.

"There was also awarded to Marvil Starlin $1 for having raised, on upland, the past season 52 bushels of corn to the acre—each acre containing 2,500 hills of corn.

"At the close of the day several articles were sold at auction, at fair prices—Premium Butter at 20 cents per pound—Premium Cheese at 28 cents per pound.

RAILROAD TO OHIO.

Copied in the American Friend, March, 1827.—

"The projected railway from this place to the Ohio has originated with some of our wealthiest and most judicious citizens, and excites much attention in the public at large. The pamphlet just published on the subject consists chiefly of estimates from authoritative sources, on the comparative cost and advantage of canals and railways, and on the amount of trade which would seek either of these channels of communication with the West. It will be read with attention by every one who feels an interest in these topics generally, or in the prosperity of Baltimore. A general sentiment prevails here in favor of the scheme, as well from the character of its promoters, as from the evidence recently accumulated from various quarters, on the efficacy and cheapness of rail-road communication.

The trade of the valley of the Ohio is already so important, and promises to become so immense, that it would deserve to be secured at almost any cost commensurate with our means. It must be confessed at the same time that the obstacles to a canal are various and formidable—the scarcity and annual diminution of water, the immensity of the lockage, and the delay arising from it, the large portion of the year in which the canal would be frozen, and, finally, its insalubriousness during the autumn, in this latitude. These difficulties, though they could not have justly countervailed in the mind of the public, the advantages of a canal, render, however, so much the more striking the merits of a scheme by which it is supposed they may be wholly obviated. It will certainly be an ample recompense for the anxiety with which for some time past we have seen the trade of the interior gradually diverted into other channels and likely, at length, to be lost to us altogether, if our delay shall have saved us from embarking in a scheme of secondary utility, and reserved our means unimpaired, for one of greater facility, economy, and efficacy.

"Not the less praise, however, would be due on this account, to those who originally drew the attention of our citizens, and at a time when the theme was not popular here, to the value of a canal connecting us with the West. All human schemes are progressive, and the knowledge collected with pains for one purpose is not unseldom happily applied to a very different one. Thus the various plans in relation to the Susquehannah have led us gradually, we hope, to some definite one for securing the trade of that most valued river. To the inquiries, too, to which the project of a canal to the Ohio gave rise,—to the estimates of the trade of that country, of its wealth in minerals and other articles of trade,—we are indebted not only for much valuable matter in itself, but for the data on which to found our calculations as to the new enterprise now afoot for securing the trade of the West."

BALTIMORE AND OHIO RAIL ROAD.

"A meeting of the citizens of this county is requested in this town on Monday next, by a notice which we have been requested to publish in to-day's paper. This section of country being deeply interested in the termination of this very important road, it is hoped a general attendance of the citizens will take place.—The best information we have obtained on the subject induces a belief that Marietta will be the point of termination of the road. The Legislature of Virginia, in assenting to the act of incorporation, have limited the company, in intersecting the Ohio, to a point at or above the mouth of the Little Kanawha. The connection of the road with the Muskingum River, among many other superior advantages to any other point, induces a belief that, by the efforts of the citizens on this line, the location of the road will be made to terminate at this place.

"The Baltimore American of March 20th, says that 13,586 shares of stock in the Baltimore and Ohio Rail Road Company were subscribed between ten and two o'clock yesterday, being the first day of opening the books. Many persons, to our knowledge, who intend to subscribe, have not yet gone forward, inasmuch as the books are to continue open for the succeeding nine days, including the present—and as subscriptions made at any time during that period, will be equally good with those entered on the first day. The subscriptions will greatly over-run, if they do not double, the amount required—so far, therefore as this important scheme depends upon money, its success is certain."

"The Baltimore and Ohio Rail Road Company have elected their Directors, whose names will be found in our paper today. As they commenced the enterprise with spirit and energy, so they are progressing as rapidly as the magnitude of the work will permit. We learn that arrangements have been made for the immediate survey of the routes for the location of the road.

"A writer, in the Scioto Gazette, recommends to the Baltimore and Ohio Rail Road Company a continuation of the road from the Ohio River, west, through Ohio, to the Miami Valley, to the Wabash, and even to the Mississippi; which we have copied into our paper today. The present object of the company, as we conceive, is to intersect the great artery of Western commerce, on the best route, and to the greatest advantage, to command as much of the Western trade, through the channel of the Ohio, as possible, which will not be a small proportion. It is at all times highly gratifying to witness the progress of internal improvements, and especially the construction of roads and canals. It has heretofore been presumed that to connect the Ohio River with Baltimore by Rail Road, was sufficient; but if the continuation to the interior of our State, west to the Wabash, or Mississippi, should be attended with proportionate advantage, we, at present, have no reason to doubt the propriety of extending it. It is true, that it is a stupendous work, to come even as far as the Ohio River; but the money, for the purpose, has already been raised, and materials and workmen will be easily commanded. Should the point of termination be at the confluence of the Muskingum with the Ohio, the attention of the State, or a company, would consequently be attracted by the necessity of the improvement of the navigation of the Muskingum River—and ultimately, to a continuation of the Rail Road west."

"In our paper today will be found the proceedings of the Morgan County meeting on the subject of the Rail Road from Baltimore to the Ohio River. The sentiments therein expressed are consonant with the feelings of the mass of citizens in this section of country. Every person who feels an anxiety for the prosperity of his country, cannot feel otherwise than highly pleased at the prospect of Internal Improvement and the encouragement of Domestic Manufactures—one is a guarantee of the perpetuity of the union of the States, and the other of their independence;—the aspect of the political horizon, however, is portentous of a coming storm, and all depends on the information and good judgment of the people to avert its consequences—we mean the approaching contest for the Presidency. The outs are determined to be in, at all hazards—and one of their principal hobby-horses is, that the present Administration is in favor of Internal Improvement, and that it is unconstitutional. This question, we thought, had, some time since, been decided by the proper authorities, and was joyfully acquiesced in by the people, who, conscious of its tendency to meliorate their situation—facilitate the communication between the extremes of our extensive country—provide a market for their surplus productions, even at their own door—and, serving to unite the interests of the different sections of our country, which, otherwise, must necessarily be brought into collision, and perhaps to ruin,—had sat down under the assurance of the accomplishment of an object so near their hearts. Now, that the outs (who are opposed to a measure of such vital importance, because, they say, it is unconstitutional) may get in, they bring it forward as a principal objection to the present Administration—and are endeavoring to persuade the people to come over to their interest, under the pretext of being more capable of construing the Constitution than those who are now so fortunately at the helm of our political affairs."

Wednesday, May 30, 1827.—

"Enquiries having been made of us, by citizens in remote parts of the country, respecting the recent proceedings of the Rail Road Company, and the prospect of the road terminating at this place—induces us to notice the interest which is generally expressed on the subject, and the high hopes entertained, by the best informed, that our wishes will be gratified. As to information on the subject through the medium of the papers, we have not recently received any more than we have published. We are informed, however, that the corresponding committee of this county have in their hands a letter recently received from Baltimore on the subject, which extends as much encouragement as from the present stage of the business could be reasonably expected. All the information we receive, which we deem interesting to our readers, shall be promptly laid before them."

September 10, 1827.—

"Mr. Prentiss:—Sir, We understand, from good authority, that the examinations which have been made, under the directions of the committee of the county, conducted by Col. Joseph Barker, from the Ohio River, opposite this place, to Clarksburg, have proved highly satisfactory. Lieutenants Trimble and Barney, Engineers, are now on the waters of the Little Kanawha, from whence they will return to this place for the purpose of going upon the examination of the route from Cow Creek, by the north fork of Hughes River, to Arnold's Creek, which puts into Middle-Island River, from thence up the same to the waters of Ten-Mile Creek to the head of Turkey-Foot Fork, thence over upon Limestone Creek down to Elk, at Clarksburg. They will also examine Middle-Island River, from its junction with the Ohio, until they intersect the route from Cow Creek to Clarksburg.

"We speak with confidence and advisedly, and say, the route from Tyger Valley River west, up from Grape Run to the head of Simpson's Creek, down to Bridgeport, thence to Elk Creek, down the same to West Fork to the mouth of Limestone Creek, up the same, thence down Ten-Mile Creek to the Forks, up Salem Fork to the dividing ridge at Moore's, down Middle-Island waters to the mouth of Arnold's Creek, up the same to the Fork of Long Run, up the same over to the waters of Hughes River, by the State House (Martin's), down the same to the mouth of Bear Run, up the same and over upon the waters of Cow Creek, thence down the same to the Ohio River, ten miles above the mouth of the Muskingum River, the grand artery of the State of Ohio; we say this is one of the best possible routes for the Rail Road, the distance is about one-third of the way from Marietta to Baltimore, is capable of receiving a more level road, and at less expense than the same distance from Baltimore west.

"Gentlemen in Clarksburg have endeavored to go about 12 miles south of that place with the road for Parkersburg, but failing, as we believe in finding as advantageous ground as was anticipated, have cast an eye from Tyger Valley River to Marietta, by Clarksburg—and this is called the new route."

The following letter from the President of the Board at Baltimore, to a gentleman in Clarksburg, is interesting:—

Office of the Ohio and Baltimore Rail Road Company, Aug. 25, 1827.

Your letter of the 12th inst. has been received, I am highly gratified at the zealous interest you continue to manifest in the Rail Road, and have on behalf of the Company, to thank you very sincerely, for the aid you and other citizens of your country have afforded to them. I am, Sir, very respectfully,
Your obedient servant,

J. M. SMITH, President of the Ohio and Baltimore Rail Road Company.

September 26, 1827.

"On you, gentlemen, will soon devolve the duty to elect a man of ability and integrity to discharge the arduous duties of Senator in the Legislature of the State. At no previous period have subjects of as great local importance and deep interest been submitted to your consideration; they are such as to affect the feelings and hopes of every man among you. The formation of a Rail Road from Baltimore to the river Ohio will form a new era in our commercial relations and pecuniary concerns; it will furnish a rapid and safe conveyance of the goods of the merchant, and the ponderous productions of our soil—the mode will be safe, the trip short,—the market and returns certain; the effects will be to relieve us from pecuniary embarrassment, individually; give activity to a great dormant capital, and raise the value of a real property, of every description, in an eminent degree.

“Preparatory to the attainment of those great objects, a sacrifice must be made of some prejudices which arose from a difference of opinion on some political subjects; such, however, as might be expected to arise between men of strong intellectual powers and independent minds, on questions of difficult solution.

“Addressing those who have a perfect knowledge of the facts and considerations involved in this subject, it will not, at present, be necessary to enter into detail; it might be deemed a trespass or anticipation of gentlemen whose special appointment may render it their peculiar duty, and who will, no doubt, in due time perform it; but a brief recapitulation of some facts, of general notoriety and observation, may not be improper on the present occasion.

“Marietta occupies a site of inestimate value, when a fair estimate is formed of her local advantages. The Ohio River does not furnish inducements and advantages, to the Baltimore Rail Road Company, equal, in any other spot, to that opposite the mouth of the Great Muskingum; there the contemplated Rail Road will ultimately terminate, should we act with proper energy in developing the resources of the State, and furnish an unfailing communication with it by water. An immense quicksand bar, in the Ohio near the mouth of the Muskingum, renders the river Ohio almost impassable at that spot, at low water; below that bar there are no obstructions to the navigation by keel-boats, but such as can certainly and easily be obviated. Nature prescribes the spot, and the interests of the Rail Road Company will induce them to follow her dictates. The route through Virginia passing through or near Clarksburg is equal, perhaps superior, to any other which can be selected for the purpose. The contemplated improvement of the Muskingum, by means of dams and locks (until it will communicate with the canal, which terminates at Cleveland, on Lake Erie), will furnish a vast number of mill seats, with a water power equal to any object, or any purpose; on which factories, flour-mills, iron works, fulling mills, oil and sawmills will be erected on an extensive scale, and can command an adequate supply of requisite materials. Iron, coal and salt, nature has bestowed to us with munificent prodigality; we raise immense quantities of wool; the Mississippi will convey, in peace or war, inexhaustible supplies of cotton, at reduced prices, to the Muskingum factories; and there is no risk in asserting that the great Muskingum, in conjunction with the contemplated Rail Road, will become the emporium of this State, for wealth, manufactures, and commerce. The Ohio Canal will convey, on its bosom, into the Muskingum, all the richest and most portable productions of the interior of our State. The passage from Cleveland to Detroit is short, and with a little enterprise a great part of the fur trade would find its way to the Baltimore market through her channel. During the last session of our Legislature an endeavor was made, by Mr. William R. Putnam, to obtain an appropriation to discharge the expenses of a regular topographical survey of the Muskingum Valley, as a measure preparatory to obtain and to render it navigable; in which, after arduous efforts, he was partially successful. After the survey is completed, the report cannot fail of proving conclusively favorable; but to attain those objects, requires ability and knowledge, not only of this subject, but every other connected with it, and persevering exertion. The ability of Mr. Putnam is well known, his devotion to the accomplishment of this great object ascertained, his interest, the interest of his family and his friends are completely identified with yours. Superadded to those considerations, one more and that of no common weight, presents itself: There is, at the present day, no other man on whom the public voice will unite, in our county, to give a certainty of being elected. By electing Mr. Putnam, we shall have two members from this county to represent our interests, a Senator and Representative; otherwise we shall have but one. And, gentlemen, consider that on this great and important measure, conflicting interests will interpose; the opposition may be powerful, and if not met adequately, we may lose the great advantages which the God of nature designed for this section of the State. Union is necessary to success, and therefore we ought at this time to unite in favor of Mr. William Rufus Putnam as our Senator."

OUR CAN PROSPECTS

July 26, 1828.—

"There is plenty of room yet left for Marietta to become 'an important city.' We have in view the 'improvement of the navigation of the Muskingum,' which when completed will be equal if not superior to any canal; an act for which was passed at the last session of the Legislature, and no doubt is entertained, if the money market will permit, that the stock would be immediately taken up, when the books are open for subscription.

"We have in view the Baltimore and Ohio Rail Road, the termination of which, the commanding situation of this point, induces us to believe will influence its location in our vicinity; and we have as handsome situation for a town as any in the West. When these great works are completed, and the time is not far distant—this place will vie with almost any other, in importance—bustle of business—and commanding attitude."

HEALTH OF MARIETTA.

Saturday, August 22, 1829.—

"We have not in any season known it more healthy than the present. No case of fever, that had originated in town, exists within our knowledge, and but few are down with any disease. An erroneous opinion has gone forth in the world that 'Marietta is a sickly place'—this ought to be contradicted, and the distant public correctly informed. Our residence here has been of sufficient length to confirm us in the knowledge of its general health, and we declare it. In the course of thirty years we have been visited by three sickly seasons, and that is all—1807-22 and 23—and then we were not more afflicted than the Western Country generally. Our citizens think themselves highly favored in their location as to health, and are not willing to exchange it for any other on that account."

June 29, 1829.—

"The public are hereby informed that a New Road is now opened and ready for traveling from Zanesville to Marietta, by way of McConnellsville.

"This route is on much the best ground, and differs in distance but a few rods from the Old Road.

"Directions.—Persons traveling from Marietta on this road will proceed direct to Waterford Landing; thence up the river and cross Olive, Green and Meigs Creeks at or near their mouths, one fourth of a mile above the last-named creek, take the right hand road up the hill; then follow the ridge to McConnellsville. Those traveling from Zanesville will keep down the river about 13 miles, then the road rises upon the ridge (be careful to keep the road that is most on top the ridge); then the plainest road to McConnellsville.

"N. B. The Mail stage is expected to travel this route by the 10th or 15th of July."

SILK CULTURE.

October, 1830.—

"We have had deposited with us, as a sample, a couple of skeins of sewing silk, raised and manufactured last summer by Mr. J. Dexter of this place. From the appearance of this silk, as far as our knowledge extends, we do not hesitate to announce it of a superior quality to that of imported silk, and would recommend to those who are desirous of introducing the manufacture of the article, to call and examine it.

"Mr. Dexter, we are informed, is acquainted with the manner of raising the worm and keeping them in a healthy state, and is making preparations, by raising mulberry trees, &c., to carry the business on more extensively. It is ascertained, satisfactorily, that our climate is suited to the nature of the silk worm, and white mulberry,—the latter is a native of our soil and grows vigorously. It is hoped that more of the citizens of our county will take the subject into consideration. We believe the time is not far distant when it will become a source of great profit to those who embark in it, and a vast saving to the public, by retaining the money in the country that would be sent to foreign countries to purchase the article."

Saturday, June 18, 1831.—

"Since we published our last sheet, we have called upon Mr. Dexter whom, as we have before informed the public, intends going into the silk raising business as fast as the growth of the white mulberry tree will permit. We found him engaged in feeding about 70,000 worms, which were all he could conveniently obtain leaves for the present season. He has, however, made arrangements, and has a great number of mulberry trees set out, for the purpose of increasing the number of worms another season to 150 or 200,000. The experience had already confirms us in the opinion that our soil and climate are congenial to the growth and health of the silk worm, and we believe the time is not far distant when silk will be a principal article of export from this section of country. We are much gratified to be informed that a few other persons in our vicinity have taken the subject into consideration, and are trying the silk worms the present season—for the purpose of acquiring a knowledge of the nature of them, and the mode of treatment and care that will be required to rear them profitably in large numbers. An opportunity is now presented, through the experience of Mr. Dexter, for our citizens to acquire the information, to whom he is ready and willing to give any assistance, gratuitously, they may require; and it is hoped they will not be backward in calling upon him while his multitude are at work (say two weeks) and inform themselves by seeing as well as hearing.

"As a filature is about being established at Baltimore for the purpose of manufacturing silk—there will always be a ready market, in cash, for all the cocoons that can be produced;—we hope this will be an inducement, for those who are in any wise skeptical on the subject, to take hold of the business at once, and, within our borders, create a source of revenue that will be profitable and easily attained." oil-dressed and shabbily armed militia of Ohio

THE GERMAN IMMIGRATION.

After having arrived at Buffalo, we embarked on the lake, passed on to Cleveland, and thence on the canal, on which the beloved Garfield subsequently gained the sobriquet of "Tow Boy," we continued our journey to Zanesville, Ohio. We reached Zanesville on an old-fashioned training day. Those of you who remember what an old-style training day was, especially in the new and undeveloped condition of society and of government in the West, will at once understand what that meant, and the striking contrast such an exhibition presented to the eyes of those who had lived on the borders of France, a region that had been dominated at that time for nearly half a century by the military spirit and discipline which the First Napoleon had evoked, and which at that period was still dominant all over Europe. I remember well the amusement which the array of soldiers, dressed in every conceivable variety of uniform, afforded, armed with cornstalks and broom handles, and other equally dangerous weapons of war, who went through the evolutions of drilling, directed by the gallant captains of that period of frontier life!

This article was written in 1888

In those peaceful times my father might well laugh—when he contrasted these uncouth, ill-dressed and shabbily armed militia of Ohio with the French and German soldiers of the regular army, whom he had seen at an earlier day in the Fatherland! But had he lived to our times, he would have been taught the eloquent and patriotic lesson which doubtless some of these very cornstalk and broomstick heroes, or their immediate descendants, taught the world in that great contest evoked by our Civil War through which we have lived, and which gave to the world the names of such men—once doubtless crude and youthful American pioneers—as Farragut, Garfield, Hayes, Sherman, Grant and some in our very presence here tonight, who might not inappropriately be named, men who now fill as important a place in the history of the world, as Napoleon, and Wellington and Nelson, and the able world-famed generals, whom they commanded during the great continental upheaval that smote the nations of Europe at the close of the last and during the beginning of the present century!

From Zanesville we made our way down the quiet, yet beautiful Muskingum—to Washington County and finally to Marietta, our point of destination, in a flatboat, the only method of navigation then possible on this river, which as yet had been untouched by State aid, by the constructions of dams, and the slack-water system which in a few years thereafter was secured in its behalf, and which has made it since then a somewhat more important waterway of the State. Isaac Humphreys, of Point Harmar, a Democrat of the olden school, was elected to the State Legislature in 1835, served in the House for two terms, and in the Senate for two terms more, secured the appropriation by which this improvement was made, and the means of slackwater navigation were secured for this stream. The improvement, I well remember, was in progress in 1838, and it is a fact worth mentioning here that during this year, and perhaps for a year or more thereafter, John Sherman, as a young civil engineer, spent much of his time in Washington County, while engaged in that capacity upon this improvement.

In recalling these early days, I am reminded of the wonderful transformation that these fifty or more years have wrought upon the natural scenery—how the tide of immigration that came in and possessed the land, has since then shorn the hills of their forest trees, how the climate, as well as the atmospheric conditions, have been transformed thereby. How much more frequent inundations have since then become, and how great floods often sweep over Western valleys, and not infrequently carry death and destruction on an extensive scale before them. How the denudation of the forests is hastening the time when much of our country will be stricken with poverty for building material and fuel, as the older countries in Europe have been stricken for centuries. In driving a few years ago, from Marietta to Watertown, a distance of some twelve or thirteen miles, to visit a relative, over a road I had traversed again and again forty odd years before, and with which I had become perfectly familiar, I lost my way, because the forest trees had everywhere been cut down, and I had to make inquiries in order to put myself on the right road to reach my point of destination. This suggested to me the wonderful change which the settlement of the country had made and was making, and the hard exactions which civilization seems to demand.

CHAPTER X.

FORTY YEARS OF ADVERTISEMENTS.

FIRST DECADE—1801-1811.

Only a few newspapers of those published in Marietta before 1811—the Ohio Gazette and Virginia Herald, the Commentator and the Western Spectator,—have been preserved. We give a summary of the advertisements as published in the Centennial number of the Marietta Register.

From the Ohio Gazette and Virginia Herald, October 24, 1803.—

The first page is taken up exclusively with advertisements, set mostly in very large type, so that there were only seven in all; the list of letters remaining uncalled for in the Post Office at Marietta, October 1, 1803, occupying a column and a half of the four columns of the page. Griffin Greene was postmaster. Post-offices were not very frequent at that day, for we find letters advertised for persons living at "Belleprie, Little Kenhawa, Kenhaway, Gallipolis, Guiandot and Big Sandy." John Cline and Enos Atwater give notice that they intend to apply at the next fall term of court "for a right of establishing a ferry from a point at Fort Harmar across the Ohio River to Mr. Porter's, in Wood County, Virginia." Notice is given that the "inhabitants of the townships of Newport and Tuskarawa, in the county of Washington," intend to petition the General Assembly for a new county, with "a permanent seat of justice at, or near, the mouth of Licking Creek on the Muskingum." John

Buell gives notice that "a horse and a colt broke into the enclosure of the subscriber," and requests the owner to prove the property and take them away. N. Gates, secretary, gives notice of an adjourned meeting of mechanics to consider "the propriety of forming a Mechanical Society" in Washington County. Edward Tupper says he has "just received from Philadelphia, and offers for sale at his store in Marietta, a large and general assortment of Dry Goods, Groceries, Hardware, Saddlery, etc."

From the Ohio Gazette, May 21, 1804.—

The third page is half filled with the "Laws of Ohio," four short miscellaneous articles, and four advertisements,—one from Clarksburg, Virginia. John Greene advertises that he has "opened a Public House in the town of New Port, on the road of Marietta to Wheeling, fifteen miles from Marietta." James Riggs, of Grandview, says, "an iron gray mare came to my plantation and broke into my enclosure," and requests the owner to prove property, etc. Richard Greene offers for sale "a very valuable farm in the town of Marietta, about a half a mile from the city, containing 39 acres."

SECOND DECADE—1811-1821.

A summary of those found in the Western Spectator and its successor, the American Friend, contains items of interest to the student of local history. Among the names are many that still hold an honorable place in this county. We must, however, bear in mind that the list is by no means a complete one since the newspapers of those days contained very few advertisements, and of these few more than half were official notices. It was not then customary for lawyers and physicians to have a business card in the papers. As for dentists and insurance agents, they had not yet appeared.

In the decade here represented there were a few important economic changes, briefly and modestly announced, yet destined to have great influence upon the future development of the county. The steamboat had appeared on the Ohio, taking the place of the keel-boat, and a steam mill had been erected at Marietta. Mills for carding the wool into rolls to be spun on the old-fashioned wheel appeared at different places where water power was to be found, and, a little later, fulling mills were advertised. In this decade the bear and the otter had not entirely disappeared from the woods, and even after 1820 the skins and furs of these animals had not entirely ceased to be important articles of merchandise. It was the period of beginning for other industries. A tinner living on Wolf Creek could hardly accommodate the people of Marietta in 1902 by a monthly visit.

While many places have seemed to come nearer to us through the improvement in the means of transportation, other places have grown away from us, or perhaps have been left on one side of our lines of communication. For example, a man in the Shenandoah Valley would hardly have any reason to advertise in a Marietta paper of 1902, nor is it very likely that any citizen of Tennessee would do so.

That it was a period of the rapid growth of a very unsatisfactory kind of "banking" is shown from these advertisements, as well as from the extracts which appear in another part of the book. Our financial condition could hardly be worse than it was in 1820 after our numerous experiments in manufacturing paper "money."

The decade is associated with the introduction of Merino sheep and with a great improvement in quality, as well as increase in the quantity, of wool produced. The farmers of the county were still compelled to guard their flocks against the ravages of wolves and panthers.

FOURTH DECADE — 1831-1840.

In this decade the dentists appear, but merely as specialists who can stay but a short time. The portrait painter also appears in the same way. Daguerre had not yet been heard of.

There is a greater specialization in business. The drug store separates from the grocery and the milliner has her own store.

Pianos become an article of merchandise worth advertising and there is one instructor in flute playing.

The circus and menagerie appear a few times to relieve the monotony, but there is only one advertisement for a fugitive slave.

Schemes for turnpikes are very numerous — to Chillicothe, to Watertown, to Zanesville, to Newport, &c.

In the latter part of this decade many lotteries are advertised, and other grand schemes of speculation.

CHAPTER XI.

COMMERCIAL DEVELOPMENT.

IMPROVEMENT OF THE MUSKINGUM—RAILROAD HISTORY—NAVIGATION OF DUCK CREEK—COUNTY COURT HOUSE—OLD ESTABLISHED BUSINESS HOUSES—MARIETTA POST OFFICE—CITY HALL—MARIETTA TOWNSHIP IN 1833—WASHINGTON COUNTY IN 1834—WOLVES—EMIGRANT ASSOCIATION—PUBLIC SPIRIT—ROADS AND TURNPIKES—IMPROVEMENT IN HORSES—RAPID TRANSIT IN 1839—PASSING OF THE STAGE COACH.

IMPROVEMENT OF THE MUSKINGUM.

Between 1830 and 1880 canals had been constructed across our State and at the close of the period, the Muskingum had been made navigable by means of a system of dams and locks. In the survey for this work along the Muskingum, the youthful John Sherman, afterward the distinguished Senator and Secretary, carried a rod. By the year 1840 a railroad from the East was rapidly approaching our borders and four days would no longer be considered a wonderfully rapid trip from Baltimore to Marietta. Every element of our population which has taken a part in the country's industrial, and social development was then represented within our borders. Every creed also had its place of worship and its minister or priest. All the valuable land on the hills had been occupied and new houses had sprung up in every township. At this distance of time it is hard for us to realize how slow the growth of the country had been in the first half century. Marietta township, to which nearly one thousand immigrants had come within the first five years of the settlement, had, after 45 years, barely two thousand inhabitants, and even in 1840 only 2,689. For the next 45 years the development was gradual and the increase of population was by no means rapid. It is only within the last 20 years that there has been any rapid growth, and of this development we shall read in another chapter.

Inland navigation was revolutionized in 1827 when towing was discovered to be practical, and barge-building as well as boat-building began. At this date the Muskingum was not navigable except at high water. The "Rufus Putnam," a side-wheeler of 60 tons, was the first steamer that ascended the river. This occurred in 1824. Leaving Marietta Friday morning she reached Zanesville Saturday evening. The return trip was made in only eight hours, such was the rapidity of the river current. The first steamer to make the trip after slack-water improvement was made was the "Tuscarawas," September 18, 1841.

These improvements were first successfully agitated at the Court House at Marietta, January 3, 1835.

Marietta, January 10, 1835.

"Muskingum River.—Public attention is becoming attracted every day to the vast importance of this river. Few are so blind as not to perceive that before many years shall pass away, this natural channel will become the great thoroughfare for the exports and imports of the interior of Ohio. There is but one thing wanting to perfect it—that is a disposition on the part of the General Assembly of Ohio to do equal and exact justice to every portion of the State. An appropriation for the improvement of this river will only be meting out to the people of this section of the State that which is justly due to them. The country through which the Muskingum flows has ever steadily supported the policy of the State with regard to internal improvements—freely paid her proportion of taxes, which have become onerous, without a murmur—under a full conviction that the time would soon come when its claims would be heard and attended to. That time has arrived—and the people will never cease to petition the Legislature till justice be done them. Their united voice will be heard in the Legislative halls—and the voice of the freeman is seldom heard in vain. Reciprocal justice is all that we ask.

"The meeting held last Saturday on this subject passed resolutions requesting our Senator and Representative to use their influence to effect the passage of a bill making the proposed improvement, and to renew the memorial sent to them last session."

The citizens of Roxbury township actively interested themselves in the matter, as is shown by the following report of their meeting, and the resolutions there adopted:

1835. —

"At a meeting of a number of citizens of Roxbury township, Washington County, friendly to internal improvements, pursuant to public notice, convened at H. Gard's store on Saturday, November 28, 1835, for the purpose of taking into consideration the expediency of memorializing the Legislature of Ohio in regard to the improvement of the navigation of the Muskingum River. The meeting was organized by appointing G. P. Frisby, Esq., chairman, Hiel Dunsmoor, secretary; after which the following resolutions were adopted:

At a meeting of the citizens of the township of Roxbury, Washington County, Ohio, held at the residence of G. P. Frisby, Esq., on the 28th day of November, 1835, the following resolutions were adopted:

"Whereupon, Hiram Gard, Elias Puther and Hiel Dunsmoor were appointed said committee, who submitted the following, which were adopted:

Resolved, That the citizens of the Muskingum valley would be greatly benefited by the improvement of the navigation of the Muskingum River, and they will continue to press their just claim upon the legislature to improve as soon as possible the navigation of one of the best rivers of Ohio, in such manner as to conduce most to the good of the world.

Resolved, That the improvement of the Muskingum River, in such manner as to produce slack-water navigation from Zanesville to its conflux with the Ohio River, at Marietta, would be an object of inestimable value, not only to the citizens of the valley, but to the State generally.

Resolved, That we believe it to be only necessary for our wise Legislature to fairly understand and consider the subject, to induce them to make said improvement, at the expense of the State.

Resolved, That we deem it expedient to memorialize the Legislature of Ohio relative to the aforesaid improvement; wherefore,

Resolved, That James Rogers, G. P. Frisby, Evan Jenkins, Hiel Dunsmoor, Hiram Gard, Elias Puther, and John Malster, be a committee to prepare and present said memorial to the citizens of the township, for signatures.

Resolved, That Hiram Gard be requested to forward the memorial to our Representative, requesting him to send the same to the proper authorities for the attainment of the object of said memorial.

Resolved, That the proceedings of this meeting be signed by the chairman and secretary, and presented to the editors of both papers printed at Marietta for publication.

"And then adjourned.

GEO. P. FRISBY, Chairman.

"HIEL DUNSMOOR, Secretary."

A memorial was prepared for the Legislature and a bill was introduced the following winter by Hon. Isaac Humphreys, representative from Washington County, ordering the work and appropriating $400,000 for the purpose. The bill passed the House February 5th, and the Senate March 4th. Thanks were expressed to the author of the bill in the following testimonial:

Marietta, February 15, 1836.

To Isaac Humphreys, Esq.

SIR:—At a meeting of the citizens of the county this evening, at the Mansion House Hotel, the undersigned were appointed a Committee to express to you as their Representative, the grateful acknowledgments of the citizens of the County for the energy, promptitude and unswerving industry you have displayed in procuring the passage of the bill through the House of Representatives for the improvement of the Muskingum River by slack-water navigation; a measure which the citizens of the County have long been anxious for, as one of the most important branches of internal improvement, for the honor and interests of the State, and the valley of the Muskingum. And further to request you will accept of a public dinner from your constituents shortly after your return.—and that you appoint me day when it may suit your convenience to give us that high satisfaction and pleasure.

With cordial salutations, we are, most respectfully, your obedient servants,

Nathan Ward,	William Shaffer,
Joseph Barker,	Augustus Stone,
Sam'l E. Hildreth,	Sam'l H. Gates,
Silas Cook,	A. V. D. Joline,
Wm. A. Whittelsey,

In compliance with the act of the Legislature, under the direction of William Wall as acting commissioner, and David Bates as chief engineer, the work for the improvement of the Muskingum River was advertised to be let in the fall of 1836. The following is the advertisement that appeared in the newspapers, calling for bids on the Muskingum River improvement:

IMPROVEMENT OF THE MUSKINGUM RIVER BY SLACK-WATER NAVIGATION.

Proposals will be received on the 20th day of October next, at the Court House in McConnelsville, for improving the Muskingum River, by Slack Water Navigation from Zanesville to Marietta, 9 or 10 dams across the Muskingum River, 12 or 13 locks. The excavation of a number of short canals, and the building of several Canal Bridges, are included in the work.

Bidders will be expected to accompany their proposals with a recommendation of a substantial and unquestionable character.

Plans and specifications of the work may be seen at the Court House in McConnelsville, or at the Commissioner's Office, at Adams' Tavern, at any time after the 4th day of October.

WILLIAM WALL,

Secretary of Board of Public Works.
LANCASTER, OHIO, August 6, 1836.

The successful bidders were G. W. Manypenny, who secured the contract for building the dam at Zanesville; Josiah Spaulding, the lock at the same place; Hosmer, Chapin & Sharp, the dam at Taylorsville; Lyon, Buck & Wolf, the lock at the same place; Arthur Taggart, the lock and dam at Bald Eagle; Hosmer, Chapin & Sharp, the lock and dam at McConnelsville; Arthur Taggart, the lock and dam at Windsor; Lyon, Buck & Wolf, the lock and dam at Luke Chute; John McCune, the dam and canal at Beverly; Arthur Taggart, the lock at the same place; Lyon, Buck & Wolf, the lock at Lowell; Arthur Taggart, the lock and dam at Devois; Hosmer, Chapin & Sharp, the lock and dam at Marietta. The work was commenced in the spring of 1837 and completed in the fall of 1841. The size of the locks was changed from the original plan—which provided that they should be only 120 feet long by 20 feet in width—to 185 feet in length and 36 feet in width. Even this size admits only the smaller class of boats that navigate the Ohio. The supervisor and chief engineer, at the commencement and during the first two years' progress of the work, was Samuel R. Curtis, a graduate of West Point—a most excellent man, but said to be in a measure deficient in practical knowledge and experience. The members of the several firms were distributed as follows: Mr. Taggart supervised all four of his contracts, Mr. Wolf at Taylorsville lock, John Buck at Luke Chute, Truton Lyon the lock at Lowell, Colonel Sharp at Taylorsville dam, Stephen R. Hosmer the lock and dam at McConnelsville, Harlow Chapin the Marietta lock and dam. It was considered at the time of the assigning of the different contracts that the dam and lock at Marietta was the most difficult to construct—and justly, too—on account of the liability of back water from the Ohio River, and the other members of the firm insisted that Chapin, in consideration of having had the most experience, should perform the work, which was accordingly done.

The total cost of the Marietta or Harmar improvements was $120,000.

There was some dissatisfaction with the manner in which the dams were constructed, as is shown by the following extract from a newspaper:

November 16, 1839.—

"On Thursday night the water broke under the dam at this place, and washed out the gravel beneath the foundation, at a point near the end, on the Marietta side, so much that the dam had settled, at the lowest point yesterday afternoon, six or perhaps seven feet from the top line. The dam, being completed, was nearly or quite full of water, and of course the pressure was very great—the water still running through at a furious rate. The loss to the State will be very considerable; and should this breach be immediately repaired, there is no certainty that the dam will stand, it being equally as liable to be undermined in other places.

"We are of the opinion that the dam at this or any other point, on the Muskingum, cannot stand, unless the foundation is made of, or secured by pilings, where the bed of the river is composed of gravel and quicksands. This occurrence has confirmed us in the belief of this; and if it be true, the State would be greatly the gainer, if the whole wooden superstructure were entirely removed from its present location. The dam at this place, we believe, was not considered difficult in its construction, but unfortunately it was built on a sandy foundation."

Lock No. 1 was built on the Harmar side, which from a commercial and navigable standpoint was a mistake. The dam was washed out in 1892 and the government changed the lock to its present location, where it was completed some four years later. The lock here is 56 by 330 feet, 24 feet above the mitre sill. The lift is from six to 12 feet, according to the stage of the water. The keeper's house, a fine modern brick structure, was built in 1899, at a cost of $3,500, the lot, 45 by 250 feet, worth $12,000, having been donated by the city.

RAILROAD HISTORY.

Undoubtedly the most remarkable instance of early business enterprise, not only in Washington County but in the entire West, is outlined in a letter now in the possession of E. M. Booth, Esq., dated July 19, 1827—two years before a successful locomotive had ever been constructed—which reads as follows:

Attached to this is the subscription list of 95 citizens and receipt of James M. Booth as treasurer for $192. The survey was made, but for reasons political and pro-slavery the western termini were made at Wheeling and Parkersburg within the bounds of the old State of Virginia.

In 1837 a committee appointed at a county meeting commissioned Judge Cutler to go to Baltimore to confer with Louis McLane, the president of the Baltimore & Ohio Company, with regard to the route of that road which had been built about 80 miles.

Judge Cutler was again requested by a meeting of citizens, held November 30, 1839, to repair immediately to Baltimore and obtain interviews with the Board of Directors, and seek to impress on the minds of its members the great importance of terminating the road in this section of the Ohio Valley.

The efforts of the citizens of Marietta and Washington counties, however, in calling the attention of Baltimore railroad managers to the advantages of a location of their great work upon a line most direct to Cincinnati and St. Louis as well as most accessible to the fertile interior of Ohio, was so far successful that earnest efforts were made to secure legislation from the State of Virginia in accordance with that policy. The opening for public use of the Cumberland turnpike road to Wheeling had directed the attention of Baltimore merchants to that point on the Ohio river as the only one that would meet their views and interests. The city of Wheeling availed herself of this preference and exerted such an influence with the Virginia Legislature that years of controversy were spent in an effort on the part of the more intelligent and far seeing friends of the Baltimore road to reach the Ohio upon a direct route that would have given to Marietta the full advantage of her position.

Middle Island was the preferred route of those who had listened to representations urged by the agents from Marietta. Then as a next choice was Fishing Creek and at one time Fish Creek was accepted by the Baltimore managers as a compromise. But Wheeling influence prevailed and the Baltimore & Ohio Company were obliged to accept Grave Creek, 12 miles below Wheeling, as their point of entrance to the Ohio Valley or continue a struggle that promised indefinite delay.

Marietta & Cincinnati Railroad.—A special charter was granted to the Belpre & Cincinnati (afterward known as the Marietta & Cincinnati) Railroad Company in 1845 to build a road to Cincinnati, with terminus on the Ohio River, either at Belpre or Harmar.

The company was organized at Chillicothe and Washington County interests were represented in the Board of Directors by N. L. Wilson and William P. Cutler.

As the terminus of the Baltimore & Ohio was then undecided, they obtained from the Legislature—with the consent and approbation of the Belpre & Cincinnati directors—the right to extend from Harmar up the Ohio Valley to any point so as to connect with any railroad or other improvement that should be built to the Ohio River on the easterly side thereof.

This legislative grant of a right to extend from Harmar up the Ohio Valley was procured in accordance with advice received from the manager of the Baltimore & Ohio Company, and with their known wishes on that subject.

The following extract from a letter to Hon. William P. Cutler from Louis McLane, then president of the company, sufficiently indicates their views and fully justifies the efforts made to bring the road to Harmar:

BALTIMORE, JANUARY 14, 1848.

Unless it should be indispensably necessary to present some limit to the extension of your road, it would appear to me most advisable that the right should be obtained to extend it to any point on the Ohio at which the company should determine to connect with our road, or if a limitation be unavoidable, to obtain the right to extend it to any point on the Ohio River not higher up than the mouth of Fish Creek. That would enable you certainly to connect with the projected improvement either from that point of Fishing Creek, and I have very little doubt that before we finish our road to Wheeling our intersecting road will be authorized from the mouth of Fishing Creek.

The Belpre & Cincinnati charter, with Harmar as an available terminus, and with subsequent right of extension up the Ohio Valley, so as to meet the views expressed in President McLane's letter as above quoted, made a co-operation of all the above-named interests possible.

The first effort to build was by placing 24 miles between Chillicothe and Greenfield, and 11 miles east of Chillicothe under contract. This was soon followed by a second contract, extending to Byres station on the east and Blanchester on the west. At the date of these contracts the control of the company was in the hands of directors from Athens, Ross, and Highland Counties. Washington County had but two representatives on the board, Messrs. Wilson and Cutler.

Finally, after various vicissitudes, the track of the Marietta & Cincinnati road (the name having been changed because of alteration in the proposed route) was laid through to Harmar in 1857. In 1868 the road passed into the hands of the Baltimore & Ohio Company and soon, to save 10 miles in distance, 30 miles of road were built along the Hocking Valley to Belpre and the old road-bed of the Marietta & Cincinnati Railroad was abandoned. In 1884 a portion of the abandoned road-bed was reclaimed by the organization of the Toledo & Ohio Central Extension Railroad by T. D. Dale, Esq. Its western terminus was at Stewart, and its northern at Patos, where it connects with the Ohio Central lines. In November, 1893, it went into the hands of a receiver and in August of the following year Mr. Dale was appointed receiver.

Cleveland & Marietta Railroad.—The history of the enterprise, which resulted in the building of this road, is one of numerous failures. The company as originally organized was known as the Marietta & Pittsburgh Railroad Company, and it was brought into being for the purpose of constructing a road from Marietta to Dennison, Tuscarawas County, passing through the counties of Washington, Noble, Guernsey, Harrison, and Tuscarawas. The certificate of organization was filed September 29, 1868, and the first meeting of the stockholders, pursuant to a call of the incorporators, was held December 8, 1868, at the First National Bank of Marietta. The original incorporators were: William H. Frazier of Caldwell, William Glidden of Noble county, William C. Okey, William P. Cutler, and Rufus R. Dawes. The stockholders elected the following gentlemen as the first directors of the company, viz: William P. Cutler, A. J. Warner, and Rufus R. Dawes, of Washington County; William Frazier, of Noble; Isaac Morton, Thomas Greene and William Lawrence of Guernsey. At a meeting of the directors, held upon the same day William P. Cutler was chosen president, and Rufus R. Dawes, secretary. At the second meeting, held February 18, 1869, A. J. Warner resigned his place as director of the company and became, with James McArthur, party to a contract to construct the road from Marietta to Caldwell, a distance of 33 miles, the original purpose being to purchase the nearest good coal fields. They agreed to build the road for about $17,000 per mile, taking their pay in the stock subscriptions and bonds of the road. The contract was made and submitted February 18, 1869, and the directors were ordered to place a mortgage upon the road and issue bonds to the amount of $15,000 per mile. Construction was commenced in the summer of 1869. On June 30th the company was authorized to issue a mortgage of $1,500,000, it having been arranged to extend the construction from Caldwell to Dennison or some other point to connect with the "Pan Handle" or Pittsburgh, Cincinnati, Chicago & St. Louis Railway. Of these bonds $500,000 were to be used in payment for building that part of the road between Marietta and Caldwell already under contract. This action by the Board of Directors was ratified by the stockholders July 1, 1870. At the annual meeting of the stockholders December 14, 1870, it appears from the president's report that six miles of track had been laid. The grading was completed to Caldwell, and cross ties furnished for nearly the whole of the line. It was shown that the sum of $115,879 had been expended by the company, which by this time was largely in debt to the contractors.

At this meeting a new Board of Directors was elected, viz: William P. Cutler, Rufus R. Dawes, Samuel Shipman, James Dutton, of Washington County; William H. Frazier and David McKee of Noble. This Board organized by the election of Mr. Cutler as president, Mr. Frazier as vice-president, Samuel Shipman as treasurer, and J. A. Kingsbury as secretary.

Up to this time no effort had been made to carry out the company's plan of extending the line north of Caldwell. At a meeting of the directors, May 1, 1871, the following resolution was adopted:

Resolved, That the directors of the Marietta and Newcomerstown Road Company be and they are authorized to extend the line of the road north of Caldwell to Newcomerstown, and to enter into contracts for the same.

At the same meeting Mr. Warner submitted a proposition on behalf of the firm of Warner & McArthur, proposing to build the extension contemplated, and a resolution was passed authorizing the company to enter into a contract with them, the company agreeing to furnish the right of way. An agreement was executed on the 12th of June following. The contractors immediately began the work of locating the line through to Newcomerstown, which point had finally been selected as the place of junction. At a meeting held November 30, 1871, the northern terminus of the road had been changed from Newcomerstown to Canal Dover, Tuscarawas County, and the contractors were given authority to take subscriptions in the name of the county, and to enter into contracts for rights of way. By this time the road was completed and the rolling stock was moving over it between Marietta and Caldwell. The first train went over the road—from Marietta to Whipple, 14 miles—on the first day of April, 1871.

On the first day of January, 1872, the fourth annual meeting of the company was held, and the following directors were chosen, viz: A. J. Warner, Samuel Shipman, W. Richardson, W. H. Frazier, Isaac Morton, A. Wilhelmi, and William P. Cutler.

A. J. Warner was chosen president, and from this time on almost the entire responsibility of the affairs of the company rested upon him. The company had become largely in arrears to the contractors, being unable to collect subscriptions fast enough to pay for the construction. Arrangements were made with the several counties to provide subscriptions of stock to a given amount and to furnish right of way as conditioned prior to entering upon the construction of the road in them. As soon as the line was definitely located between Caldwell and Canal Dover, a branch was projected to run from Liberty, Guernsey County, via Coshocton, to Mansfield, to be known as the "Northwest Extension," which it was intended should become the main line. A considerable amount of money was subscribed, and county and township aid was voted to this line, but before work could be begun the panic of 1873 overtook the company and put an end to operations. Prior to this, however, Mr. Warner had negotiated the 1st mortgage bonds through parties in New York City and Amsterdam, which enabled the company to prosecute their work vigorously through the season of 1872.

February 11, 1873, the annual meeting for that year was held. The old Board of Directors was continued in office, with the exception of Mr. Richardson, whose place was filled by Thomas W. Ewart. During this year the name of the company was changed to that of the Marietta, Pittsburg & Cleveland Railway Company; the "Marietta City Branch" was built, affording connection with the Marietta & Cincinnati Railroad at Front street; and a consolidated mortgage was authorized to be issued for the purpose of providing additional funds, and taking up the mortgage previously issued.

It may be remarked, that during the summer of 1873 the work of construction was pushed ahead with all of the rapidity possible. Most of the grading was done, ties provided, and the line was got in readiness for the laying of iron, except in the construction of tunnels, of which four were proposed between Caldwell and Canal Dover. One of these it was necessary to complete before cars could be run on the road. On this tunnel, south of Newcomerstown, work was carried on night and day for several months. In order to hasten the track-laying and get the road into running order, the three other summits were crossed by steep grades and zig-zags. Progress, however, was considerably delayed, and the company and contractors were embarrassed by the tardiness of subscribers in paying the money they had promised, and the difficulty in selling bonds. But by employing every energy at their command and using their own funds, the contractors pushed the road forward until the panic came on. The track was then laid nearly to Cambridge, from the south, and most of the way from Canal Dover to Newcomerstown, upon the north, but none of the road had been ballasted and the cuts and embankments were new and required constant attention. At this juncture it became a serious question whether it was possible to complete the line or whether it must be abandoned. Bonds could not be negotiated, and it was almost impossible to make any further collections on stock subscriptions. The floating debt was large and pressing.

Up to this time Mr. Warner was not personally involved beyond the direct obligations he had assumed as contractor in building the road. The construction of the road came to a halt. Mr. Warner, knowing that if the work was long delayed, the iron on hand must be sold and the enterprise fail completely, and the subscribers along the line not only lose all of the money they had paid in, but also lose the road, determined to carry the project through, even if he did so at the expense of heavily involving himself, personally. In February, 1874, he went to Europe, and after some time spent there succeeded in effecting a negotiation whereby the first bonds were substituted by the new consolidated bonds and additional funds provided for carrying on the work. The business of the road, however, which was largely dependent upon the development of the coal and iron field, came to a standstill, furnaces "blowing out" and rolling mills "shutting down." The road was left by these causes without sufficient earnings to pay the interest on the bonds. This complication of troubles, being supplemented and aggravated by an unparalleled flood in Duck Creek, which did great damage along the southern part of the line, made it necessary to apply for a receiver. On August 5, 1875, A. J. Warner was appointed to this position by Judge Marsh of the Court of Common Pleas of Guernsey County. The road was operated by the receiver from this time until June 13, 1877, when it was sold under order of the court, Cyrus W. Field, John Paton, and Isaac Morton becoming the purchasers as trustees for the bondholders. The trustees conducted the business of the road until May 1, 1880, when, in accordance with an agreement made by the bondholders, the road was transferred to the new organization, the Cleveland & Marietta Railroad Company, a corporation duly formed under the State law, and having for directors Isaac Morton, of Cambridge; Douglas Putnam, of Marietta; Stanley Mathews, Larz Anderson, F. H. Short, and Charles W. West, of Cincinnati; Cyrus W. Field, Charles Lanier, and John Paton, of New York City; C. D. Willard, of Washington, District of Columbia; and S. C. Baldwin, of Cleveland. These directors elected Isaac Morton, president and treasurer, and S. C. Baldwin, vice-president and secretary.

On January 1, 1900, it passed into the hands of the Pennsylvania Railroad Company, to which it sent its rolling stock.

One of the railroads in the last line of Marietta in the railroad building line was the Ohio Valley, or rather the Marietta & Cincinnati & Bellaire Railroad. For this enterprise this city voted $100,000 in 1852. A large part of the road between here and Bellaire was graded and large sums spent on stone work along the line. Then came the pinch for money to complete the road and only the Cincinnati and Marietta division was completed.

The enterprise lay dormant until some time in the "seventies," when a new company was formed to build the road, and it might be said in passing that a company was also formed to build a road from Marietta to Zanesville on the east side of the Muskingum. Gen. Rufus R. Dawes was at the head of this enterprise. Both of these companies relied on the counties, towns and villages along the lines of the respective roads to vote money to help build same. This the various municipalities along both rivers had done and the contracts were about to be let for the construction of them when the law under which the votes were taken was declared unconstitutional and both enterprises fell through. That decision was in the nature of a calamity to Marietta.

Then a few years later General Warner got control of the right of way held by the old M. & C. Railroad which cost $10,000, the money as supposed, having been furnished by the Pennsylvania Company to purchase the same. Then a campaign was inaugurated to raise money by private subscription and to secure donations of the remaining rights of way. An accurate survey was made and all the plans, profiles and grade papers, etc., necessary to let contracts for construction, were prepared. This was in the year 1883.

Marietta had no Board of Trade then and everything was left to one man, General Warner, who did all the negotiating with the Pennsylvania Company, and the people were assured that the road would be built. Railroad ties were bought and distributed along the line, and so far as any outsider could tell, the road was an assured fact, and we were congratulating ourselves that our hopes were at last to be realized, but suddenly the whole enterprise was dropped, the ties were shipped to the Pennsylvania, which road is always needing railroad ties, the plans and specifications were folded up, General Warner went to Congress and all the hopes, enterprise and efforts of the citizens of Marietta went for naught and the enterprise was laid away with this epitaph: "Requiescat in Pace."

The Ohio River Railroad on the opposite side of the Ohio was built about the time the Ohio Valley was abandoned; whether that had anything to do with the abandonment of the enterprise is not definitely known. There can hardly be any competition between two railroads on opposite sides of such a gulf as the Ohio. Impassable except at the ferries, which are few and far between, a railroad on this side of the Ohio would not only hold every passenger, but every pound of freight, absolutely as though no such road as the Ohio River Railroad ever existed. Not only that, but a road along a great river like the Ohio between such cities as Bellaire and Marietta, with the prosperous communities lying between, would pay from the word go. There is no more promising opening for the investment of money than in building this road.

"At the last session of the Ohio Legislature, an act was passed, entitled, 'an act to incorporate the Duck Creek Navigation Company,' authorizing said company to improve the navigation of said Creek by slack-water; in pursuance thereof a meeting of the Commissioners appointed by said act was held in Salem Township, on the 14th day of May, 1837, for the consideration the expediency of opening books to receive subscriptions to the stock of said Company, a majority of said Commissioners being present, a meeting was organized by calling Harry Hill to the chair, and appointing Joel Tuttle, Secretary. The following resolution was then offered and unanimously adopted by the meeting:

Resolved, That we deem it expedient that books shall be opened, agreeably to the act entitled, "an act to incorporate the Duck Creek Navigation Company" for subscriptions to the stock of said company, at Marietta, Fearing, Salem and Aurelius, in the County of Washington, and State of Ohio.

"On motion it was moved that six of said Commissioners be appointed to open the books to receive subscriptions to the stock of said Company, at such time and place as they may deem expedient. Whereupon, the following persons were appointed for that purpose viz: William W. McIntosh, Selden N. Merriam, James Dutton, James M. Amlin, Harry Hill, Silas Hobby.

HARRY HILL, Chairman.

"JOEL TUTTLE, Secretary."

NOTICE

Is hereby given that one hundred shares have been subscribed to the stock of the "Duck Creek Navigation Company," agreeably to the requisition of the 4th section of the act of the Ohio Legislature incorporating said Company, and that a meeting of the stockholders will be held at the school house in Salem township, near the house of Rufus Payne on the 3d day of June, 1837, at 6 o'clock A. M., for the purpose of electing five directors, to manage the concerns of said company.

By order of the Commissioners.

May 6, 1837.

JOEL TUTTLE, Secretary.

COUNTY COURT HOUSE.

The first court was held at the residence of Col. Ebenezer Battelle and subsequently in the Northwest Block-house. Sometime before the close of the 18th century a Court House was erected at a cost of about $1,000. A movement to that effect is mentioned in the records of 1792, but we cannot find that the appropriation was made until 1798, and the building was erected the next year. The upper story was used for courts and the lower for jailor's residence, with a strong log jail attached. A new Court House was finished in 1823, 48 by 48, two stories. The north addition was erected in 1854 and the front 24 by 48 was put up in 1876. A petition signed by 19 citizens asked that the old part be located near the center of the lot; the commissioners granted the petition, which is still preserved with the original signatures. The present Jail was built in 1848.

The movement for the erection of the handsome Court House, a view of which appears as the frontispiece of this work, was led by the Marietta Board of Trade in 1898, and a vigorous canvass brought a majority of the votes to favor the retirement of the old Court House and the County Commissioners began to provide for the expense. The contract for the new structure was awarded, August, 1900, to W. H. Ellis and H. C. Kennedy, doing business as W. H. Ellis & Company, Cincinnati Contractors, who have had large experience in the erection of public buildings and are a thoroughly reliable firm. Their bid was for $147,000; allowances for extras doubtless brought the cost to exceed $150,000. Washington County now has the most superb structure in Southeastern Ohio. The architects are Samuel Hannaford & Sons, of Cincinnati, and the work is under supervision of W. L. Hadley, Henry Strecker and D. R. Shaw, County Commissioners. The building is faced all around with Bedford stone and required over two millions of bricks in its walls. It has a frontage of 114 feet on Putnam and 141 feet along Second street. The comb of the roof is 68 feet high, top of the tower 158 feet above the ground and the building makes an elegant home for the courts and county offices. It will be made fireproof and the third floor will be a substantial steel jail.

OUR BUSINESS LEADERS.

Some of the more important commercial activities which have done their part toward making Marietta known in the business life of the west should not be omitted in the record of this half century of the city's life. Prominent among these stable industries is the A. T. Nye & Son Company. Anselm Tupper Nye was born November 9, 1797, in the Campus Martius, and spent most of his life in furthering interests connected with this city. A foundry was started near the old Fort Harmar site about 1829 and its projectors sold out to A. T. Nye, Sr., in 1830, who associated with himself his brother, Ichabod H. Nye, and a nephew, Reuben Maynard, as A. T. Nye & Company. In 1854, the junior partners retired and A. T. Nye, Jr., born December 17, 1832, became associated with his father, the firm name changing to A. T. Nye & Son, the latter being the active partner from thence until his death, January 9, 1899. For many years he was president of the Citizens National Bank, and otherwise largely interested in the city's progress. Succeeding the death of A. T. Nye, Jr., the A. T. Nye & Son Company was incorporated by his sons, G. L. Nye becoming president, H. B. Nye, treasurer; and A. T. Nye (3d), business manager, all natives of Marietta and grandsons of the founder of the business.

In 1866 the plant was removed to its present site on the Point where it occupies an acre of ground, bounded by Muskingum, Post and Monroe streets. The buildings comprise a large foundry, pattern shop, storerooms, offices, etc., and the specialties produced are the celebrated Leader stoves and steel ranges with all kinds of stove hollow-ware. By prompt methods, honorable dealings, and the intrinsic value of its products this firm commands an extensive trade. Employment is given to an average of 50 skilled men, making a pay-roll of about $3,000 per month. Through the depressions within the past 70 years, this plant has never ceased to give employment to its men and annually forward about the usual amount of goods to its customers. It has continued under a direct line of family descent since 1830, its financial integrity is unquestioned and the A. T. Nye & Son Company will doubtless remain in the future as in the past, in the front of Marietta's manufacturing success.

The Marietta Manufacturing Company & Company and has been operated as a foundry ever since under various firm names. It took its present title in 1890 and a year later was incorporated with a capital stock of $75,000. The present officers are Alla Winsor, president and secretary; J. H. McConnell, superintendent; W. S. Dye, treasurer. The works cover about an acre of ground, fronting on Fort and Putnam streets and extending back to Franklin street. This is a complete foundry with pattern and machine shops and has made a single casting which weighed 10 tons. The president is a native of the county and looks after the wholesale trade; the superintendent is a native Mariettian, for 30 years a machinist, while the treasurer was also born in this county and has resided in the city for 10 years past. The trade of the Marietta Manufacturing Company extends well over Ohio and adjacent states, the product being stoves and ranges, iron and brass castings, plows and repairs. In the well-furnished machine department a specialty is made of compound and condensing engines, pumps, etc., for the steamboat trade. Fifty to 60 men are employed and this solid industry is an important factor in Marietta's growth and continued prosperity.

The boiler plant of Henry Strecker has been in operation since 1867, when it was established by George Strecker. He was succeeded in 1898 by Henry Strecker, the present owner, one of the present County Commissioners. The works are located on Fort street, above Lancaster, and occupy almost an acre of land. When in full operation about 12 men are employed. Marine boilers are a specialty, many of the large Ohio River boats having been fitted out here.

There is no question but what the Marietta Chair Company is entitled to first place among the industrial concerns of this city, from the magnitude of its operations and probably in point of age. The chair business which was started here in 1820 was succeeded by the present organization in 1856. It is the leader in Marietta industries. Although its employees are all union men, the liberality with which they have been treated and the frankness with which they have been consulted has always met their approval and the firm has a record of "no strikes."

John Mills, president and treasurer, is a son of Col. John Mills, the family having been among Marietta's most enterprising citizens. J. H. Grafton, secretary and general manager, has been identified with the company for 32 years, and is now the vice-president of the National Chair Association and president of the Central & Southern States Association. Mr. Grafton's efforts in the upbuilding of Marietta are well known. The Marietta Chair Company, through its catalogues, has done much to advertise the fame of this city abroad and its magnitude of operations has been a great factor in the continued prosperity of the place; in short, the institution has been conducted on the broad-gauge principles, of which any city might well be proud. A large sawmill here is run by the chair company.

Thomas Cisler & Son, brick manufacturers, located on East Putnam street, are the pioneer brick works of Marietta. Established in 1858, the business has been continued on the same site ever since. The works are equipped for turning out about 25,000 building and paving bricks per day. The material from which the bricks are made is a superior quality of shale, gas is used for fuel and the bricks are burned in both up and down-draft kilns. The premises comprise about 25 acres and upon a slightly knoll near the works Mr. Cisler has erected a commodious structure in which the office of the firm is located. This industry is an illustration of Marietta's feasibility for manufacturing and a credit to its owners.

G. M. Knox & Son. Ship-building began in Marietta in 1800, continuing brisk until stopped by President Jefferson's "Embargo Act" in 1808. The first brig, 110 tons, was named the "St. Clair" and was built for Charles Greene & Company by Stephen Devol. In 1832 ship-building was again revived by Captain William Knox. He turned out about 35 boats, which were among the finest built in their time. In 1865 G. M. Knox purchased an interest in the business, and in 1887 H. D. Knox was taken into partnership. The boatyard is situated two squares below the mouth of the Muskingum River. It gives employment to from 30 to 50 hands as occasion requires.

MARIETTA POST OFFICE.

Prior to 1794, Marietta's only communication with the East was by private messengers. In the spring of that year a route was established between Pittsburgh and Cincinnati and an office opened here with R. J. Meigs, Jr., as first postmaster. The post came by this place every two weeks. In 1798 the first route was established between Marietta and Zanesville, the trip requiring from two to four days. Four years later a route was made to Cincinnati via Athens. In 1825 the service had vastly improved, but weekly mail was yet considered upto-date. The postmasters here for 20 years past have been S. L. Grosvenor, appointed 1882; E. S. Nye, 1886; E. R. Alderman, 1890; Henry Roeser, 1894; and M. M. Rose, 1898. Mr. Rose was chairman of the Republican County Committee prior to his appointment and favorably known in Marietta. About a ton of mail now passes through this office each day. The employees are: A. D. McCoy, assistant postmaster, with seven clerks, eight city carriers, and four rural carriers. The system of free rural delivery is being rapidly extended over the county. Last year the earnings of this office were a little more than $31,000, and if the present rate of increase continues until 1904, it will have reached the $40,000 limit, which would place it among the offices of the First Class. The Post Office now occupies commodious quarters in the new St. Clair Building on Putnam street, almost directly opposite the new Court House.

CITY HALL.

The need of a City Hall appears to have been felt for several years before any definite measures were resorted to for supplying the deficiency. The City Council decided in 1871 to erect a substantial brick building of a sufficient size to accommodate the city offices and the Fire Department, and afford a place of meeting for their body and their successors in office. The contract was awarded to W. W. McCoy, he being the lowest bidder, upon September 15th, and preparations were immediately begun for the work. It had been the intention of the Council to build upon the commons, now commonly called the Park, at the corner of Front and Putnam streets, but there was objection made to this location. An appeal to the court resulted in an injunction restraining the Council from building on the common, and thereupon the present site of the City Hall was purchased of M. P. Wells, Esq. Work had been begun here when the City Council, finding that there was much interest manifested in the matter, and a very general desire that the building should be much larger than had been contemplated, called a special election for the purpose of securing an accurate expression of public opinion. The ballots were prepared so as to read, "City Hall, yes," and "City Hall, no." The vote was very nearly unanimous for building a City Hall, and it being understood that the majority were in favor of a building which would answer all possible requirements and be an ornament to the town, the plans and specifications were changed, and a new contract made with Mr. McCoy. The building committee consisted of Michael H. Needham, George S. Jones, and Dudley S. Nye. They examined several city halls in neighboring towns and reported plans which were adopted October 3, 1871. Work was immediately begun and the building was finished and ready for occupancy by the first of February, 1873. The building cost about $70,000, nearly all of which amount was expended in Marietta. The Hall was formally opened February 4th, with a presentation by amateurs (all Mariettians) of Bulwer's drama, "The Lady of Lyons." A congratulatory address to the people upon the completion of the building was delivered by Gen. Rufus R. Daves before the curtain was raised. Two other entertainments were given upon the evenings of February 6th and 7th. The proceeds of the three, which amounted to about $12,000, was invested in scenery, which was presented to the city. In 1894 the building was remodeled at a cost of $17,000, making a commodious and complete opera house, which seats an audience of 1,500 and brings a steady revenue to the municipality.

MARIETTA TOWNSHIP IN 1833.

(From the American Friend.)

The township of Marietta is eight miles long on the Ohio River, and from two to six miles in breadth. It returns about 11,720 acres for taxation, and contains about 2,000 inhabitants. The town, as has been before stated, is situated at the confluence of the Muskingum and Ohio, and extends along each bank. Having hertofore alluded at large to its general features, we proceed more into detail, and state, as far as is in our power, the statistics of Marietta.

The public buildings are the Court House, Jail, Market House, Bank Building, Library Hall, Female Academy, Collegiate Institute, and four houses of public worship.

The Court House is a large and handsome building, square in front, two stories high, capped by a handsome cupola. The upper story contains a spacious and convenient court room, with two jury rooms, the ascent to which is by a neat flight of stone steps. Below, two transverse halls divide off four fireproof offices, used by the auditor, recorder, clerk, and sheriff.

The Jail is in the building formerly occupied as a Court House. Its occupants are never numerous.

The Market House is a small but neat building in "Second," on "Ohio" street. It is in general fully supplied with every variety which the season affords.

The Bank of Marietta is a large building, two stories in height, with an ornamental front, which is copied from the United States Branch bank in the city of New York. The banking room directors' room, guard room, and vault occupy the major part of the basement, while the remainder, with the whole upper story, is finished off neatly as a dwelling house. The banking institution is one of the best in the State, affording to farmers great accommodation and its stockholders a liberal dividend. Its discounts for the year 1832 amounted in the aggregate to the sum of $325,489.

There are three houses of public worship in Marietta.

The Congregational, which is the largest, is perhaps one of the first built in Ohio. It was planned by and erected under the supervision of Gen. Rufus Putnam. It is two stories high and furnished with a wide gallery extending around the sides and front. The front of the building presents a large gable flanked by two towers, which contain the staircases to the galleries, and a large clear-sounding bell, a present from the old Masonic Society in this place. The officiating clergyman is Rev. Mr. Bingham.

The Methodist Church is a neat one-story building on Second street, perfectly plain in its appearance, and embowered in a cluster of beautiful trees. It accommodates a very large congregation and is usually filled to overflowing. The present officiating clergymen are Rev. Mr. Poe and Dr. Roe.

The New Methodist Church is a handsome edifice, erected on Point Harmar, within a few months past. Its size is 50 by 30 feet. The front is ornamented by lancet-pointed windows, and presents an exceedingly neat appearance.

The Episcopal Church is now being built on a commanding situation, in Scammel street, corner of Fourth street, on the rise of ground ascending to "the plain." It is to be finished in the Grecian Doric order—the front being a vestibule of 10 feet projection, adorned by four massive fluted columns supporting a rich and heavy pediment. The size of it is 60 feet by 40. The building is of brick, which is to be stuccoed in imitation of marble, and the ascent to it will be a handsome flight of steps the whole width of the building. The clergyman officiating is Rev. Mr. Wheat.

This much for our public buildings. They are indeed ornamental to the town. The rural beauty of Marietta has often induced the observation that "but little business is done here; the houses are too clean." In answer we submit facts, premising them by one remark, that Marietta is extended over a large space (there being no less than 1,075 lots in the town) and the coal smoke which arises from our furnaces and mills, instead of overhanging the town in one dense black cloud, is driven off by the gentle breezes induced by the current of the rivers. Again, the business of Marietta is not done, as in other towns, by a continued rolling of carts, wagons and carriages alone. Our thoroughfares are the swift Muskingum and the broad Ohio, and where, in other towns, is only heard the incessant rumbling of wheels, in Marietta these sounds are responsive to the echo of the boatman's horn, or the steamboat bell. But to particulars. During the past months of the present year, no less than 40 flatboats have left town filled with produce, and manufactures. Keel-boats constantly arrive and depart laden; while steamboats contribute in by no means the least degree to the farther exports and imports of Marietta. The more extensive branches of business pursued here we name as follows:

The steamboat yard, owned by Messrs. Whitney and Stone, at which an extensive business is done in the construction of boats. We insert the names and tonnage of the boats built here, with pleasure, and if, perchance, it meets a traveler's eye, he may recollect their speed, their strength and beauty.

Steamboat "Red Rover," 150 tons, for J. Greene; built by C. Barstow, 1822.

Steamboat "Marietta," 150 tons, Whitney & Stone, built 1824.

Steamboat "Coosa," 180 tons, for J. Hagan, New Orleans; by Whitney & Stone, 1825.

Steamboat "Warrior," 120 tons, for B. Harner; by Whitney & Stone, 1825.

Steamboat "Muskingum," 160 tons, for J. Rice; by J. Hatch, 1825.

Steamboat "Oregon," 225 tons, for Whitney & Stone; by Whitney & Stone, 1826.

Steamboat "Cherokee," 182 tons, for J. Jones; by J. Hatch, 1825.

Steamboat "Isabella," 180 tons, for D. Greene; by W. & S., 1827.

Steamboat "Atlantic," 420 tons, W. Beach; by W. & S., 1829.

Steamboat "Herald," 80 tons, for J. Clark; by W. & S., 1829.

Steamboat "Java," 80 tons, Fearing & Company, in 1830.

Steamboat "Chesapeake," 180 tons, H. Dobbin; built, 1831.

Steamboat "Whale," 320 tons, Z. Foster & Co., New Orleans; by W. & S., 1831.

Steamboats "Orion" and "Eclipse," 70 tons each; by W. & S., 1832.

The Marietta Foundry is in full tide of successful operation. Castings of every kind are made here, and in the best manner. None, perhaps, can be produced superior to them. From 100 to 120 tons of pig iron are moulded in this foundry every year.

The Marietta Steam Mill is a large building of freestone, three stories high, containing three run of stones, and manufactures from fifty to sixty thousand bushels of flour per annum.

There are besides these two steam saw-mills (one of which also produces flour), two carding machines (one worked by steam), and four tanneries. One of these tanneries is very extensive. It has just been erected and put in operation by the Messrs. Vintons, formerly of Philadelphia. A steam engine performs the duties which in other instances are done by the strength of hand, saving consequently a vast amount of manual labor.

WASHINGTON COUNTY, 1831.

of Washington County re-echoed to the howlings and heavy tramp of the buffalo, the panther and the bear, and the howl of the wolf; the fleet deer bounded, with timid feet, from the approach of the hunter; the lofty flight of the wild fowl was no protection against the unerring aim of the arrow, which, whizzing through the air, brought back its fluttering mark; the lifted head of the rattlesnake reared itself in the path of the traveler; and the red torchlight of the Indian fishing canoe glared intensely on the light ripples of the water. But those days are now no more; the "stamping grounds" show where once the buffalo resorted; and the panther lives only in the traditions of old hunters. The arrow has given away to the rifle ball; the rattlesnake retires to unfrequented rocks and sands, while the fishing canoe no more glides along, managed by the dusky form of the red man, but is guided by the dexterous boatman's pole.

The wild animals at present found in the county are chiefly those of the most harmless character, and which contribute to the sustenance of man. There is perhaps in the most uninhabited parts an occasional bear, or, perchance, at night a wolf may be heard to howl in some remote glens on the borders; but I may safely affirm that but few inhabitants of the county, at the present day, meet with either the one or the other. The deer still bounds with noiseless tread before the hunter's path, and the corn is sometimes molested by the secret attacks of the raccoon, opossum, or squirrel. The wild turkey stalks along the woods in large flocks; the streams are lined with the brilliant plumage of the wild duck; and high in the air may be noticed the buzzard, wheeling in wide circles until his keen eye and scent attract him to the ground. The wild gray goose may be seen winging its vernal and autumnal flight through the air; and in the autumn may be heard from almost every branch the twittering of wild pigeons. Clouds on clouds come in thicker and thicker, until millions are assembled in one grand "roost."

"In the township of Decatur is a tract three or four miles square, occupied by the wild pigeons as a roost, in the year 1832. The timber over this tract is entirely destroyed. Millions of beautiful birds made this their domicile for several months and afforded much sport to the huntsmen, and much food for the foxes." (Manuscript notes of W. C. by S. P. Hildreth.).

Petroleum ("spring-oil" or "Seneca oil") has been known to the hunters and early inhabitants of the county since its first settlement. It is generally supposed to be the product of coal at a great distance below the surface of the earth. It is, as is well known, an oleaginous substance, rather thicker than common tar, possessing a strong, disagreeable odor. This oil, by filtering it through charcoal, is almost deprived of its empyreumatic smell, and can be used in lamps, as it affords a brilliant light. It is very useful, and therefore much employed in curing the diseases of and injuries done to horses. It is a preventive against the attacks of the "blowing fly," and is perhaps the best substance known for the prevention of friction in machinery.

There are to gases, "sulphuretted hydrogen," and "carburetted hydrogen," which rise copiously in some places from the earth, particularly on the banks of the Little Muskingum. The last named gas is considered so strong a mark of salt that many wells are sunk on this evidence alone. When a light is applied the gas inflames and burns for days, until extinguished by rain, or a sudden gust of wind. There are some pools of water through which gases rise, and which consequently have acquired the name of "burning springs."

While on this subject it will be expected that I should name the market at which produce is sold and the best means of conveyance thereto. It has been remarked that the numerous streams gave surprising facilities to the inhabitants of even the inland townships, of conveying their goods and produce to market. Now there are so many markets of easy access that it is left to the final decision of the agriculturist, whether to convey his load to Marietta and there sell it, or to take it to Cincinnati, Louisville, Natchez, or New Orleans. It is a general practice for the farmer to select a large, tall and straight poplar (Liriodendron tulipifera) from which he whip-saws two large boat gunwales. By properly framing and fastening to these, cross pieces, studding and joists, boarding the whole up carefully, and caulking the bottom, to render it water-tight, he obtains a light draught flatboat, to which he appends a long sweep to steer with, and two others for rowing. Into this boat he conveys all his surplus produce, and perhaps that of his neighbors also, and with the assistance of one or two hands launches out into the current of the river, which bears his boat along to the market below. Generally the boat and cargo are sold at Cincinnati, although sometimes it is found more profitable to let the boat float on to New Orleans, and disposing of the cargo and boat there, at advanced prices, to return home by one of the countless steamboats, which adorn the Western waters. These flat-boats usually hold from six to eight hundred barrels tonnage. Frequently the owners of the freight bring back in return a quantity of groceries, such as sugar, molasses, coffee, rice, &c., on which they make a second profit when they arrive at home. The convenience of access to Washington County affords its inhabitants other facilities. It is generally, as we have said, better suited to grazing than to arable farms. Where then is the market for cattle, for horses, for pork, for wool, and other produce of such farms? My answer is, you may have it at your own door. Annually drovers perambulate the county to buy up all the cattle they can obtain. The Eastern markets are supplied with our leaves. Our horses are before the carriages of the Eastern cities droves being sent thither annually. Our pork and cheese supply the mart of New Orleans, sent hence by our merchants; while our wool is exported (by tons) every year to the Eastern manufactories, after having been purchased at the farmer's own fireside by the merchant from the seaboard on his annual visit.

Such are the markets of Washington County. To the enterprising farmer, who will adventure a little for large profits, the mart of New Orleans is the point of attraction. The distance is great, but the cost and trouble of transportation is very small. Others proceed only to Cincinnati, or Louisville, and there dispose of their boats or rafts; and still more, preferring to devote the whole of their time to the cultivation of their farms, await the annual call of the beef or horse drover, or of the pork dealer, or wool merchant, and dispose of their surplus produce at home.

WOLVES.

NOTICE TO WOLF KILLERS.

My undersigned, Mr. WOLF, born and bred in this new country, now the State of Vermont, where wolves were extremely annoying, causing the death of vast numbers of Sheep, but which were soon destroyed when a bounty of $20 per head was given,—having resided in Waterford, in this county, since the year 1795, and experience, firmly believe it is money well expended when we pay a heavy bounty on wolves' scalps; and I believe also "in the doctrine of self-defense, even should it do my neighbors" good.

Some years ago an association of Wool growers in this county, was formed for the destruction of wolves, which failed to be complied with, and the hunters not well paid;—but yet I hope and believe they will be remunerated for what has been done. We then petitioned the Legislature to give the Commissioners of this county the power to tax sheep for the destruction of wolves; under this act the popular nerve was unstrung—the Commissioners quailed—the wolves remained in the county.

That the wolves shall be destroyed, I now stand forth alone, speculation or no speculation, to offer, and will pay ten dollars for each and every full grown wolf, killed on the east of the Muskingum River, in the counties of Washington and Morgan, on the certificate of the Clerk of the Court, in which it must be certified that they were killed east of the Muskingum River; and this bounty which, with the State and county will make $10, I hope and trust will be a strong inducement for the hunters to move forthwith against the enemy, and which I will pay until six months' notice is given in the public papers to the contrary. The wolf hunters I hope to see early and often for this bounty, until there is not a grown wolf within the counties I have named.

Wool is one of the main staples of our country, and will be so, and happy will it be for its inhabitants. The time will shortly arrive, as I trust, and well will it be for this region of country, when our town, county, and State authorities will give especial patronage to Sheep.

BENJAMIN DAVIS.

Waterford, Washington County.

Newport, Ohio, April 12, 1834.—

"The Wolf!—We call the attention of hunters to the following notice. It will be seen that by the liberality of individuals, the bounty will be increased to a sum rendering it of profit to the hunter to spend considerable time and exertion in the destruction of this animal:

Wolves.—A few of the farmers of Newport township, stimulated by the example and laudable exertions of an elder brother of the occupation, who has ever been liberal and vigilant in the measures adopted in this section of the State, for the destruction of our common enemy, the wolf, have authorized the undersigned to offer a bounty of ten dollars for each and every full grown wolf that may hereafter be destroyed within the County of Washington, on the east side of the great Muskingum River. The money will be paid by the subscriber, on the presentation of the certificate of the clerk of the county, taken in the form prescribed by law, to entitle the person killing the wolf to the State and county bounty.

EMIGRANT ASSOCIATION.

Saturday, May 3, 1834.—

"A meeting of several citizens of Marietta was convened at the Bank of Marietta, on Monday evening last, for the purpose of consulting upon the expediency of forming an Emigrant Association. John Mills, Esq., in the Chair, and J. Delafield, Jr., Secretary. On motion of Arius Nye, Esq., it was Resolved, that it is expedient to form an Emigrant Association in and for the County of Washington; the principal purpose of which shall be to collect and furnish correct information to emigrants to this county, or who may be disposed to emigrate hither; and for the furtherance of this object, to open a communication with persons in the Eastern cities, particularly New York, through whom correct information of the character and advantages offered in this county and town may be given to emigrants.

"The association was then organized by the election of the following gentlemen as officers:

President, Arius Nye.
Vice-president, John Mills.
Secretary, John Delafield, Jr.

Directors.

Douglas Putnam,
L. B. Swearingen,
James M. Booth,
Joseph B. Hall,
S. P. Hildreth, M. D.,

"Gentlemen who have farms in this county, for sale or lease, or who have mills, for sale or lease, mill-seats which are unoccupied, &c., &c., are informed that by leaving a correct written description of their property (and if possible a plat of the same) with the Secretary, at Marietta, it will be open to the inspection of any emigrants who may arrive. Citizens in each township are respectfully requested to convey to the Secretary such information in relation to their respective townships as will prove of advantage and interest to emigrants who may come hither."

PUBLIC SPIRIT.

TEA PLANT.

The subscriber has for ten years past cultivated successfully the genuine tea plant of China, and believes confidently that, after making various experiments involving considerable expense, he has at length discovered the art of drying and manufacturing the leaves, so as to produce the article of tea in quality equal to the Young Hyson imported.

He has in his possession samples which he will exhibit to any one desirous or curious to ascertain the fact. He will also give, gratis, to any gentleman desirous of cultivating it, or willing to make the experiment, fresh seed, of last year's crop, and will, moreover, give instruction for planting and rearing it. He is certain it may be raised and cured in this country with good profit.

John Platt.

It is not my sole purpose that I should him to give this notice, but a sincere desire that it may prove a benefit to this country, in which he has passed the better part of eight years of his life. Inquire for me at Mr. Christopher Carpenter's, Green street.

ROADS AND TURNPIKES.

1838.—

"There is one obstruction to the growth of this place, which its inhabitants ought to set themselves earnestly about removing. It is the want of good roads and bridges in the vicinity. That a traveler should be compelled to pay heavy ferriages over little streams—and to head runs for want of bridges, in the neighborhood of such a town as Marietta, is a circumstance not at all to its credit—and quite as little to its profit. A good bridge over Duck Creek, on the road by Dr. Moore's farm, would save its cost to the town in one year in the articles of fuel and building materials. We wish to see these evils speedily remedied."

"At a meeting of the Corporators of the Marietta and Newport Turnpike Road and Bridge Company, March 21, 1838, Joseph Barker, Jr., was appointed Chairman, and Wm. A. Whittlesey, Secretary.

"The following resolution, offered by William West, to-wit, Resolved, that it is expedient that books of subscription be forthwith opened to obtain stock in the Marietta and Newport Turnpike Road and Bridge Company, under the direction of the first ten named Corporators, as pointed out in the Second Section of the Act incorporating said Company, passed March 7, 1838, and seconded by Ebenezer Battelle, was adopted by the following vote:

"Yeas—Joseph Barker, Jr., E. Battelle, John Mills, Wm. West, Jas. M. Booth, J. De La Vergne, Noah L. Wilson, Wm. Dana, Dudley Woodbridge, Wm. A. Whittlesey, Weston Thomas, Robert T. Miller, D. Greene, Jonas Moore, Nahum Ward.

"Nays—None.

"The meeting of Corporators then adjourned.

The law for the encouragement of Turnpike Companies has been a considerable time in operation. Other parts of the State have availed themselves of it much—we, but little. An attempt was made to repeal it last winter. The members from Hamilton, it is understood, voted for the repeal!—yes, Hamilton has milked her full share from the public cow—and now would sell her off and debar other portions of the State from the like privilege. Now is the time for the Muskingum Valley to put in for such a share as may carry out the communications necessary to its prosperity and that of the public and public works. No time should be lost in carrying into effect the charter for Turnpikes to Lancaster, Chillicothe and Zanesville. If those living in the lower part of the valley bestir themselves properly the objects will be effected. But if they linger, others may step in and divert the course of prosperity, and the dwellers on the Muskingum may rue, too late, their blindness and want of timely exertion.

"There is a tide in the affairs of men,

Which comes but once in our life-time;

Omitted—all the voyage of their life,
Is bound in shallows and in miseries."

The word, therefore, is now.

July 27, 1839.—

"Agreeably to notice in the public papers of Marietta, signed by Nahum Ward, John Mills, P. B. Buell, John Dodge, Jesse Hildebrand, E. Short, and Thomas Vinton, corporators; the stockholders of the Muskingum Valley Turnpike Company met at the Court House in Marietta, on Friday, the 26th of July, 1839. John Mills, Nahum Ward, and L. D. Barker, three of the commissioners named in the act of incorporation, were appointed to preside at this meeting, and A. T. Nye was appointed Secretary. The stockholders then proceeded to elect by ballot, nine Directors for the Company, agreeably to the 4th Section of the act incorporating said company, passed February 16, 1833, and on counting the ballots it appeared that P. H. Buell, Nahum Ward, George W. Barker, John Dodge, L. D. Barker, Jesse Hildebrand, E. Short, John W. Dana, and Thomas Vinton, having each a majority of all the votes given, and the highest said number, are declared duly elected Directors of the Muskingum Valley Turnpike Company.

Secretary.

D. Barber.

Resolved, That Lewis W. Reppert, D. Barber, Jas. H. Penning and W. Greene be a Committee to let out and cause to be made a trail, on the farm of Mr. Reppert 5 miles below Harmar.

Resolved, That the races commence on the 7th of October next and continue for three days, as follows: first day, first race mile heats, for three year olds; 2d race, same day, 2 mile heats, free for all ages; weight according to age; 2d day, mile heats, free for all ages, weight according to age; 3d day, mile heats, best 3 in 5, for all ages, weight according to age.

Resolved, That the amount of annual subscriptions and gate money, after deducting the expenses of obtaining and making the course, be applied equally in purses for the four races above mentioned.

The entrance to each race to be $10. The races to be free for all horses now owned in the counties of Washington and Wood, upon the condition that the citizens of Wood raise an amount to be added to the purses above named of not less than one-half of the amount raised by Washington County.

Resolved, That the proceedings of this meeting be signed by the chairman and Secretary and published in the papers of Washington County, Ohio, and Wood County, Va.

A. V. D. JOLINE, Chairman.

J. P. WIGHTMAN, Secretary.

RAPID TRANSIT IN 1839.

Parkersburg, July 19, 1839.—

WINCHESTER AND PARKERSBURG MAIL AND EXPRESS
TION LINE.

From Winchester direct to Parkersburg, Va. The subscribers have determined to run their line three times a week (instead of twice) and through in less than three days, with very little night traveling. This Line will connect with the Winchester, Baltimore and Ohio Rail Road, and the Alexandria, Washington and Staunton Stages—so that passengers going either East, West or South, will only lodge in Winchester and pass on in four days from Baltimore, Washington or Alexandria, to Parkersburg (on the Ohio River) from whence they can go by steam up or down the River.

The Stages leave Taylor's Hotel in Winchester, every Monday, Wednesday and Friday morning, and returning arrive there on Tuesday, Thursday and Saturday. Leave McGuire's Hotel in Parkersburg on Sunday, Wednesday and Friday mornings, and returning arrive there Monday, Thursday and Saturday evenings.

The distance through is 235 miles—the entire route on the Northwestern Turnpike Road. Fare through $16. All intermediate points rated at about 7 cents per mile.

Good drivers, new Coaches and Teams are employed and every possible attention will be paid by the Proprietors.

N. KUYKENDALL,

J. LEWIS & Co.,

Proprietors

PASSING OF THE STAGE COACH.

August 7, 1840.—

"Stage Accident.—On Tuesday last the mail stage and the opposition stage of Neil, Moore & Co.'s line, between this place and Zanesville, in coming down, came in contact about six miles above this, by which the opposition, containing nine passengers, was thrown off the road, down the bank, and upset, very seriously injuring a young man by the name of Peck, from New York, and, more or less, all the other passengers. These stages were racing, and in coming up March Run Hill, the mail attempted to pass the opposition, and in doing so run it off the road. According to the statements of passengers, there was considerable excitement between the drivers and agents who were seated with them, and threats have been made previous to this collision; but as the affair will probably undergo a legal investigation, we shall forbear to state anything further that we have heard. There is not the least doubt that both parties were to blame, as they seemed perfectly regardless of the safety of their passengers."

CHAPTER XII.

TOWNS AND TOWNSHIPS OF THE COUNTY.

ADAMS TOWNSHIP—THE TOWN OF LOWELL—AURELIUS TOWNSHIP—BARLOW TOWNSHIP—BELPRE TOWNSHIP—THE TOWN OF BELPRE—DECATUR TOWNSHIP—DUNHAM TOWNSHIP—FAIRFIELD TOWNSHIP—FEARING TOWNSHIP—GRANDVIEW TOWNSHIP—THE TOWN OF NEW MATAMORAS—INDEPENDENCE TOWNSHIP—LAWRENCE TOWNSHIP—LIBERTY TOWNSHIP—LUDLOW TOWNSHIP—MARIETTA TOWNSHIP—MUSKINGUM TOWNSHIP—NEWPORT TOWNSHIP—PALMER TOWNSHIP—SALEM TOWNSHIP—WARREN TOWNSHIP—WATERFORD TOWNSHIP—THE TOWN OF BEVERLY—WATERTOWN TOWNSHIP—WESLEY TOWNSHIP.

Adams township, lying east of Waterford, on the Noble County line, was incorporated in 1797, and was first settled when the Second Association was located at Waterford. Its history during the pioneer period—before 1800—has been sketched. The earliest settlers were the Coburns, Allisons, Dodges, Davises, Fries, Kinneys, Owens, Masons, Devols, and Spragues.

A block-house was built on land settled by the Kinneys, known as "Kinney's Block-house." A monument has been erected on the site.

The improvement of the Muskingum River was the making of the little village "Buell's Lowell," laid out by P. B. Buell, which stood in what is now Upper Lowell. The first store was opened here in 1822. Lowell Mill was erected in 1842; Oak Mill was built in 1859; a planing mill was built, but burned in 1879. The first postmaster was E. Short, who went into office about 1820, the office then being known as Adams. Buell's Lowell was incorporated May 10, 1851; the first officials were:

Theodore Schriner, mayor; S. N. Merriam, recorder; John Scott, Solomon Sharpe, John B. Regnier, Joseph Cox and George Fleck, trustees. William Bartlett was elected first marshal by the Board of Trustees.

Among the early settlers were: Nicholas and Asa Coburn, sons of Maj. Asa Coburn, with whom they came to Marietta from Massachusetts in the latter part of 1788. Major Coburn had won his title in the Massachusetts line of the Revolutionary Army. Many of his descendants live in Morgan County.

Robert Allison came from Pennsylvania in 1788. Moved to Cat's Creek in 1795. His daughter, Mrs. Frost, born in Fayette County, Pennsylvania, October 12, 1784, was for a long time before her death the only survivor of the pioneer life during the Indian war. She had a clear recollection of events that occurred at the Campus Martius, and especially of the Sunday-school taught by Mrs. Lake. Mrs. Frost died at the home of her grandson, Mr. O. A. Stacy, near Lowell, in 1891.

James Owen, from Rhode Island, came to Ohio in 1788. His son Daniel came into the Adams colony.

Col. William Mason, a soldier of the Revolution and one of the first party of pioneers, settled in Adams about 1797.

William Mason, of Pennsylvania, came to this settlement about the same time.

Maj. Joshua Sprague, an officer in the Revolution, came to Marietta in 1788, with his two sons, Jonathan and William. They went to Waterford but afterward Major Sprague and his son William removed to Adams.

Stephen Frost, Michael Cyphers, Joseph Simons, Amos Wilson, Geo. M. Cox, Alfred Hall, Morgan Wood, James H. Rose (of Virginia). Among the German settlers are Philip Mattern (a son of Henry Mattern, who lived in Salem), Jacob Schneider, Jacob Becker, and Jacob Reitz.

Joseph Frye came from Maine to Waterford, where he taught school, before he moved down to his farm.

William and Daniel Davis, sons of Capt. Daniel Davis, a soldier in the Revolution, and one of the 48 pioneers. The descendants of Captain Davis bore an honorable part in our second war for liberty, that of 1861-65.

Oliver Dodge, one of the 48 pioneers, came from Hampton Falls, New Hampshire. His son, Richard, a lover of fine horses and of a good joke, was long a familiar figure in McConnellsville. Richard left no children.

Nathan King, a native of Nova Scotia. Two of his daughters were married to sons of Robert Allison.

Churches.—The Baptist Church dates from 1797; its reorganization from 1832. The Christian Church was organized in 1831. The German citizens of Lowell and vicinity organized the Protestant Evangelical Church in 1857. The Congregational Church built a house of worship in Lowell in 1860, but services are no longer held in it. A few of the members now meet in Rainbow.

LOWELL TOWNSHIP AND LOWELL CORPORATION.

Development.—During the last decade Lowell has developed and improved to a considerable extent. Many beautiful residences have been built, the streets have been improved and cleaned, old buildings have been removed and additions have been made to the size of the corporation.

The plat of Sprague's addition to the corporation was approved by the Council a few years ago; Pfaff's sub-division, comprising 14 acres of ground, was annexed in 1901; and the plat of Saner's addition was approved June 6, 1902. Numerous buildings are being erected on all of these additions and the town is experiencing a nice growth.

Industrial.—Lowell is proud of the volume of business that is transacted within its limits. It has a goodly number of industries that have been built up gradually and are upon a safe footing and in a flourishing condition. Great pride is taken by the people of Lowell and Adams township in the First National Bank. The capital stock of the bank is owned principally by local parties and the conservative manner in which the business has been managed has made it a valuable investment. The deposits are heavy and a nice surplus is being accumulated.

Lowell can boast that there is more business transacted within its borders than in any other town of its size and many larger ones along the Muskingum River.

The oil developments in Adams township have resulted in very valuable productions. The first large pools were found in the Reed field on Cat's Creek, and the Minch field, which lies to the northwest of the town. The Minch field was sold at one time by A. J. Brown, A. I. Vaughn and others to the Boston & Marietta Oil Company for $130,000. Considerable oil is being found on Bear Creek, near the eastern township line and the developments there are making the fields very valuable. The southwestern section of the township also is producing some oil.

Educational.—The Adams Township School District is composed of 11 sub-districts, ranging in numbers from one to 12, inclusive, No. 6 being consolidated with No. 11. The enumerations of the youth of school age in the township during the last five years have fluctuated tuated between 370 and 400. The percentage of attendance upon the enumeration is quite large, and the Board of Education has been fortunate in securing the services of good teachers. There are several new school houses which are commodious and well adapted to the purpose, but most of the others are old and in bad condition. Owing to the unusually and unavoidably bad state of the finances of the Board, nothing can be done at present with the houses, but as soon as there is a cash balance on hand the matter will probably be taken up and some changes in the districts may be made that will secure a better division of the township. J. A. Schwindeman is president of the Board at this time.

The Lowell Independent School District embraces the entire town and a strip of the surrounding territory. It has graded schools which have more than a local reputation. Prof. J. L. Jordan and Prof. D. A. Leake, who have been principals of the schools during the last 18 years, deserve great credit for the manner in which they have built them up. There are four teachers.

Political. Normally, Adams Township is Democratic in political complexion by from 40 to 50 majority. The oil operations during late years have brought many new people to the township, which has altered the matter somewhat in several instances, but on an average it stands about the same. The present officers of the township are: Trustees, John Decker, John Huck and Daniel Marsch; clerk, John D. Hollinger; treasurer, A. C. Beach; assessor, Ed Schwindeman; justices of the peace, Daniel Marsch and J. M. Newton; constables, W. F. Burdine and Elias Dobbin. In Lowell corporation the Democrats are also usually victorious. The officers of the corporation are: Mayor, A. D. Bell; clerk, John D. Hollinger; treasurer, C. G. Schneider; councilmen, S. Turkenton, F. A. Boyle, J. W. Landsittle, J. F. Hollinger, Fred Fauss, and A. H. Henniger; marshal, Philip Röhley.

Questions looking toward the issuing of bonds for the purpose of building a new public hall and the erection of water works have met with defeat when submitted to the voters of the corporation.

Fraternal.—The following fraternal orders are represented by subordinate lodges and branches in Lowell, viz: Knights of Pythias, Masons, Odd Fellows, Daughters of Rebekeh, and Grand Army of the Republic.

Buell Lodge, No. 395, Knights of Pythias, has 97 members and owns real estate valued at $2,500. Conventions are held every Monday evening.

Lowell Lodge, No. 438, I. O. O. F., has 91 members enrolled upon its roster and the real estate owned is valued at $3,000. Meetings are held every Tuesday evening.

Sunbeam Lodge, No. 51, Daughters of Rebekeh, has a goodly number of members. Meetings are held every Thursday evening.

The roster of Lowell Lodge, No. 436, F. & A. M., shows a membership of 34. Meetings are held monthly.

Dick Mason Post, No. 304, G. A. R., has 16 members.

All of the lodges are in a flourishing condition.

—John D. Hollinger.

AURELIUS TOWNSHIP.

Aurelius township was originally a part of Monroe County, being admitted into Washington County, December 15, 1818. In that year John S. Corp and Judah M. Chamberlain headed a petition to the commissioners of Washington County, praying the establishment of this addition as a township.

On the commissioners' journal, dated December 15, 1818, appears this record:

On petition of John S. Corp and Judah M. Chamberlain, petitioners praying to be admitted into Washington County, as a township, the following was ordered:

Resolved, by the Board of Commissioners, That that township, numbered five in the eighth range, excepting sections No. 25, 26 and 27, and fractional sections No. 34, 45 and 46, be and the same be declared and established into an incorporated town, to be hereafter known and distinguished by the name and denomination of Aurelius, and the inhabitants residing in said district are hereby declared entitled to all the privileges and immunities of incorporated towns in the State. The electors in said town will meet at the house of Mr. Judah

M. Chamberlain on the second Monday of January, 1810, at 10 o'clock A. M., to elect their township officers agreeably to law.

At this meeting Gilead Doane and Judah M. Chamberlain were elected justices of the peace but nothing else is known of the meeting.

It will be noticed that the establishing act did not give Aurelius sections 27 and 34. The date of this accession, as ascertained from the commissioners' journal, was that of their June session, 1842. For they

Resolved, that section twenty-seven and fractional section thirty-four, in township five, range eight, heretofore belonging to Township Sacan, is hereby annexed to Aurelius.

Aurelius was reduced to its present small dimensions by the action of the Legislature forming Noble County. It was passed March 11, 1851.

Among the earliest settlers in Aurelius were the Dains, Duttons, Bousers and Hutchins. Dr. John B. Regnier, who came about 1819, has well been considered "the father of the township," being a leader in the formation and development of it. He was appointed first postmaster in 1819, built the first grist mill about the same time, and secured the building of the first road from the mouth of Cat's Creek to Macksburg.

William W. Mackintosh opened the first store about 1827. Free Will Baptist Church was organized between 1810-12; a "regular" or "hard-shelled" Baptist Church was organized soon after. In 1818 the Methodist Episcopal Church was organized.

A public school was started as early as 1809 with Nancy Dutton as teacher.

The two villages of the township are Macksburg and Elba, which have owed their prosperity to the oil development which has been very profitable here, there being now 75 producing leases in the township. This is equaled by only one other township in the county as shown by the table of leases in the chapter on "The Oil Industry."

BARLOW TOWNSHIP.

Barlow township was organized in 1818 at a meeting held in July. The first trustees were Cornelius Houghland, S. N. Cooke and Caleb Green; Duty Green was treasurer. The first settlers in the township were the Lawtons, Vincents, Greens, Proctors, Houghlands, McGuires. The main road in the early days was the "State Road" from Marietta to Athens, which passed near the Lawton cabin; another from Belpre to Watertown ran a little west of this cabin.

The Methodist Episcopal Church was the first to enter the township, the first church being a log meeting house built in 1808. The First Presbyterian Church was erected in 1838. In 1839 this church split, the "New School" faction leaving the parent church. They united again in 1870. The United Presbyterian Church was organized in 1849 and the Union Church at Vincent in which several denominations worshiped was built in 1867. The Christian Church was organized in 1846.

The first school house was built in 1808-09 and was known as the "Old Hickory" school house. A vivid glimpse into that early school house is afforded us in the papers left by Henry Earle Vincent:

"The house in which the pioneer children of Barlow township first learned their A, B, C's, and to repeat 'In Adam's fall we sinned all,' was built entirely of rough hickory logs, with chimney of 'cat and clay,' and a broad fire-place wide enough to receive logs the length of a common fence-rail, which not only furnished fuel for fire but seats for the young urchins while warming themselves. The floor, benches and writing table were all made of rough-hewn puncheons—that is, logs split into slabs and some of the roughness 'scutched' off with a broad-axe. Small cavities were left in the back wall in which the ink-stands, containing the maple ink, were kept to protect it from the frost.

"The windows were made by cutting out a piece of a log six or eight feet in length and placing small sticks perpendicularly across the space at intervals, thus making a sash over which the paper was pasted. The paper used was generally the well-scribbled leaves of old copy books, as there were no newspapers in those days and blank paper was too scarce and too valuable to be used for such purposes. This paper was made transparent by being first generally coated with coon's grease or possum fat, and a fire-brand held to it until well-melted.

"The old schoolmaster was so deaf that the scholars would 'talk right out loud,' and often he would go to sleep and then the way the young rogues in 'home-spun' and linsey' would 'cut-up' was nobody's business but the teacher's and he did not know it. When dismissed for noon, the first one on the ice was the best fellow—but the best fellow in this case happened to be a tall, portly girl, who generally led the van in all the sports. The old school-house has long since, with the youthful actors in the scenes about its portals, passed away forever."

Barlow village was made in 1840 with John McCuig, Horatio Ford and Lyman Laffin as proprietors, and "consisted of eleven lots of fifty-four acres each and located near the Marietta and Belpre roads." Lyman Laffin opened the first store.

Fleming, a station on the old Marietta & Cincinnati Railroad, now a prosperous little hamlet on the Marietta, Columbus & Cleveland Railway, was laid out August 3, 1853, by Henry Earle Vincent, who kept the first postoffice. The first store was opened by Church B. Tuttle, and Enoch Preston kept the first tavern.

D. C. Lasure contributed the following on "Stores and Trade" of Barlow to the Barlow Centennial which is of interest.

"The first store of which I can learn, in Barlow township, was on the southeast corner of Barlow X Roads.

"H. N. Ford, C. B. Tuttle and C. Shipman started a store in the Ford building, under the firm name of H. N. Ford & Company. H. N. Ford died in a short time, and C. D. Ford took his place. Soon John Ford bought C. D. Ford's interest and the firm was John Ford & Company. Then D. H. Merrill and T. W. Moore bought this firm out, and Ford, Shipman and Tuttle retired. This was in 1858 or 1859. Soon after D. H. Merrill bought Moore's interest and carried on the business two or three years, when J. W. Merrill bought an interest, and the firm became Merrill Brothers. This firm did an extensive business for some years. Then C. D. Ford bought a third interest and the firm became Merrill Brothers & Company, and continued so two or three years, when C. D. Ford retired, and the firm became Merrill Brothers and so continued until succeeded by Lazure Brothers. Smith Brothers bought out Lazure Brothers, and they sold to A. W. Morris, W. E. Thompson and D. E. Greenlees, as Morris, Thompson & Company. Soon Mr. Greenlees retired, and the firm was Morris & Thompson. Mr. Thompson sold his interest to J. H. Fleming, making it Morris & Fleming, who after continuing business a short time, removed their stock of goods to Williamstown, West Virginia. The store room, which had been enlarged at different times by Merrill Brothers, then was unoccupied for some time, but a year or two ago L. C. Maxwell put in a stock of goods and is now doing business there.

"Lyman Laffin was postmaster for a number of years in early times and carried a small stock of goods in connection with the post-office.

"Soon after the Civil War, the store room east of Mrs. M. A. Ford's was built by the Barlow Mill Company, composed of C. B. Tuttle, George B. Turner, Jude Chamberlain and Harry Burchett. They did business in it for a year or two, then moved mill and store to Vincent. Somewhere in the 'fifties,' H. G. Lawrence partially built a store room just west of and near to the store so long occupied by Merrill Brothers. This was occupied as a store room by a Mr. Coyton, later by John Parker, and finally by Scott & Pollard. Each of these continued but a short time. The building became the property of Merrill Brothers and when John Haddow's residence was burnt, Mr. Haddow bought the old store, and it is now the framework of Mrs. Haddow's house. Ten years or so ago, J. H. Haddow built a store room in the village and occupied it some time, in partnership with Mr. Gracey as Gracey & Haddow. Soon Mr. Gracey retired, and Mr. Haddow afterward sold an interest to Perley Dunsmoor, and the firm became Haddow & Dunsmoor. Mr. Haddow retired and P. Dunsmoor was the store man. Later P. Dunsmoor & Son, and at present D. L. Dunsmoor. Two or three years ago J. W. Scott and J. F. Foster started a store in the south end of the village, and after a year or two Mr. Foster retired, and J. W. Scott continues the business. Lawton Sisters have run a store in the Post Office building for the past ten years or more. Sarah J. Lamb ran a store in the east end of the village for two or three years when, having become married to a horrid man, she gave up the store business and went west.

"The first store in Vincent, called the 'Farmers Exchange,' was kept by C. B. Tuttle on what was known as Gard's corner. I believe he was succeeded by Gard & Son, who later sold to H. M. Amlin and William McKibben, who did a fair business for a short time as Amlin & McKibben, and H. Gard & Son built a new store on the opposite corner and did business there for a short time. Afterward John Lynch kept store in the same place. Other stores in Vincent were kept by John Tuttle, Tuttle & Dunn, Mary J. Preston, Preston & Tuttle, and A. B. Vincent in the building formerly used as the station house on M. & C. R. R. S. F. Hayes built a store in the village about 25 years ago and did business there until within a few years.

"After the T. & O. C. E. R. R. was revived, Sandy Shaw and D. R. Shaw built a store near the railroad crossing, and did business as Shaw Brothers. Later D. R. Shaw retired and Sandy still runs the store. Hayes Brothers built a store on the opposite side of the railroad and ran a hardware business. Joseph Smith started a store in a building put up by J. C. Vincent four or five years ago, and ran it a short time. He was succeeded by Berkley & Company, and they by A. C. Fuller. F. W. Vincent built and runs a store on the opposite side of the street. Burris Crewson had a store where Adam Kepler now lives.

W. O. Keith has a store on a new street running past the school house.

"I have understood that Mrs. McGary carries a small stock of groceries. Thomas Breckenridge built a store at Fleming station probably about 1860. He was succeeded by a Mr. Martin from Pittsburg and he in turn by Edward Cecil, Mr. Tullis, Strickling Brothers, J. H. Haddow, Haddow & Fleming, Fleming & Turner, Charles Turner, Hart Brothers, C. E. Finch, Fleming & Biedel, Finch & Biedel, Coffman & Miller, S. A. Coffman and C. E. Starr, who now occupies a new store at the old stand.

"After C. E. Finch sold out at the station, he started a store near his residence and still runs it. Robert Pryor at one time had a store on Pryor Ridge, where Harvey Martin now lives, and D. G. Martin also kept store a while just north on the same ridge.

"On the establishment of a post office at Ormiston, Alexander Ormiston started a store at his farm in the northeast part of the township, which he has since discontinued. Mrs. McCurdy has had a store on Barnett Ridge for some years, and at one time a Mr. Amos kept a small store on the Hoon place. There may have been other efforts in the store line, but I have failed to get track of them."

Of the later advancements should be mentioned the Barlow Fair. It was started in a small way, in 1871, by William Thompson, I. B. Lawton, Frank Deming, William Moore, E. H. Palmer, Daniel Canfield, John Ormiston and others, and has grown year by year to its present greatness and importance. There is a tradition, of long standing in this county, that it never rains in the time of the Barlow Fair.

BELPRE TOWNSHIP.

The names of the settlers in Belpre and much of the early history of the township are found in Chapter IV.

It was created by resolution of the Court of Quarter Sessions, December 20, 1790, as is shown by the following record:

Resolved, That townships No. 1 and 2, in the tenth range, and North in the main range, but and they hereby are incorporated, and so be included in the town ship by the name of Belpre.

The first town officers were: Col. E. Battelle, town clerk; Winton Casey, overseer of poor; Col. Nathaniel Cushing, constable.

The location of the settlements is thus described by Dr. S. P. Hildreth: "The main body of the new colony tract was divided into two portions, known as the 'Upper' and 'Middle' settlements. The lands on the river were of the richest quality; rising as they receded from the Ohio on to an elevated plain, 30 or 40 feet higher than the low bottoms, and extending back to the base of the hills. This plain was in some places more than half a mile in width, forming with the bottoms alluvions of nearly a mile in extent. The soil on the plain was in some places fertile, loamy sand; and in others inclined to gravel, but everywhere covered with a rich growth of forest trees, and producing fine crops of small grain. About a mile below the Little Kenawha, this plain came into the river, presenting a lofty mural front of eighty or a hundred feet above the surface of the water. This precipitous bank is continued for half a mile, and on its brow, and for some distance back, is clothed with evergreens, being chiefly different varieties of the cedar. That portion of the plain is known by the name of 'the Bluff,' and is located near the head of Blennerhassett's Island, close to the landing and crossing place to the mansion erected a few years after by this celebrated man. 'The Bluff' divided the 'Upper' settlement from those below. The 'Upper' lay in a beautiful curve of the river, which formed nearly a semi-circle, the periphery of which was about a mile and a half, and rose gradually from the bank of the river on to the second bottom by a natural glacis, the grade and beauty of which no art of man could excel. From the lower end of 'the Bluff,' the plain gradually receded from the river, leaving a strip of rich bottom land, about three miles in length, and from a quarter to a third of a mile in width. This distance, like that portion above, was laid off into farms, about 40 rods wide and extending back to the hills, which rose by a moderate slope to an elevation of an hundred feet above the surface of the plain, and were clothed with oak and hickory, to their tops. This charming location was well named 'Belle-prairie,' (or beautiful meadow), but is now generally written 'Belpre.'"

THE TOWN OF BELPRE IN 1902

(INCORPORATED IN 1902)

The Belpre of today reflects creditably the intellectual and cultured characteristics of the stalwart pioneer of the "block-house" days. There still remains some traces of the old pioneer blood, and a few of the historic points made famous during the days of the first settlers are cherished and protected by the present inhabitants.

The geographical limits of Belpre have been encroached upon, from time to time, until now Belpre—proper—represents an incorporated village about one mile long and one-half wide, directly opposite Parkersburg, West Virginia. Though the settlement of Belpre is one of the oldest in the county and hence in the State, and for many years the most popular community in the county, outside the present Marietta, yet it was not until July 22, 1901, that it was voted to incorporate it. The following January (1902) the charter was received, and on the 13th day of the same month, the election of the first officers of the corporation was held. The estimated population is 900,—no census has as yet been taken since the incorporation.

The valley in which Belpre is located is still one of the most productive along the Ohio River, being especially adapted to truck-gardening, and yet retains the pristine beauty, which gave to it its poetic name. Belpre is essentially a residence village, its commercial and industrial interests having been greatly damaged by the 1884 Ohio River freshet, from which it has only partially recovered. However, in a retail way, it has a number of institutions which do a thriving business. It depends upon Parkersburg, West Virginia, for its banking facilities. A building and loan company was incorporated January 8, 1902, with an authorized capital of $500,000.

Belpre has ever taken a front rank in its interest in education. Its public schools are noted for their excellence, and have an enrollment of 300 pupils, with eight teachers. The school building is a well-equipped brick structure of eight rooms, erected in 1876. Connected with the schools is a circulating library of 650 volumes, to which additions are made each year.

The churches of the village are four, viz.: The Methodist Episcopal, a direct descendant of the first organization of Methodism in Belpre township, effected by Rev. Mr. Morris in 1816. Their present place of worship—Lewis Chapel—was dedicated February 24, 1867, and was remodeled in 1896. The present membership is 200.

The Congregational Church—with 120 members—tracing its origin to a mission of the First Congregational Church of Marietta, was organized in 1802, at what is now Rockland. The first service held in the village limits was in 1858. The church building, in which they still worship, was erected in 1869.

The Catholic Church, for many years an outer mission of the Marietta Church, and later assigned to the Little Hocking Church, always holding its services once a month at the home of some of its members, now worships in a little church of its own—St. Ambrose Church—donated by P. W. O'Connor of Columbus, Ohio, in 1901, with 35 communicants.

The A. M. E. Church with 20 members dates back to 1877.

Politically, Belpre has always been Republican.

DECATUR TOWNSHIP.

There are four villages in Decatur township: Fillmore, Decaturville, Hope and Prosperity.

Decatur township was established November 30, 1820. The first settler, Joseph Lovdell, came in 1816, soon followed by the Johnsons, Dufer, Fairchild, Bachelor, Dunn, Giddings and Ballard families who formed the "Lower Settlement" now known as Fillmore P. O. on the State road. The "Upper Settlement" Decaturville P. O., was made soon after. The Methodist Episcopal Church first entered Decatur township, a log cabin being built in the eastern part of the township about 1840. The United Brethren began a society here before 1850, two classes holding services in the abandoned Methodist Episcopal buildings at Decaturville and west of Fillmore. The Presbyterian Church was organized in 1847, a building being erected in 1849 and rebuilt in 1856. A Baptist church (colored) was erected in 1856. The first flouring mill was erected by Hiram Fairchild about 1821, south of Fillmore. In this township lived Peter M. Garner, Creighton J. Loraine and Mordecai E. Thomas, whose abduction by Virginia officers in 1845 almost caused a war between the States of Ohio and Virginia. A history of this celebrated case is found in Chapter VI.

DUNHAM TOWNSHIP.

Dunham township has four villages: Dunham, Veto, Briggs and Constitution.

Dunham township was formed June 5, 1855, and changed to its present form on the petition of William P. Cutler, Dean Briggs, and others, October 19th, of the same year. It was first settled by Elihu Clark, Benjamin and Hezekiah Bickford and Lemuel Cooper in the first half decade of the century. The first tavern was kept by Nathan Cole near the head of Neil's Island in 1805. The first postoffice was established at Veto with William Chevalier as postmaster in 1850. The Dunham office was opened seven years later with Jasper Needham as postmaster. Briggs P. O. was established in March, 1875. The first religious society to build a church in Dunham was the Methodist; a frame building was erected on the Little Hocking in 1830 but was removed before 1860. A Universalist Church was organized in 1845 but soon united with the Belpre organization. The United Brethren were given Cutler Chapel by William P. Cutler, operator of the principal quarries along the Little Hocking, in 1871. The first school house was erected on the Goddard farm in 1814. A town house was built in 1871.

The fine stone quarries in Dunham were first opened by Messrs. Harris, Schwan and Newton about 1820. The quarries along the Little Hocking were operated extensively in 1870-71. The stone for the Baltimore & Ohio Railroad bridge at Parkersburg came largely from Dunham.

Dunham township was named in honor of Jonathan Dunham who began work on his land in 1804. He was a descendant of Rev. Jonathan Dunham of Martha's Vineyard. Mr. Dunham's daughter was married to Asahel Hollister, an emigrant from Litchfield County, Connecticut, and many of their descendants still live in this county. One of their sons, W. B. Hollister, lived in Harmar about 50 years.

Thomas and Amos Delano came from Connecticut to Belpre about 1804, but in 1808 came to Dunham.

Benjamin Ellenwood, of Maine, with his three sons,—Benjamin, Daniel, and Samuel,—came from Pennsylvania to Dunham in 1811. The family is still well represented in the county.

Benoni Lewis, an officer in the American army and navy of the Revolution, went from Rhode Island to Virginia in 1802, and in 1807 came to Dunham.

Hapgood Goddard, of New Hampshire, was in Dunham as early as 1814. He afterward lived in Fairfield.

Dunham township was fortunate in receiving a number of good settlers from Scotland, among whom may be named James Harvey, Daniel Shaw, William Fleming, Samuel Drain of Argyllshire, Edward Henderson (who was employed by the pioneers as a scout) and Hugh Mitchell.

FAIRFIELD TOWNSHIP.

Fairfield township has six postoffices, namely: Qualey, Cutler, Layman, Dunbar, Virgin and Napier.

Fairfield township was organized in December, 1851. The first trustees were Peter B. Lake, John Burfield and James Smith; township clerk, Charles H. Goddard; treasurer, Peter B. Lake; assessor, Torrens Gilmore; constable, Augustine Stephens. The first justices of the peace were Torrens Gilmore and Augustine Stephens.

The earliest settlers in Fairfield were David Ewell, Joshua Shuttleworth, William Dunbar; all these came in from Virginia about 1814. The path afterward followed by the "State Road" was the first passageway into this district. Other settlers were Walter Kidwell, Daniel Dunbar (a soldier of the Revolution), both from Fairfax County, Virginia; Carmi Smith of New York, Phineas Dunsmoor of Townsend, Massachusetts, William Moore from Pennsylvania, Moses Campbell from Ireland, Joseph H. Gage from New Hampshire, William Thompson from Guernsey County, Ohio, and Owen Clark from Ireland. For a picture of early scenes in this township the reader is referred to the "Grand Circus Hunt" described in Chapter IX.

The first school house near the Lake farm, known as Lake's school house, was opened about 1819. The next school, near the Dunbar farm, was built in 1840. The first church was erected by the Methodist Episcopal society on the site of their present church at Fishtown, about 1824. About 1863 a new church was built by general subscription but was burned within a year. The present Methodist Episcopal Church was built in 1864. The Centenary Methodist Episcopal Church was erected in 1867. In the same year the building now owned by the Universalists was erected; this denomination has a building at Fishtown erected a year later.

Cutler on the Marietta, Columbus & Cleveland Railway was laid out in 1857, being first named Harshaville in honor of Dr. John M. Harsha, whose cabin was the first built at this place. The name was later changed to Cutler in honor of William P. Cutler. The first store was kept by Harvey Smith. In 1857 the first hotel was erected by A. A. Campbell.

Dunbar is on the line of the M., C. & C. Ry., and has a postoffice.

James Lake kept the first store in Fish-town (Layman P. O.) in 1837, in the store of Carmi Smith.

FEARING TOWNSHIP.

Fearing township, named in honor of Hon. Paul Fearing, was established March 8, 1808. In 1809 and 1861 its boundary lines were changed slightly.

On the fourth day of April, 1808, the electors met at the house of Henry Maxon and elected the following officers: Henry Maxon, clerk; Thomas Stanley, John Porter and Resolved Fuller, trustees; Simeon Wright and Joel Tuttle, overseers of the poor; Solomon Goss and John W. White, fence viewers; William Stacy, Jr., and John Miller, appraisers; Didier Gevrez, Isaac Hill, Daniel Dunchew, Henry Maxon, John Porter and Ebenezer Nye, supervisors; Daniel G. Stanley and George Nye, constables; Solomon Goss, treasurer.

Much of the early history of this township, as is true with all the rest, has been described in the history of the Ohio Company. A public school was in existence as early as 1804.

One extraordinary bit of history, which characterizes the early inhabitants of Fearing as exceptionally enterprising and educated, was the formation of a township library as early as 1812. The library was incorporated in 1816. The articles of incorporation limit the property besides books, maps, charts, and the like, to $3,000. As officers until an election could be held: Thomas Stanley, Robert Baird and Elisha Allen were made directors; John Miller, treasurer; and Daniel G. Stanley, librarian. In time the association dissolved, the books were distributed among the shareholders and many yet remain in private libraries of their descendants. Many books are of a religious nature, and all are of the weightier class of reading. The latest date noticed on the title page as date of publication is 1813.

In the back fly-leaves of many books are the notes of damages and fines written by the librarian on the return of the book. The principal disasters to the works are from grease spots—suggesting the light of other days.

A Presbyterian Church was erected in Stanleyville on land given by Thomas Stanley, in 1814. The Fearing Religious Society was incorporated in 1813 and reorganized (for business purposes) in 1853, a dispute over property having arisen. A Congregational Church was organized in 1851 and a building erected in 1856. A Methodist Church came into existence in 1820 and a building was completed in 1847 and a parsonage 16 years later. A branch of the Congregational Church at Stanleyville was organized near Cedar Narrows and a church was erected in 1873. A second Methodist Church was built east of Stanleyville in 1839, and was replaced by the present church 20 years later. The first Protestant Evangelist Church was erected near Whipple's Run in 1872 and St. Jacob's Church was erected a mile west of Stanleyville in 1858-59.

Among the early settlers were: Levi Chapman, from Saybrook, Connecticut; Thomas Stanley, from Marietta; Joel and Simeon Tuttle, from Connecticut; Simeon Blake, from Rhode Island; John Amlin, a native of Germany; Patrick and Daniel Campbell, Charles Daugherty, John Forthner, Andrew and Daniel Galer, Seth Jones, Henry and Richard Maxon, Allen Putnam, Conrad Rightner, Abraham Seevers, Charles H. Morton, Ephraim True, John Widger, William Caywood, Robert McKee, Nathaniel Kidd from Pennsylvania; Walter Athey from Virginia; William Price, Reuben McVay from Pennsylvania; James Dowling from New York; Thomas Ward, John P. Palmer, Dr. Hicks, John Young, and William Brown from Loudoun County, Virginia.

Of the German emigrants who after 1830 settled in Fearing and aided in its material development, we have the names of the Donakers, the Seylers, Conrad Bisantz, Jacob Zimmer, Theobald Zimmer, Dietrick and Henry Pape, Theobald Boeshar, Lewis Motter, John Bules, Rev. F. C. Trapp, and Conrad Leonhardt.

The following petition from the Hildreth manuscripts is interesting on account of the names and topography:

To the Honorable Court of General Quarter Sessions of the Peace of the County of Washington

Your petitioners request that a road may be laid out from Marretta to the forks of Duck Creek and on to Mr. Tolman's in the most eligible situation to be taken past Pot's Mills, so called, or any other place that should be found more convenient hereafter, from thence on to a ridge, keeping the same ridge to the Cedar Narrows, so called, thence following the creek by Mr. Widger's then past Mr. Levi Chapman's, and crossing the creek and on to the forks of Duck Creek, from thence to the mouth of Pawpaw and on to Mr. Tolman's.

Which your petitioners, as in duty bound, request a committee may be appointed for that purpose. Signed.

GRANDVIEW TOWNSHIP.

The picturesque Ohio and the hills which stand sentinels beside it make Grandview a fit name for a river township. The first election for township officials of Grandview was held the first Monday in April, 1804, the township having been "struck off from Newport in 1803." The election resulted as follows: Samuel Williamson, Philip Witten and David Jackson, trustees; Arthur Scott, clerk; Nathan Parr, William Ramsey, and John McBride, supervisors; Alexander Mayers, constable. In the following year the list was increased; Philander B. Stewart and William Cline, constables; Arthur Scott, lister of property; James Riggs and John Collins, overseers of the poor; Nathan Parr and Henry Dickerson, appraisers of houses.

The first settlers in Grandview were families by the name of Dickerson, Shepherd, Mitchell, Whitton, Riggs, Sheets, Ellis, Burris, Jolly and Collins.

The proprietor of Matamoros was Henry Sheets, who made the survey of the first plat on his land lying along the Ohio River. Beginning with the big road, which extended along the banks of the river, the original plat extended west three blocks to Third street, and north three blocks from Merchants street, to the first alley above the flour mill now belonging to Samuel Shannon. The only houses within the boundary of the original plat were the store and dwelling house, also the flour mill of the proprietor. The streets were, beginning at the river, Water street, which has now almost disappeared beneath the encroachments of the river; the next was First, then Second and Third streets, all running north and south; then those extending east and west were Merchants and Ferry. The first addition was made by Stinson Burris, and extended from Merchants down to Vine, including two lots beyond; and from Water back to Third, thus extending Water, First, Second and Third streets, and adding two new streets,—Main and Vine. The second addition was made on the north, extending Water, First and Second streets three blocks, and adding another street—Togler—and 18 new blocks, which in 1849 included the full dimensions of the town. Afterward many other large additions were made on the southwest.

The town began slowly to improve and houses, one by one, began to appear along First street of the old plat, then on Main and Second, until 1861 the incorporation was made, and at the election James McWilliams was elected mayor.

Grandview village was surveyed at an early day but the original plat was annulled by Hannibal Williamson in 1848, who made a new plat of the same grounds. The Presbyterian Church was organized two years later and in 1852 the house of worship was dedicated. The society declined until a new society, which erected a church at Matamoras in 1877-78, was formed. Itinerant Methodists came early to the township but the first permanent organization was effected about the middle of the century, when the present church was erected. The Methodist Episcopal Church (Bell's Chapel) was first a log meeting house built in 1855; in 1879 the present church was erected. The German Methodist Episcopal Church was built about 1860. The United Brethren worshiped first in a log meeting house erected in 1869. The Fairview Christian Church originated in revivals in 1819; the church in the western portion of the township was built in 1880. The Baptist Church at Matamoras was the earliest in the field at that point but was not organized until 1859. The first officials were: Andrew Snider, Zachariah Cochran, H. G. Hubbard, trustees; Thomas Reynolds, treasurer; Jasper Bonar, clerk.

The first school was built early in the century at the mouth of Mill Creek. The old school building in Matamoras was erected about 1852. The first mill was known as "Buck's Mill" on Mill Creek about one mile north of Matamoras. The new school house is of modern type, two stories high, built of brick.

NEW MATAMORAS IN 1902

New Matamoras is a village of 1,200 inhabitants, situated in the extreme northeastern part of Washington County. It is beautifully located on the right bank of the Ohio River. The highest recorded watermark, that of the great flood of 1884, did not flood the town, which adds greatly to its desirable location.

The memorable "Long Beach of the Beautiful River," together with the two islands which lay in front of the fine stretch of fertile valley, occupied by the town and its beautiful suburbs, not only enhance its desirableness as a place for beautiful homes, but makes the whole seem highly picturesque also.

This town has never had any spasmodic growth; its development has been a necessity to accommodate its environment. It is the youngest village in this section of Ohio, compared with others of about the same population; within the last 12 years, or since the rich discoveries of oil in this locality, it has taken on new life and growth; many new residences have made their appearance, older ones have been remodeled and modernized; a number of new business firms have sprung up, and the capacity of others greatly enlarged to accommodate the increased trade, and a flourishing national bank speaks unmistakably of prosperity.

For years the citizens could justly be proud of their excellent public schools, and they have never been in better condition than at the present time. Onward has been the record; the present fine brick school building certifies to the educational enterprise of an intelligent community. The school has a 12-years' course of study, with an excellent curriculum which qualifies its high school graduates to enter our best colleges.

Methodist Episcopal, Baptist, and Presbyterian are the religious denominations represented; these pulpits are invariably occupied by ministers who are abreast of the times and command the esteem and respect of their parishioners and community at large. These different organizations are markedly in harmony with each other in Christian unity.

The foregoing shows well for New Matamoras, but the whole truth could not say less. Few towns, if any, in the State of its size, have so many complete and excellent systems of water works and sewerage, and with an abundant supply of natural gas now in sight for 20 or more years, and hundreds of acres of gas territory to be developed, give the denizens the assurance of the continued comfort and luxury, at a minimum cost, of the best fuel and the best lighting material in existence, and must be a tempting invitation to the manufacturer and enterprising stranger to seek such a location.

INDEPENDENCE TOWNSHIP.

ship is dated June 3, 1840, and reads as follows:

"On the petition of sundry inhabitants of the township of Newport, praying to be set off into a new township separately and apart from said Newport, on consideration of said petition, the commissioners do hereby agree to constitute a new township in the county of Washington, to be known and designated as the township of Independence, and to be constituted of the following territory, to-wit: Sections No. 2, 3, 4, 8, 9, 10, 14, 15, 16, 17, 18, 19, 20, 21, 22, 23, 24, 25, 26, 27, 28, 29, 30, 31, 32, 33, 34, 35, 36, and fractional sections No. 1, 7 and 13."

The sketch of the history of this district will be outlined where it belongs under Newport township. The leading events since the establishment of Independence are noted here.

About 1836 the "old settlement" of the township which was soon to be made had given way largely to a German element. The leaders of this new element were the Huffmans, Kinsels and Berletts. It was in 1843, as the story goes, that a four-wheeled wagon was first seen in this township. The earliest physicians were Drs. Little, Wilson and Taylor. In 1835 a log-hewn meeting house was erected which saved a Sabbath day's journey to Newport. Three denominations, Presbyterians, Methodists and Baptists. In 1858 the Methodists built a church on Rea's Run and in 1867 the Baptists found another place of worship in a newly-built school house. The district known as the Little Muskingum settlement was settled early in the century, the first families being the Flemings, Dickersons, Devols and Meads. Archer's Fork was settled early by a Mr. Archer; the Cadys, Burris, Treadways and Parrs were early settlers. The wave of German immigration reached Archer's Fork about 1835, the Garberletts, Hoppels and Yosts being the forerunners of these worthy colonists.

The Methodists first erected a log meeting house, on the land of David Cline, in 1847; the United Brethren and Christian Union church organizations used the building. About 1848 the German Lutheran Church was erected on land given by Messrs. Yost and Holstein. Mount Hope Church was built by the Disciple Church in 1873 on the ridge at the head of Coal Run on land presented by Alfred Eddy. The Christian Union society built a church on the site of the log meeting house in 1874. The Little Valley Church was erected by this society in 1873 on land given by George Tice. In the Scotch settlement, a Baptist Church was organized in 1864 and a building erected in 1871 which has been known as Davis Run and as Deutcher's Chapel.

The township has five post offices: Wade, Archer's Fork, Deucher, Leith and Lawrence. Many years ago T. N. Barnsdall developed a good oil field on Archer's Fork and since that time producing wells have been opened in other parts of the township.

LAWRENCE TOWNSHIP.

A petition was laid before the commissioners at their June session, 1815, signed by Nathaniel Mitchell, John Mitchell, Elisha Rose, John Sharp and others, "praying that a new township may be laid out and set off from the township of Newport." It was resolved by the board "That the whole of the original surveyed township number three, range seven, together with sections 17, 18, 22, 23, 24, 28, 29, 30, 32, 34, 35 and 36 in the second township, range seven, be and hereby is established into an incorporated town, to be called and denominated Lawrence, and the inhabitants within said district are entitled to all the immunities and privileges of incorporated towns within the State. The elections in said town will meet at the house of John Mitchell on the second Saturday of July, at 10 o'clock A. M., for the purpose of electing township officers." The Court of Quarter Sessions directed that an election for two justices of the peace should be held at the same time and place. The election which was held agreeably to this order resulted in the choice of the following officers: Trustees, William Hoff, John Newton and Elisha Rose; clerk, John Sharp; constables, James Hoff and Elijah Wilson; fence viewers, Jonathan Dye and James Mitchell; treasurer, John Dye; supervisors, George Nixon and Nathaniel Mitchell; justices of the peace, Samuel Dye and John Mitchell. The township officers were sworn in by Samuel Dye, Justice of the Peace.

On the first of April, 1816, the electors met at the house of Nathaniel Mitchell to elect township officers. John Dye was chosen chairman, and Elisha Rose and John Newton, judges of the election. John Sharp was clerk. At this second election 18 votes were cast. The following is the list of voters: John Sharp, William Hoff, James Hoff, David McKibben, Isaac Wilson, Nathan Davis, Nathaniel Mitchell, Jonathan Dye, John Newton, Elisha Rose, John Dye, Samuel Dye, Henry Chamberlain, John Mitchell, Isaac Hill, Ezekiel Dye, James Mitchell, and Alderman Johnson.

Nearly half of this list of voters resided in that part of the township which has since been set back to Newport. James Hoff was elected first "lister of taxable property," and John Mitchell, appraiser of houses. The first grand jurors from the township were Nathaniel Amelin and Nathaniel Mitchell. John Dye was the first petit juror.

The election of 1820 and subsequent elections for many years were held in a school house on John Dye's farm near the mouth of Cow Run. In 1827, section 32 of township two was reannexed to Newport, and at the June session, 1840, Lawrence was reduced to its present limits.

The first school was opened in 1810 near the mouth of Cow Run. In 1838 when the public school system went into effect, Lawrence was divided into eight districts and a log school house built in each. The first church was a log school house covered with clapboards located on the Little Muskingum and used by all denominations. The Presbyterian form of government was instituted in the "forties" and in 1846 the church was reorganized as a Congregational Church and a new building was built in 1846. The present church was dedicated in 1867.

The Lawrence Baptist Church was in existence 1840-44. Other churches were organized as follows: German Methodist, 1845; two German Lutheran, one at the mouth of Cow Run in 1853 and the other on the ridge in 1863; United Brethren at Mount Zion, about 1860 and Union Chapel at the head of Eight Mile Run; Pine Ridge Methodist, head of Bear Run, in 1866; Disciples (or "Campbellites") Mount Pisgah Church, at head of Cow Run; a Scotch Presbyterian Church in 1847; Methodist Episcopal Gross Chapel, 1872.

The first Children's Home in Ohio was established by Miss Catherine A. Fay in Lawrence township, at the mouth of Morse Run, in April, 1858. The first post office was named "Lawrence township" and was on the farm of John W. Dye, in the central portion of the township. The first post office at Crow Run was opened in 1869 with William P. Guitteau, postmaster. Several literary societies were established early in Lawrence township, known as "Little Muskingum Lyceum" (1842), "Singed Cat Society" (1845), "Tarnal Critics" (1848). As the two latter names suggest, these organizations were very democratic and started for philanthropic purposes.

The famous Cow Run oil development began in the "sixties." The first drilling machine was brought into Lawrence township in 1864 by George McFarland. Five years later 500 wells were being operated though the daily output was not as great a number of barrels.

Joshua L. Guyton, now living in the vicinity of Marietta, says that in the winter of 1845-46 he was a cabinetmaker with his father, Abraham Guyton, on Cow Run in Lawrence township. Within about 35 feet of their shop was a "burning spring," as it was called. Through a wooden pipe they conducted the natural gas to the shop and used it for illuminating purposes. For a burner they used the spout of a coffee-pot. Since that time an oil-well sunk near the spring has proved a good producer but the surface flow of gas has ceased. Joshua L. Guyton is the father of Bion L. Guyton, a well-known attorney in this county.

LIBERTY TOWNSHIP.

Liberty township was established March 5, 1832, by the following act of the County Commissioners.

Resolved, That the tract of country contained in range number seven, in town number four, in the county of Washington be, and the same is hereby established into an incorporated town, to be called and designated Liberty; and the inhabitants residing within said surveyed township are declared to be entitled to all the privileges and immunities of incorporated towns within this State; and said inhabitants will meet at the house of Matthew Gray, in said township, on the first day of April next, at 10 o'clock, A. M., to elect township officers agreeably to law.

It will thus be seen that, at first, the surveyed township and the established township were identical, and thus, accordingly, Liberty began life with her full 36 square miles of territory. No records of township elections appear until 1838, although the book which contains this record was in the possession of the township for four years previous.

The memories of the oldest residents of the township, however, retain the facts that Matthew Gray was in all probability the first justice of the peace, that at any rate, he was a "squire" in 1834, at which time William Gray was a constable. It is said that at one time there were not available men enough to fill the offices, and that Salem township was asked in a neighborly way to lend them a man for constable, but who was the man, thus obligingly furnished, tradition has provokingly forgotten. It appears also that these early elections were held in a log school house about where Germantown now stands.

The first township officers now on record in the township were chosen April 2, 1838, at an election held at the residence of Joseph Barnhart. William Koon, Matthew Gray and Gideon Keeder presided over the election, and James Schofield and Richard Alberty were clerks. The election resulted in the choice of Newman Meridith, Marcellus Marsh, and Richard Alberty, for trustees; David Hendershot, clerk; Elijah Gray, constable; Isaac Cline and John Miller, overseers of the poor; Eben Spear, Amlin True, and William Walters, fence viewers; James Martin, Daniel Michael and William Harsha, road supervisors.

The omission to elect a treasurer was corrected by the appointment in May, 1838, of Matthew Gray to fill that office. This appointment was made by the trustees of the township.

Liberty was slightly diminished in extent in 1851 when two sections were given to Monroe County and four to Noble.

The earliest settlers in Liberty township were the Palmers, Campbells, Alberys, Grays, Woods, Koons and Bernharts. The first water mill was erected about 1844 by John Miller on Saltpetre Creek. The first log school house was built a quarter of a mile north of Germantown about 1838. The Methodists were the first religious body to enter the township, building a log-hewn church about 1840. In 1848 Abraham Alban gave the ground for a new church which was built. In 1855 a church was erected in the southern part of the township. The Scott Ridge Church was built in 1873. A German Church on Fifteen Mile Creek was built about 1860 but was destroyed by fire. The Pleasant Ridge Christian Church of Dalzell was erected in 1880, the society being formed in 1867. The Liberty Baptist Church at the forks of Fifteen Mile Creek was built in 1874. A Free Methodist society purchased a school house in 1880 and dedicated it for their services.

The oldest village, Germantown, was laid out in 1852 by David Hendershot, Charles Coleman being appointed first postmaster in 1873.

In its vicinity a valuable oil field has been developing within the last two years and the production is still increasing rapidly. Dalzell, named in honor of "Private Dalzell" was laid out in 1871, S. D. Spear becoming first postmaster in the year following.

LUDLOW TOWNSHIP.

Ludlow township derives its name indirectly from a surveyor of that name, who ran the north boundary of the "donation" land, called the Ludlow line. On July 17, 1819, the county fathers established the township and named it after the line that now bounds it on the north. At that time, however, the township extended two miles north of this line. The establishing act, as found in the commissioners' journal, is as follows:

July 17, 1819.

On the petition of Joseph Dickerson, John Davis, and Kutzer D. Jolly and others, inhabitants of the third township in the sixth range.

The Board of Commissioners of Washington County establish the third township in the sixth range, together with section No. 36 of township two, in said sixth range, into a new and independent township and election district, to be hereafter known and distinguished by the name and denomination of Ludlow. And order that the qualified electors of said district meet at the house of Daniel Hearn, in said town, on the fourth Monday of August next, at 10 o'clock, A. M., to elect their township officers agreeably to law.

In 1851 all above the Ludlow line became a part of Monroe County. In 1840 the establishment of Independence declared the "section No. 36 in township two" a part of that township. These are the only two changes that Ludlow has suffered territorially since its establishment. The valley of the Little Muskingum was first settled. Solomon Tice is reported as being the first settler. Other early pilgrims were the Devees, Hearn, Elders and Dicksons.

A Methodist Church was holding services as early as 1824. Before 1848 a Methodist Church was built at Bloomfield. A Disciple Church was organized about 1850. In the southeastern part of the township a Catholic Church was built about 10 years later. Schools were in existence in 1816, and perhaps some previous to that date. About 1820 the first water mill was built by Richard Taylor on the Little Muskingum at Bloomfield. This village was laid out about 1840 by Porter Flint.

The developed oil territory extends across the township and into Monroe County.

MARIETTA TOWNSHIP

Was organized December 20, 1790, as appears from the following record:

eighth range, and townships No. 2 and 3 in the ninth range, be, and they hereby are incorporated and included in one township, by the name of Marietta.

The town officers were: Anselm Tupper, town and township of Marietta were the same, William Stacy, overseers of poor; B. I. Gilman, constable.

Mr. Gilman declined acting, and Christopher Burlingame was appointed in his place.

For the first 12 years of its history the town and township of Marietta were the same but at a town meeting held September 1, 1800, Gen. Rufus Putnam, Paul Fearing, Benjamin Ives Gilman, and William Rufus Putnam, were appointed a committee to apply for incorporation. The act creating the town of Marietta was passed November 3d, approved by the governor December 2nd, to take effect January 1, 1801. The first officials were: Gen. Rufus Putnam, chairman; David Putnam, clerk; Ichabod Nyc, treasurer; Rufus Putnam, Griffin Greene, and Joseph Gilman, councilmen.

The above plan of town government continued until 1825, when another charter was obtained which changed to election of a mayor and reduced the area to about the present size. Harmar was made the Second Ward, and Marietta east-side constituted the First and Third Wards, each being entitled to three councilmen. The nine councilmen were elected by the voters and they in turn elected the officers from their number. On account of local disaffection, the west side secured a separate corporate existence in 1837, but was re-united to Marietta in 1890. Marietta was chartered as a city of the 2nd class, October 29, 1853, and charter amendments with protective ordinances have been passed from time to time, which were all codified and published in 1893. The population of Marietta in 1880 was 5,444, and of Harmar 1,571, making a total of 7,015 which in 1890 had increased to 10,050 and the census of 1900 gives the city 13,348.

The early history of the village has been outlined in the history of the Ohio Company. It is our purpose here to give a running sketch of the city's commercial and social development through the century.

The first store in Marietta—the first store in the Northwest Territory—was located on the corner of Muskingum and Ohio streets, and was owned by Dudley Woodbridge. Business seems to have followed the river bank both ways from this point. As we shall proceed with this sketch, the location of stores first around “the Point” and then up Muskingum street, will appear. At a later period Ohio street was the line of trade, and it was not until comparatively recent times that Front street was improved. Previous to 1830 Front street was almost a common, the grass and weeds scarcely ever being broken by a team or vehicle. It will be seen also that in the olden time Putnam street had a few stores. Business slowly advanced from the river westward, coming over the flats and creeks, forming an unbroken line of stores on one side to Putnam, which in the unseen future may become the center of trade. Greene street and the cross streets connecting it with Ohio were avenues mainly to smaller shops and dwelling houses. In Harmar the stores were along the river as in Marietta. Furs and salt were the two most important articles of trade. The second store in Marietta was opened by Charles Greene about 1797. Later he went into the ship-building business. Other early merchants were Maj. Robert Lincoln, Col. John Mills, Col. Abner Lord, Benjamin Ives Gilman in Harmar, also Col. Levi Barber, James Whitney, Abijah Brooks, Joseph Holden, S. B. Wilson, Col. Ichabod Nye, Nathaniel Dodge, Seth Washburn, D. B. Anderson, Dr. Regnier, Dr. John Cotton, Weston Thomas, A. L. Gitto, W. and S. Slocum, Wayles and J. E. Hall, D. P. Bosworth and A. P. Nye.

Ship-building was one of the first industries in Marietta of more than mere local importance, and the little city at the mouth of the Muskingum was made a port of clearance in the first years of the century from which barques and brigs sailed for ports beyond the seas laden with the produce of Southwestern Ohio.

The first ship built was a small one—a brig of 110 tons, named the “St. Clair,” in honor of the Governor of the Northwest Territory. She was built for Charles Greene & Company by Stephen Devol. The “St. Clair” took a cargo of flour and pork, and in May, 1800, cleared for Havana, Cuba, under the command of Commodore Whippy. The voyage was a remunerative one for the owners and encouraged the enterprising men of Marietta so that they continued building ships and sending them down the river to the sea. The “St. Clair,” which was the first rigged vessel built upon the Ohio, was sold in Philadelphia, and her commander returned to Marietta by land.

The “St. Clair” was built near the foot of Monroe street, where Charles Greene & Company established their shipyard. Several others were established about the same time. Benjamin Ives Gilman had one on the Harmar side of the river where the lock works are now located. Edward W. Tupper built ships at the foot of Putnam street on the Marietta side of the Muskingum. Col. Abner Lord had a shipyard near where the Phoenix Mills now stand. Col. Joseph Barker built several ships and boats about six miles up the Muskingum, among the latter the flotilla engaged by Aaron Burr.

The following is a list of the ships built at Marietta at an early period, together with the names of owners and commanders, furnished Colonel Ichabod Nye by James Whitney, Charles Greene & Company's master builder:

Brig “St. Clair,” 110 tons, Charles Greene & Co., built by Stephen Devol, in 1800, commanded by Commodore Whippy.

Sloop “Maryanna,” 120 tons, built by J. Devol, for B. I. Gilman, in 1801, Captain Crandon.

Brig “John Green,” 110 tons, built by J. Devol, for Charles Greene, in 1801, Captain Holders.

Brig “Marietta,” 150 tons, by J. Whitney for Abner Lord, in 1802, Captain O. Williams.

Brig “Dominic,” 140 tons, by S. Crispin, for D. Woodbridge, Jr., in 1802, Captain Lattimore.

Schooner “Indiana,” 80 tons, by J. Barker for E. W. Tupper, in 1802, Captain Merrill.

Brig “Mary Avery,” 150 tons, by D. Skilinger for G. Avery, in 1802, Captain Prentiss.

Ship “Temperance,” 230 tons, by James Whitney for A. Lord, in 1804, Captain Williams.

Brig “Orlando,” 160 tons, by J. Barker for W. Tupper, in 1803, Captain Miner.

Schooner “Whitney,” by J. Whitney for A. Lord.

Schooner "McGrath," 70 tons, by J. Whitney, for A. Lord, in 1803. Captains Williams and Wilson.

Brig "Ohio," 170 tons, by J. Devol, for McFarland & Co., in 1804, Captain Rose.

Brig "Perseverance," 170 tons, by J. Whitney for B. I. Gilman, in 1805, Captain Wilson.

Ship "Rufus King," 300 tons, by J. Whitney for Clark and B. I. Gilman, in 1806, Captain Clark.

Two gun-boats, by T. Vail for E. W. Tupper, in 1807.

Ship "Tusculum," 120 tons, by W. McGrath, — Marshall S. Jones for A. Lord, 1806.

Ship "I. Atkinson," 320 tons, by W. McGrath, for A. Lord, 1806.

Brig "Hope," 120 tons, by A. Miller for Charles Greene, 1806.

Ship "Francis," copper-fastened, 350 tons, by J. Whitney for B. I. Gilman, Captain Wilson, 1807.

Ship "Robert Hale," 300 tons, by J. Whitney for B. I. Gilman, Captain Holden, 1807.

Brig "Golei," 120 tons, by W. McGrath for A. Lord, Captain Bennett, 1807.

Brig "Rufus Putnam," 150 tons, by W. McGrath, Colonel Lord, Captain —.

Schooner "Belle," 103 tons, by J. Whitney for Gilman and Woodbridge, Captain Boyle, 1808.

Schooner "Maria," 70 tons, by J. Whitney for B. I. Gilman, 1804.

The ship-building industry received a fatal blow in Jefferson's "Embargo Act" passed in 1808. It revived again at the beginning of the era of slack water navigation and many vessels have been built at Marietta and Harmar since 1822. The steamboats built at Marietta and Harmar up to the end of 1832 are named in the list in Chapter XI, under the heading of "Marietta Township in 1833." A list of those built since 1832 would include the following:

Steamer "Dispatch," built at Harmar by Hook & Knox, for Knox & McKee, 1833.

Steamer "Philadelphia," built at Harmar by Hook & Knox, for Captain Dobbin, 1833.

Steamer "Josephine," built at Harmar by Hook & Knox, for Captain Dobbin, 1833.

Steamer "Tusculum," built at Harmar by Hook & Knox, for Captain Dobbin, 1834.

Steamer "Hudson," built at Harmar by Hook & Knox, for Captain Dobbin, 1835.

Steamer "Baltimore," built at Harmar by Capt. William Knox, for Captain Weightman, 1836.

Steamer "John Mills," built at Marietta by Capt. William Knox, for Captain Bosworth, 1836.

Steamer "Stephen Girard," built at Harmar by Capt. William Knox, for James Phillips, 1834.

Steamer "Baltic," built at Harmar, 1836-37.

Steamer "John Hancock," built at Harmar by Captain J. Whitney, for parties not now remembered, 1837.

Steamer "Eclipse," built at Harmar by J. W. Whitney for Captain Knowles, 1837.

Steamer "Orion," same place, same builder, 1837.

Steamer "Isabella," same place, same builder, 1838.

Steamer "Ann Calhoun," built at Harmar by Hook & Knox, and owned by Columbus George, 1838.

Steamer "Victoria," built at Harmar by William Knox and owned by G. Hook, of Mobile, Alabama, 1838.

Steamer "Southerner," built at Harmar by William Knox for Charles Barney, of Mobile, Alabama, 1839.

Steamer "Zanesville," built at Harmar by Whitney & Sharp, for Mr. Hutchinson and others of Zanesville, 1838.

Steamer "Gainesville," same builders, owned by George Parker and others of Gainesville, 1839.

Steamer "Elizabeth," built at Harmar by William Knox for Captain Miller, 1842.

Steamer "Winfield Scott," built at Marietta by William Knox for Captain A. DeVinney, 1847.

Steamer "Yallahusha," same place and same builder as above, owned by —, 1847.

Steamer "Empress," built at Harmar by William Knox for Captain Cox, 1848.

Steamer "J. E. Thompson," built at Harmar by William Knox for the engineers on the Muskingum, 1848.

Steamer "Little Thunder," same builder, same place, and same owners, 1849.

Steamer "Tiber," built at Harmar by William Knox for Washington Kerr, 1850.

Steamer "Buckeye Belle," same place, same builder, owned by Captain H. Stull, 1850.

Steamer "William Knox," built at William Knox, at Harmar, for Mr. Chapin and others, 1850.

Ferry steamer for McConnellsville, built by William Knox, 1850.

Steamer "Red River," built by William Knox, at Harmar, for Capt. O. Franks, 1851.

Steamer "Carrier," same place and same builder, owned by H. N. Booth, 1851.

Steamer "Edward Manning," same place and same builder, owned by Capt. E. A. Davis, 1851.

Steamer "Ohio No. 2," same place and builder, owned by Captain Blagg, 1855.

Steamer "Creole," same place and builder, owned by Captain Hill.

Steamer "Skipper," rebuilt by Knox for Capt. J. Cram and others, 1857.

Tow boat "West Columbia," built by Knox at Harmar, 1857.

Steamer "Joseph Holden," built by Knox, at Harmar, for Capt. O. Franks, 1858.

Steamer "Ohio No. 3," same place and builder, owned by Captain Blagg and others, 1850.

Steamer "Fanny McBurney," same place and builder, owned by Captain Drown and others, 1860.

Steamer "Ohio Valley," 1862.

Wharf-boat, same place and builder, owned by Hall & Best, 1865.

Steamer "J. H. Best," same place and builders, owned by J. H. Best, 1865.

Steamer "Rose Franks" and barge, same place and builder, owned by Captain Brinker, 1866.

MARIETTA TOWNSHIP HIGH SCHOOL.

Steamer "Latawanee," same place and builder, same owner, 1877.

Steamer "Ohio No. 4," same place and builder, owned by Captain Blegg and others, 1868.

Steamer "Red Cloud," same place and builder, owned by Captain Blegg and others, 1868.

Steamer "W. P. Thompson," same place and builder owned by Captain Chancellor and others, 1868.

Steamer "Boone," same place, William Knox & Son, builders, Captain McClurg and others, owners, 1877.

Steamer "Oella," same builders as above, owned by Captain Berry, 1877.

Steamer "Corner," same builders, owned by the Wheeling & Parkersburgh Company, 1877.

Steamer "W. F. Curtis," rebuilt by same builders, owned by Captain Brown, 1877.

Steamer "Emma Graham," same builders, owned by Captain Williamson, 1877.

Steamer "Kitty Nye," same builders, owned by Captain Berry, 1877-80.

The reunion of the Thorniley family, held at the home of Willis H. Thorniley, August 7, 1902, is worthy of permanent record. From the day in July, 1795, when Caleb Thorniley and family arrived in Washington County from Cheshire, England, until the present time the family has continued to prosper. It now numbers more than 1,000 members and many names of the family are found elsewhere in this history.

Following are the names of those who were present:

Caleb Thorniley, Brokaw, Ohio.

Charles W. Thorniley, Brokaw, Ohio.

Delbert Thorniley, Brokaw, Ohio.

Clarence Thorniley, Brokaw, Ohio.

Mrs. Isabel Wilson, Edison, Ohio.

Henry Dana, Caledonia, Ohio.

Mrs. Jennie Wells and three children, Louisiana,

Missouri.

Walter S. Thorniley, Bowen, West Virginia.

P. O. Thorniley, Crown City, Ohio.

Willis A. Thorniley, Pittsburg, Pennsylvania.

Aaron Howe, Jacksonville, Illinois.

Marietta, Saturday Morning, January 9, 1830.—

"Our Town.—Marietta has had a singular fortune. The oldest town in Ohio—settled by an industrious and enterprising people—exceedingly pleasant and healthful in situation—advantageously located for water-carriage—and having around it a good proportion of very good, and a great deal of tolerable quality of land—has fallen far behind many other places, in business, buildings and wealth. A variety of causes have contributed to this result.—The first business in Marietta which caused any rapid increase of its buildings and population, was ship-building. This was prostrated, and with it, for the time being, the general business of the town, in 1807 and 1808. In 1809 the town looked like a deserted village. The number engaged in mechanical and mercantile business was very small. A large number of the best dwellings were unoccupied. In this state of apparent decay the place remained for several years. The few persons engaged in mercantile business were successful. They had a fine portion of the custom within a circuit of 50 miles round—including parts of the valleys and bottom lands of the Ohio, Muskingum, Kanawha, &c. In the meantime the products of this region were disposed of to emigrants—to the salt makers of the Great Kanawha—or taken down the Ohio, or over the mountains—the merchants being seldom or never the exporters. Those engaged in mercantile business being, therefore, merely importers, did very little to enhance the business of the town. Little was done, or attempted, which had this tendency. The town plot, being duly extended, was many times too large for the demand; lots were held at very low prices. There was no encouragement for building, because, as there was no apparent encouragement for the increase of business, there was no apparent encouragement for emigrants to settle in the town. We have said there was no apparent encouragement. But it is believed that, had the real capabilities of the place been fully known, the town would long ago have attained far greater than its present growth. But the symptoms of decay, so long apparent—the stillness of the place, owing partly to the scattered situation of the buildings, and partly to the carriage being mainly done by watercraft instead of wagons—impressed on strangers the idea that Marietta was not, and could not be made, a place of extensive business. Possibly it may be, hereafter, deemed fortunate that the growth of the place has thus far been retarded. Within a few years Marietta has become a place of Education. The beauty and healthiness of this location, and the great extent of pleasant and unoccupied building ground, render it a very eligible situation for those who would locate themselves in an advantageous situation for the education of their children. Building lots have risen within a few years—but are still to be had at a much lower rate than at any other place of the same importance in the Western Country. The institutions for education have already had very considerable effect in carrying forward the improvements of the town, and we trust the course of all will be onward."

Marietta, Saturday Morning, March 26, 1830.—

"Our Town.—Marietta is the oldest municipal corporation northwest of the Ohio. The first act of incorporation was in December, 1800, by the Legislature of the Northwest Territory. The act of incorporation was based on the democratic principles of the Eastern townships, or towns, as they are there called. And to some, who have been educated in these democratic communities, it is a matter of regret that similar institutions were not generally adopted in Ohio. They are founded on the principle that the people should be left, as far as practicable, to manage their own affairs in their own way. The people met together in town meeting to discuss, and decide on, all matters which concern only the little community thus assembled. Here is a school where young men learn the rudiments of legislation, and gain the confidence to address a public assembly. In these primary assemblies men learn to feel their equal rights. If town meetings are sometimes noisy and disorderly, so are other assemblies. Should we reject the institutions of freedom because freedom is sometimes carried to excess? On similar principles we might reject every good thing. But to return.—The original incorporation included not only the fractional surveyed townships, now constituting the township of Marietta, but a great portion of several adjacent townships:—part of the territory of the present townships of Fearing, Union and Warren. The bounds, from time to time, were narrowed down to the two fractional townships. But the old charter remained in force for about a quarter of a century. It was superseded, in 1825, by the present charter, which confined the town to the town plot, and changed the corporation from a democratic to a representative character. Some of our old Yankees regretted the change; but all now acknowledge the superior efficiency of a government by representation for borough purpose. The concerns of a city, or a village, require more promptness and decision than can well belong to a pure democracy. The latter may do very well for the more rural portions of the country, but the police and public improvements necessary for a town require greater decision and more rapid execution. The advantages of the new form of government are well exemplified in the experience of the last 10 years. Previously the romantic mud stories of the West were in some promising degree realized in Marietta, so that strangers were sometimes disposed to nickname the place by substituting mud for the first syllable. The improvements in graveled ways for teams and paved walks for pedestrians, have added most materially to the comfort and advantages of this place, and exhibit, to those who recollect the days of mud, a contrast highly gratifying. The erection of bridges and raised highways has also added greatly to convenience.

"It would be of great consequence to the town to repair the banks of the rivers, and add to the facilities of landing, particularly on the Ohio. It is singular that no effort has yet been made to open the channel between the island bar and that of the Muskingum. It is thought not to be a difficult undertaking. The steamboat custom is very important; but might be much more so if the facilities of landing were greater. If the channel above mentioned could be permanently deepened, and a few trees removed from the bed of the river near the mouth of Duck Creek, the channel next the town could be far more preferable in low water. As general improvements of the Ohio River are to continue and progress, under the Federal Government, it is hoped these particular improvements may shortly, in this way, be accomplished."

DRAWN BY HARMAR

American Friend, January 13, 1837.—

"We know there was an attempt to set off the Second Ward of Marietta—Pt. Harmar—into an independent borough—and we were for it,—but we did not expect the divorce to be so sudden and unceremonious.—The act is passed. Marietta is disorganized—and we have been legislated for without our consent. We can have no municipal government, under the present charter, without the concurrence of three wards. And so we are not only dismembered but disorganized, without our being consulted. Our democracy would have deemed it necessary to submit to the people a matter in which the people are so much concerned. But the nature of the imported democracy may be quite of another cast."

MUSKINGUM TOWNSHIP.

The territory embraced in Muskingum township was formerly embraced in Adams township as established by the Court of Quarter Sessions convened at Marietta in March, 1797. Ever since the formation of old Adams township, it has been crumbling away to establish the several northern townships and prior to the year 1861 Muskingum township was included within the limits of Marietta, Fearing and Union townships. The name "Muskingum" is appropriately derived from the river which runs through the extent of the township.

On April 18, 1861, the Ohio Legislature passed the following bill:

TO REPEAL THE TOWNSHIP OF MUSKINGUM IN WASHINGTON COUNTY.

Section 1. Be it enacted by the General Assembly of the State of Ohio, That the territory now constituting parts of the townships of Marietta, Union, and Fearing, in the county of Washington and bounded as follows, to-wit: Beginning at a point on the Muskingum River, where the same is intersected by the west line of a seventy-eight acre lot, numbered sixteen, in Bear Creek allotment of donation lands, running thence south on said line to the southwest corner of said lot numbered sixteen, thence west to the northwest corner of an eighty-five acre lot, numbered twenty-two, in Rainbow Creek allotment of donation lands, thence south on the west line of said lot numbered twenty-two, to the north line of Wiseman's bottom allotment of the donation lands, thence east on said line to the Muskingum River, thence down said river on the west bank thereof until the same is intersected by the west line of one hundred and sixty acre lot, numbered four hundred, thence south on said line and its continuation to the south line of township numbered three, in range numbered eight, thence east on said line to the east bank of the Muskingum River, thence down said river to the south line of commons lot numbered twenty-eight, thence northeasterly along the corporation line of the city of Marietta to the southwest corner of commons lot numbered seventeen, thence easterly along the south line of commons lot numbered seventeen, to the southwest corner of commons lot numbered twelve, thence easterly along the south line of commons lot numbered twelve, to the southwest corner of commons lot numbered fourteen, thence north on the line of original survey to the south line of Fearing township, thence east on said line to the east line of three acre lot numbered three hundred and two, thence north on the east line of a range of three acre lots numbered three hundred and eighty-nine, thence west to the east line of section numbered twenty-five in township numbered three, of range eight, thence north on the section line to the south line of Salem township, thence west on said township line to Bear Creek, thence down said creek to the Muskingum River, thence up said river to a point due north of the place of beginning, thence south across the river to the place of beginning, be and the same is hereby erected and constituted into a new township to be designated as Muskingum township, and that the eastern boundary of Union township, the western boundary of Fearing township, and the northern boundary of Marietta township be so changed as to conform to the lines of said Muskingum township.

Section II. This act shall take effect and be in force from and after the date of its passage.

The boundaries of the newly-established Muskingum township, as thus defined, still exist and the township, then as now, is bounded on the north by Adams and Salem, on the east by Fearing and Marietta, on the south by Marietta city and township and Warren, and on the west by Watertown.

The elections are now held at Unionville, on the Muskingum River.

A petition was presented to the Board of County Commissioners at the June session in 1877, praying for the dissolution of Union township. At the commissioners' December session of the same year the following was ordered:

The petitioners having made application at the June session of 1877 for the partition of Union township among the townships of Adams, Muskingum, Warren and Watertown, and the board being of the opinion that it is necessary and expedient that the prayer of said petitioners be granted, hereby order that said Union township be divided, and annexed to the adjoining townships—Watertown, Adams and Muskingum.

To Muskingum the territory beginning at the northeast corner of section eight, one hundred and sixty acre lot No. 413, thence north to Wiseman's Bottom, thence east to the Muskingum River, thence following the course of the Muskingum to the northeast corner of one hundred and sixty acre lot No. 413, thence south to the place of beginning, containing section eight, one hundred and sixty acre lot No. 413, part of Donation line (lot No. 418) and all of Wiseman's Bottom allotment that lies in Union township.

Naturally the fertile bottoms of the "Donation" land were the centers of the first settlements, and so we find that the first settlements in Muskingum township were made in Rainbow and Wiseman's bottoms. These bottoms were named for the backwoodsman, Wiseman, who entered about 400 acres of bottom land lying along the Muskingum while Virginia still claimed the right to the Northwest Territory. Wiseman disappeared after remaining long enough to give his name to the neighborhood. The Rainbow settlement was begun April 29, 1795, by a company of several families from Marietta, who had drawn land located on the western shore of the Muskingum River. On the farm now owned by J. E. and A. R. Stacy, a block-house was erected. This was centrally located and served as a shelter and protecting roof until the cabins could be built.

The first settlers in Rainbow were Israel Stone and family. He located on the farm now owned by the S. S. Stowe heirs. Other early settlers were Stephen Smith, Ebenezer Nye and sons, Simon Wright, Archibald and Mary Lake, Captain and Mrs. Abel Mathews and family, William Stacy and Joseph Stacy, sons of Col. William Stacy, Preserved Seamon, Cogswell Olney, John Dyar, Sr.

The first settlers in Wiseman's Bottom were: Col. Joseph Barker, Israel Putnam, Capt. J. Devol and John Russell.

The territory forming the eastern boundary of the township and known as "the ridge," because it divides the waters of Duck Creek from the Muskingum, was not generally settled until a comparatively recent date.

The first school in Wiseman's Bottom was located on the Muskingum River, on the land then owned by Israel Putnam.

The earliest teacher whose name can be ascertained was Miss Esther Levings. Abigail Poole was in all probability the next. She was followed by Theophilus Cotton. Not long after the erection of the school house on the river it was found that the building was too near the water and liable to be surrounded during a heavy rise in the river. On this account it was deemed advisable to remove the school house farther back on higher ground. Accordingly this was done, the building being located on Israel Putnam's farm, where, in 1816, through Mr. Putnam's instrumentality, a commodious brick school house was erected, which served the double purpose of school house and church. In this building the people of the neighborhood continued to worship for a number of years. The people were of various denominations, but in those early days they worshiped in common. Rev. Joseph Willard, an Episcopal clergyman of talent, is remembered to have been the first minister who preached in the school house. When the school house was first moved back from the river the teachers were Colonel Stone, Mr. Brown, of New England, a Mr. Allen, and perhaps others. Whipple Spooner was the first teacher in the brick house.

In early times Rainbow had two neighborhood school houses, which, in this modern day, have been consolidated into one. These were what were known as the "upper" and "lower" school houses, the former being located on the Muskingum, not far from Stephen Smith's place, and the latter being on the site of the present school house of the neighborhood, immediately in the bow of the river.

Nathaniel Dodge is said to have been the first teacher in the "lower" school. The first teacher in the "upper" school was Mr. Walbridge.

An interesting document testifying to the Christian fidelity of the early pioneers in Muskingum township is an old subscription paper drawn up in 1810, which appears to be in the handwriting of Col. Joseph Barker. The object of the subscription was to establish divine worship in Rainbow and Wiseman's Bottom. None of those whose names appear below are now living. It reads thus:

Please pay in money or produce to Mr. Thomas Lake, on or before the fifteenth day of December next, for the purpose of introducing the regular preaching of the Gospel of Jesus Christ, and for inculcating and introducing habits of good order, morality and piety, by holding up to public view examples worthy the imitation and practice of the rising generation.

The subscription paper provided for a cash subscription, but there was none made of that kind.

Then comes a list of subscribers:

Preaching services were regularly held in the several school houses from time to time when a minister could be found.

The only churches in the township are the German Church on "the Ridge" and the Colored M. E. Church on Rainbow Creek. "The Putnam-Rainbow branch" of the First Congregational Church at Marietta holds services in the Putnam and Rainbow school houses on alternate Sundays.

In 1807 Captain Devol erected a very large frame flouring mill near where the present mill now stands. Its large under-shot wheel is said to have been more than 40 feet in diameter, it being the largest mill-wheel ever seen in the West. In 1866 Major Putnam erected the mill at Devol's Dam, which was considered the best mill on the river.

The community in Wiseman's Bottom was fortunate in having among its members two men of such marked mechanical skill as Col. Joseph Barker and Capt. Jonathan Devol. Both of them were skilled architects, Captain Devol being a shipwright by trade, and Colonel Barker a house-builder. About the year 1800, ship-building having become an important industry at Marietta and on the Muskingum, these men readily took part in the work for which they were so well adapted by previous education and natural skill. The dense forests on either side of the river furnished excellent material for the work. Giant oaks were felled, and under the skillful hands of these men were joined together and moulded into symmetrical shape. Noting first the work of Colonel Barker, we find that his shipyard was on his farm on the east bank of the Muskingum. In 1802 he constructed two ocean vessels. One was a brig, built for Messrs. Blennerhassett and Woodbridge, and named the "Dominic," after the name of Mr. Blennerhassett's oldest son. The other was a schooner called the "Indiana." This last-named vessel, together with the "Louisa," built in 1803, were for E. W. Tupper of Marietta. During the fall of 1806 he was employed by Harman Blennerhassett to construct 15 large bateaux for the use of the expedition of Aaron Burr to Mexico. The fate of these boats and this intended expedition is more fully described elsewhere in this work.

Captain Devol's ship-building was quite extensive. He also worked along the Muskingum upon his farm. In 1801 he built a sloop of 200 tons for B. I. Gilman, a merchant of Marietta. The vessel was wholly constructed of black walnut, and was named after the river by whose side it was built. In 1802 he built two brigs of 200 tons each, the "Eliza Greene" and the "Ohio." In 1804 the schooner "Nonpareil" was built. The passage of the "Embargo Act," in 1807, suspended all further operations on this line.

THE WASHINGTON COUNTY CHILDREN'S HOME.

Is beautifully situated near the Muskingum River in Muskingum township. The Home is situated on the east bank of the Muskingum River, about one mile north of the corporation line of the city of Marietta. It is the first Home in the State established under the act of the Legislature passed March 20, 1866, the act itself being a response to petitions from this county.

The farm contains about 100 acres favorably located, and from the buildings and grounds is presented a beautiful and picturesque view of the Muskingum Valley.

The object, as carried out, has been to afford an asylum to indigent children of the county under the age of 16 years, until suitable homes can be provided for them with kindly disposed persons, and all reasonable efforts are made for their improvement in industrious habits and morals while they remain in the Home. Children from other counties may also be admitted on terms approved by the trustees.

At the June session of 1866, following the passage of the act authorizing Children's Homes, the Board of County Commissioners—Messrs. J. J. Hollister, Dr. James Little and George Benedict—initiated proceedings for the selection of suitable premises for the permanent location of the Home which resulted in the selection of the present site and a contract was made for its purchase. At the same session Col. W. R. Putnam, W. S. Ward and F. A. Wheeler, Esqs., were appointed the first Board of Trustees. Prior to this time, Miss Catherine A. Fay had about 30 children at her "Home" in Lawrence township under an arrangement made with her by the directors of the County Infirmary, who were ready to be transferred to the new Home as soon as the buildings could be made ready for occupation, which occurred April 1, 1867.

The first matron, with many of the responsibilities of superintendent, was Mrs. A. G. Brown, who discharged her duties successfully one year.

Mrs. Brown was succeeded by Rev. Ira M. Preston and wife, who resigned at the close of their year, and were followed by Dr. S. D. Hart and wife, who were continued superintendent and matron from April 1, 1869, until the lamented death of Mrs. Hart, August 27, 1884. Immediately afterward Dr. Hart was asked to continue as superintendent, and Miss

E. A. Nixon, who had been teacher since 1870, was promoted to be matron, a place her long experience in the Home greatly aided her to fill to the entire satisfaction of the trustees. Dr. Hart was succeeded by S. L. Grosvenor, and he in turn by J. N. Bell. After the death of Mr. Bell, Principal J. L. Jordan of the Har-mar public schools, was elected superintendent and is still in charge. Mrs. Jordan is matron. In the present Board of Trustees are S. J. Hathaway, president; L. W. Ellenwood, W. F. Robertson, and W. A. Sniffen. Mr. Hathaway is the senior member in years of service. About 1889 the system of assigning children to homes was revolutionized. Since that time instead of waiting for people to come and select children, homes have been sought through the aid of the Cincinnati Children's Home, a private institution under strong Christian influence. The Cincinnati institution employs an agent and visitors to seek homes for children. He follows up the children thus placed, visits them at least once a year until they are 21, and reports to the trustees of the Home in Washington County. The result has been, that while the number passing through the Home every year has increased, the number of inmates at any one time has been much smaller. The County Children's Home is made a stopping place until another home can be found in a good family.

The first building used as a Home was a large two story brick, originally constructed by Prof. Samuel Maxwell as an advanced school for boys, the cost of the farm and buildings being at the time $18,000. Subsequent additions and buildings have been made so that the value of the premises now is estimated at $30,000. One large building of three stories has been erected, the first floor being used as a school room, and the second and third as a dormitory for the boys. A view of the Home is presented on a preceding page, in connection with a more extended notice of the origin of the Home.

NEWPORT TOWNSHIP.

In 1798 all territory lying east of the west-corn boundary of the seventh range was erected into Newport township. From this great territory Grandview was established in 1802, Lawrence in 1815, Ludlow in 1819, Liberty in 1832, and Independence in 1840. This, the early history of Newport, is the early history of several townships already sketched, especially of Independence.

Newport was first settled before 1798 by William Tison, Neal Cortner, John Cotton, Joseph Luckey and David Stokely at the "Upper Settlement"—near the present village of Newport. These forerunners of civilization gave way before the so-called "real pioneers," among whom the Danas and Greenes share the honor of making the first permanent settlement, soon followed by the Holdens, Templetons, McKibbens, Nichols and others. In the northwestern portion of the township William Hill, Sr., began a settlement on the Little Muskingum which has since borne his name. A "Lower Settlement" was begun early, known as Lower Newport.

Newport was laid out by Captain Battelle, son of Col. Ebenezer Battelle, a graduate of Harvard College, early in the first decade of the century. The first school in the township was opened at this spot by Caleb Greene. A school in the Hills neighborhood was started about the same time by Annie Plumer and a third was soon in existence on the east bank of the Little Muskingum near Beech Grove Church. In 1816 a log school house was built in Lower Newport with George Greenwood as first teacher.

Itinerant Methodist clergymen were in Newport before 1800 and within 15 years a log church was built at Lower Newport on the bank of the Ohio. The first Methodist Church in Newport was organized in 1825 and in four years a church was completed. In May 1870 a new brick church was dedicated. A Presbyterian Church was organized June 9, 1838. For many years they were supplied by President Smith of Marietta College, who "was accustomed to remark that his visits to the little flock at Newport were the green spots in his life." In 1869 the society was dissolved. The Beech Grove Presbyterian Church was built in 1848. In 1861 when the Presbyterian Church at Marietta died, this church was named the Beech Hill First Presbyterian Church, which name it retains. The nucleus of the Newport Baptist Church was formed previous to 1822, when meetings were held in various houses in the "Upper Settlement." The interest grew through the years and the church was organized in January, 1838. The first structure, a brick, was erected and dedicated January 1; 1842. There had been paid on the church $951.24, leaving a debt of $336.44. William Dana paid this and took the note of the trustees for the amount. At the death of William Dana search for the note was made, but it could not be found. In this quiet way did Mr. Dana pay the debt, having destroyed the note as soon as received. In 1878 the church was thoroughly remodeled at a cost of $2,000 and dedicated March 21, 1880. About 1855 a United Brethren Church was organized and a building erected on land given by William Severs. It is known as the Kinderhook Church. The Beech Grove Church was organized in a school house in Newell's Run in 1863. In 1870 a little church was built on the site of the abandoned Methodist Church near the mouth of Newell's Run.

Soon after the formation of the "Upper Settlement," Luther Barker was appointed postmaster. In 1825, when Ebenezer Battelle was appointed postmaster, the office was removed to his residence in Newport. The post-office at Lower Newport was established in 1841, Jacob Middleswart being the first proprietor. That at Newell's Run, on the Ohio, was established in 1865 with Thomas J. Conner as postmaster and Amos Crum first officiated as postmaster at Hills P. O., which was established in 1860.

On the pages of the records of Washington County is found "a plat of the villages of Newport, comprising forty lots in section twenty-seven, in the original surveyed township, numbered one, in range numbered six of the old seven ranges; surveyed January 30 and 31, 1839, for Ebenezer Battelle, the proprietor, the streets to be ninety-one links and the alleys sixteen links in width." This is witnessed by the county surveyor, Benjamin F. Stone, and by the proprietors of the village, Ebenezer and Mary Battelle. The ground was surveyed anew May 27, 1839.

The following is the record of the vacation of the town plat by the original proprietor:

"In the Court of Common Pleas, September term, 1839, on application of Ebenezer Battelle, he having produced to the court satisfactory evidence that notice of his intention to vacate the town plat of Newport had been given according to law, and a statement in writing filed from the persons, to whom by verbal contract said Battelle had given an equitable claim on lots in said town, of their consent to said vacation. It is ordered by the court that said proprietor be permitted to vacate said town plat of Newport."

Newport township as at first established covered territory not included in the Ohio Company's purchase. It was very natural that shrewd farmers among the pioneers were attracted by the beautiful and fertile plain in the southern part of this tract and the name Newport, as well as the family names of some of the settlers, reminds us of Rhode Island.

In the hilly part of old Newport, now included in Independence, Lawrence, Liberty, Ludlow and Grandview, the hunter and the squatter, usually the same person, had almost exclusive control for many years after prosperous settlements had been begun on the river bottoms. There are many traditions of this class of "pioneers," who often made it as uncomfortable for the man who had bought the land, as they had for the former claimants, the Indians. Some of these squatters became civilized but others preferred to move on to a newer and wilder country.

As early as 1820, Joseph Barker erected a mill in Newport township for the extraction of flaxseed and castor oil. It was worked for a while but the cultivation of flax and the castor-oil bean seems not to have proved a very profitable business. In recent years Newport town and township have been greatly enriched by the petroleum industry, a fuller account of which is to be found in another chapter.

PALMER TOWNSHIP.

The first pioneer into what has been a part of Waterford, Watertown (then Wooster), Roxbury, Wesley and is now in Palmer township, was Christopher Malster who settled here in 1796. Other early settlers were the Palmers, Rices, Dauleys, Gards, etc.

Prior to the formation of Noble County in 1851, a man standing on the northeast corner of section six, now in Palmer, could have placed himself by a single step, either northeast, in Watertown, southeast in Barlow, southwest in Wesley, or northwest in Roxbury. From this point the dividing lines ran toward the four points of the compass in two straight lines through the present township. But, by the formation of Noble, Morgan County lost large areas, and was partially recompensed by the addition of the larger part of Roxbury, taken from Washington County. At a special session of the commissioners, May 19, 1851, the remaining portions of Roxbury, with parts of other townships just mentioned, were consolidated into a new township, named after the family so much concerned in the settlement and growth of its territory and interests. The entry on the journal reads as follows:

A portion of the several townships of Roxbury and parts of W. Watertown and Barlow for the creation of a new township composed of territory embraced within the following boundaries, viz.: Commencing at the northwest corner of one hundred and sixty acre lot No. 1074 range eleven, town eight; thence south to the southwest corner of said lot; thence to the northeast corner of one hundred and sixty acre lot No. 108; thence south to the southwest corner of section thirteen, range eleven, town eight; thence south to the southwest corner of section No. 17, range eleven, town seven; thence to the southeast corner of section No. 5, range eleven, town seven; thence east to the southeast corner of section No. 35, range ten, town three; thence north to the southwest corner of one hundred and sixty acre lot No. 780; thence east to the southeast corner of one hundred and sixty acre lot No. 780; thence north to the northeast corner of section No. 30, range ten, town three; thence north to the northeast corner of fractional lot No. 838, range ten, town four; thence north to the southeast corner of one hundred acre lot No. 47, range ten, town four, south branch allotment; thence to the northeast corner of one hundred acre lot No. 47 aforesaid; thence west to the north; a corner of one hundred acre No. 14, range ten, town four, west branch allotment; thence south to the southwest corner of one hundred acre lot No. 15, range ten, town four, west branch allotment; thence westwardly to follow the line which divides the late township of Roxbury, setting off the said township to Morgan county, to the place of beginning.

Schools were started in Palmer township at the very first; as early as 1806 Russell Darrow was engaged as teacher. James Ashcroft, Jabesh Palmer, John T. Dumont and William Brown were early teachers.

Free Will Baptist and Methodist meetings were customarily held in private houses throughout the early years. In 1837 a Methodist Church was built. The first store was opened about 1825 by Hiram Gard.

SALEM TOWNSHIP.

Salem was originally a part of Adams. But the following petition was handed in to the Court of Quarter Sessions, part of whose business it was to establish townships:

To the Honorable Court of General Sessions of the Peace for the County of Washington:

Gentlemen: Your petitioners, the inhabitants of Duck Creek, beg your honors to take into consideration the local situation they are in from other settlements, and whereas your honors at your last session in March did at that time form the different settlements into towns, and at the same time put us, the inhabitants of Duck Creek, into an association with the inhabitants of Virgin Bottom, Rainbow, Cattle Creek, and Bear Creek (into one town called by the name of Adams), whose situation is inconvenient for us to associate with as respects a town by reason of the inconvenience of passing the hills and ridges where it is not practicable to make roads to pass from Duck Creek to Muskingum at the same time, our numbers are almost if not quite equal to some of the other towns already laid out by your Honors being in number on Duck Creek thirty-four families and upwards of sixty men capable of bearing arms.

For this and other good motives, your petitioners request your Honors would take the matter into consideration, and make a division in the town of Adams west by a division line between the waters of Duck Creek and Muskingum, and as far south as Shepard's old mills so called, as far as your Honors in their wisdom shall judge best.

We also would inform that the people on Duck Creek did on the second day of May last, make choice of us, the subscribers, to prefer a petition to your Honors for the above mentioned purposes.

The first settler in Salem was probably Amos Porter, who was followed by the Nashes, DeLongs, Tolmans, McCunes, Fultons, Davises, Dains, Perkins and many others, for what is now Salem was comparatively thickly settled in early years. John True kept school in Salem as early as 1807.

Elisha Allen erected a sawmill on Duck Creek before 1820 and in that year he built a grist mill at the same spot. These were on the "Lower Ox-Bow." On the "Upper Ox-Bow," S. N. Merriam built steam, saw, and grist mills 10 years later. He also kept one of the first stores open in the township, as did Elisha Allen in his earlier mill. Salem is credited for having one of the earliest temperance societies in the West, if not the earliest. It was organized about 1822 by Ephraim Gould and his brother Dennis, a student at Lane Seminary; a pledge was made and called "teetotal." The first postmaster in Salem was Daniel G. Stanley who held office about 1827.

The old Presbyterian Church society was holding meetings by April, 1812. The first session meeting in Salem was in October of that year. Churches were erected in Harrietsville and Bonn. A series of Freewill Baptist services were held as early as 1810. Before 1815 a Methodist Church was organized and a church was built in 1836. A Protestant Methodist Church was erected in 1878. The Mount Ephraim Methodist Church was organized early and buildings erected in 1846 and 1873. The Good Hope Baptist Church was organized in 1835 and two houses of worship have been built—one in 1836 and one in 1851. The Bonn German Methodist Church was organized in 1840. In 1842 a church was erected and replaced in 1871 by a new edifice. Two parsonages have been built, one in 1852 and another in 1874. The Disciple Church at Bonn was organized about 1852; another in Warner was started in 1872. The Universalist Church in Salem was organized in December, 1859, and a church building was dedicated in 1861. A German Lutheran Church was organized about the same time and a building erected. The Corinth Church was organized in 1863 and in 1876 a building was procured. The Baptist Church of Lower Salem was organized in 1877. A building was erected in 1880-81.

Salem village was laid out in 1850 at the end of a plank road from Marietta and the toll house at the end of the road was the first building in the village.

Warner, a station on the C. & M. R. R. was laid out by P. and E. Boye in 1873 and named in honor of Gen. A. J. Warner of Marietta. Bonn, named by the Germans who early came here from the city of the Rhine, was laid out about 1835. The first store was opened here by Rufus Payne about the same year.

WARREN TOWNSHIP.

Warren township was incorporated by the Board of County Commissioners in 1810, but the original lines have frequently been altered. The first permanent settlers in Warren were the Baileys, Newtons and Coles who came about 1805. Within a year or so came the Humphreys, Finches and Cutlers. The first roads were the Marietta-Belpre road (1793), the Marietta-Lancaster road (1797) and the Marietta-Athens road (1800).

One of the most singular documents in existence in the county is a contract for teaching an early school in Warren township which is preserved in the memoranda of Judge Ephraim Cutler. It reads as follows:

Memoranda of an agreement entered into this third day of February, 1807, by and between John Humphreys, John Henry and Ephraim Cutler, and John D. W. Kip, on the one part, witnesses, that for the consideration of the sum of twenty-five dollars for every three months, to be paid him at the expiration of said term by Humphreys, Henry and Cutler, he, the said Kip, doth engage to keep a school at such place as they shall direct and to teach reading, writing and arithmetic, and to govern himself and school by the following rules and regulations, to-wit: He shall keep school from nine o'clock in the morning till twelve at noon, and from one in the afternoon until four, provided that during the months of June, July, August and September school may commence at half past one and close at half past four. He shall be excused from keeping school on Saturdays in the afternoon, on the Fourth of July, when he shall be called to attend trainings, and on election days.

The whole school shall be arranged into two or more classes at the direction of the master, the senior class to be admitted to the exercise of writing and arithmetic; the lower classes shall be employed in reading and spelling, and that no time may be lost they shall have portions assigned them for study, from which at proper hours the master shall ask them to spell, and in order to promote emulation, the priority in standing shall be determined by their accuracy in spelling.

Particular attention shall be paid in the upper class in teaching them punctuation; and that in reading they be taught to observe the stops and points, notes of affection and interrogation, also accenting and emphasizing.

The master shall consider himself as in the place of parent to the children under his care, and endeavor to convince them by mild treatment that he feels a parental affection for them. He shall be sparing as to promises or threatenings, but punctual in the performance of one and execution of the other, and that he inculcate upon the scholars the propriety of good behavior during their absence from school.

He will endeavor on all suitable occasions to impress upon the minds of his scholars a sense of the being and providence of God, and the obligations they are under to love and serve Him; of their duty to their parents; the beauty and excellency of truth, the duty which they owe to their country, and the necessity of a strict observance of its laws.

He shall caution, and, as far as he can, restrain them from the prevailing vices, such as lying, profaneness, gaming and idleness.

From these general rules he may form particular rules, and if they are broken he must be particular to punish the offender, but mildness in punishment is recommended.

Despite the exhaustiveness of the contract, Mr. Kip taught the school only one week. A successful school was taught in Judge Cutler's stone house in 1809-10 by Gen. John Brown, afterward treasurer of Ohio University at Athens. In 1810 the first school house was built. As early as 1814 a summer school especially for girls was taught by Miss Sallie Rice.

The Presbyterian Church of Warren was formed in 1828 and joined Athens Presbytery the same year. In 1837 the church on the river road was built, largely by the funds furnished by Oren Newton, Ephraim Cutler, William P. Cutler and Seth Bailey.

The late Bishop Morris, of sainted memory, was probably the pioneer missionary in Warren township. At an early date the two Methodist churches known as the "Zoar" and the "Bethel" churches were erected. The Mount Moriah United Brethren Church was organized and a log meeting house built about 1850.

WATERFORD TOWNSHIP.

On December 20, 1790, the Court of Quarter Sessions established three townships: Marietta, Belpre and Waterford. The following resolution fixed the bounds of Waterford:

Resolved, That the seventh and eighth townships in the eleventh range, the fourth and fifth townships in each range, and mile square, No. 33, in the fourth township of the ninth range, be, and they hereby are incorporated and included in one township, by the name of Waterford.

The first town officers were: Capt. Ebenezer Gray, town clerk; Noah Fearing, overseer of the poor; Dean Tyler, constable.

To these three townships—Marietta, Belpre and Waterford—Rev. Daniel Story was employed by the Ohio Company to minister.

The early history of Waterford township is given very fully in other chapters. The following article on Beverly, prepared by Miss Virginia V. Dodge, leaves little more to be desired as to the history of that town, and also gives us many items of general interest relating to the surrounding country. The sketch of the Dodge family, likewise prepared by Miss Dodge, also fills out the history of Waterford township and the town of Beverly.

BEVERLY

The colony from which Beverly on the Muskingum had its origin has a most highly creditable and romantic history. Rising out of the wilderness only a few months following the advent of the Ohio Company at Marietta, its sons and daughters were of that heroic mold that has not failed to leave its impress on the character of the present life.

Within a few miles of here were born some of the most noble men and women that our country has known. So enchanting is this heart of the valley, that it is small wonder that Silver Heels, the last chief of the Lenni-Lenape Indians, was loath to abandon the realm that had been his hunters' paradise, time without memory to the white man, and that out of the rebellious spirit of this chief the last arrow should have gone to its mark in the heart of the settler, Abel Sherman.

The immortal Garfield said in the House of Representatives something that has so direct a bearing upon the birth of the town of Beverly proper that it is but justice to the man whose conception it was to here give the extract:

"There is a force greater than that of State and government. It is the force of private voluntary enterprise, that has built up towns and schools and colleges in these United States, with enthusiasm and wonderful energy."

This especial quality was perfectly exemplified in the character of one of the first of Ohio's colonists, John Dodge, Esq., who founded the town of Beverly.

In laying out part of his estate for public sale, and in making donations of a number of valuable properties to improve the advantages naturally at hand, it was the dream of Mr. Dodge to make this point a convenient center of civilization where its productions and opportunities would afford benefit to the surrounding population. The town was not laid out in a spirit of personal aggrandizement, as its founder gave away to its schools, park, churches, ministers and business enterprises more than he kept for himself and his heirs.

A clause from a will by Mr. Dodge, relating to the name of Beverly, which, not being embodied in the historical part of this work containing the Dodge biography, is included here, as follows:

I, John Dodge, now intending to establish on a spot (before selected by my father, Captain Dodge, "as an exceptional step, a loan for the further advancement and advancement of the region we choose. Our people here, and of the town, think it is better the town Beverly, for three reasons.—In that I have a reverence for the name as that of my birthplace in the mother State of Massachusetts. Also that many who came to the Northwest Territory with our company were from that pilgrim coast where that Beverly stands and would thus feel an affection for the name. Again, that I trust in the Providence of God it will be an augur for the protection of the new village; as Beverly in Old England escaped the destroying army of the Norman because of the sanctity of her great prelate, John of Beverly, so I trust those here may be spared all future disaster through our integrity in the keeping of God's laws.

Mr. Dodge made a plan for Beverly in 1831, but on account of national conditions he deferred the actual laying out of the place, although operating a ferry at this period across the river and being interested in other public enterprises.

From 1837 to 1843 the uncertain state of the public credit hardly seemed to touch the most prosperous population in the Muskingum Valley. There were improvements being made by the State upon the river dams and locks were being built, and a navigation was thus acquired that for many decades made the products of these fertile lands available to the world. There came a real need for an incorporated town, in the protection it would lend to the community.

The following letter from Hon. Thomas Ewing, just made Secretary of the Treasury, to Mr. Dodge, whose wife was a relative of Mr. Ewing's, is of prophetic value:

Washington, March 25, 1841.

To John Dodge, Esq.,

I am much interested in your proposition to lay out a town near the home of my family; it would draw new strength there and help to build up our State on a foundation of high character.

Posterity owes you a debt of gratitude for your untiring efforts for the advancement of the community life around you, and likewise for so beautiful a choice of a site for a town. I have been many times to the river, and have seen by stage and by boat the fairest view on the face of earth. Though endeared to me by association, even the best of things I never would not fail to be impressed with its great beauties.

The notable February (1843) that found President Tyler so deeply burdened with the refusal of foreign governments to make even a loan to our agents, and many conditions unpropitious, did not deter the long-cherished plan of Mr. Dodge in the establishment of an incorporated town. There was levied a tax of two mills on the dollar and an officer of the law appointed, with a Town Council. There was a population of several hundred people, and new-comers arriving on account of the improved river traffic, the works having been completed at this place a year before. There were two general stores, also several buyers and shippers of agricultural products. There were three churches, a college and two schools then conducted here.

Newspapers.—The first newspaper was started about eight years after this by Mr. Baker, who more recently was appointed United States Minister to Guatemala. Following this, the Beverly Gazette having expired with the Know Nothing party, Beverly College conducted a weekly paper. Then the Beverly Advertiser was inaugurated by Mr. Preston in 1862 and was well conducted. He was succeeded in the press work for the town by W. T. & Howard Atherton, who edited the Times. In the same year the Beverly Citizen and Washington Advertiser were started. In 1879 C. E. T. Miller and William Walter started the Dispatch. They sold the same to C. N. McCormack. In July, 1888, Professor Smith, formerly president of the College, took up editorial work on this paper. At his death he was followed in this by Miss Roberta Smith, and later by his son, Robert, who sold the Dispatch recently to Mr. Goodrich. The present editor has used every effort to call the attention of the world at large to the great but undeveloped resources of the vicinity, and deserves success.

Beautiful Situation.—In the beginning of the new century, the old town finds itself the much-sought but still exclusive resort of people who want the quiet of its hills, the fishing, hunting or boating and the indescribable enchantment of its woods and country drives. Added to these are the historic associations that linger about the site of its two old forts, the Indian traditions and prehistoric mounds, and there is a wealth of diversion for even summer visitors. The location for health is perfect, few epidemics or diseases have invaded its comfortable precincts.

Several well-known painters and poets have made it the theme of their brushes and songs, and the town and vicinity have produced also some artists of note and a number of authors mentioned later in this article.

The location of Beverly from any approach is a delightful surprise. Set in the deepest bow of the whole river, with a broadness of green fields stretching away toward the east and a rolling plain rising from the bottom to the north, the shining water, of which Judge William Fowler has sung so delightfully, running like a band of shimmering silver at the base of the village streets, the rugged hills in their coats of green rising above the whole like steadfast sentinels on guard, make Beverly the gem of gems in the midst of many precious surroundings. The original pursuits will give place to new occupations, as by the influx of travelers more and more is developed of its hidden beauties and wealth.

Oil.—According to the philosophy that nothing is lost but something is gained in its place, while some of the early sources of income to the town have been absorbed by the larger places nearby, chiefly Marietta and Zanesville, the capital brought to the village for investment in the oil territory lying all about will be of greater benefit eventually; a recent revival of operations at this point renewing those begun about 20 years ago.

Where once cattle, sheep and horses grazed upon the farm and Agriculture was undisputed Goddess whose reign not the most chimerical would have ever supposed usurped, there even oil has come to be king. The tall derricks rise in many directions and men stake their claims for game after game of chance. The number of companies drilling and the rich returns of some call still others to these fields where the resources unseen are greater than those which the forefathers saw in the earth, sun and air of this fruitful township.

Coal, Lumber and Clay.—Beverly is also a depot for quantities of fine lumber, splendid oak for ships being taken out of its surrounding forests only last year. Coal is also brought here from banks at different points nearby. There is within the corporation limits clay, of excellent use for brick and tile, and limestone. The town is lighted by natural gas and a fine electric plant. The general annual expenditures amount to only between $3,000 and $4,000.

Public Institutions.—By an act of the General Assembly of Ohio, a college was established at Beverly, in February, 1843, for the purpose of co-education. This was the joint gift of John Dodge and Benjamin Dana, Mr. Dodge giving out of his estate adjoining the town of Beverly a tract of land very beautifully located and erecting at his personal expense a fine brick building of three stories, well equipped for the day in which it was built, and for the purpose for which the College was designed.

Benjamin Dana left a tract of land upon which was a coal bank to supply fuel for the institution, and also some lots which were to be sold for the benefit of the institution. The learned and foreign languages and the liberal arts and sciences were to be taught here.

It was the expectation of the donors that the trustees would make their gift a nucleus for obtaining further donations as time went on, and thus add those advantages, influences and profits to the community that an institution for higher education would bring. Its successive Boards of Trustees, having been at times somewhat scattered and occupied to the exclusion of public interests, have not after nearly three-quarters of a century obtained any gifts toward the further revenue required at this period. It has at earlier times brought a great deal of life to the town of Beverly. A schism in the Presbyterian churches of this place, which finally concluded in a law suit for property formerly occupied by the Cumberland Presbyterian Church, deprived the College of its full quota of local patronage for some years, but it is now reviving.

Both Mr. Dana and Mr. Dodge were originally of the Puritan faith of their forefathers, but later in life they could not subscribe to all the tenets of the old school profession of faith, and so became members of the Cumberland Presbyterian Church. For this reason, as being a somewhat more liberal body, the appointment of the Board of Trustees was by them vested in the synod of the Cumberland Presbyterian Church.

Churches and Religious Revivals of the early period were conducted first by Rev. Mr. Story, who held services near the great elm tree close by what is now the Baltimore & Ohio station. A powerful awakening was later held by Rev. Mr. Lindley in the first colonial church on the old stage road in the south part of Beverly, then the Presbyterian and afterward the Cumberland Presbyterian Church. When this congregation moved to the brick church up town, the old river church was occupied by the followers of Alexander Campbell. It was quite an interesting building, with high pews, the floor rising toward the back of the church, and the high pulpit between the two front entrance-ways having semi-circular stairs leading up to the desk. Externally, the building was colonial, yellow with white trimmings. The Disciples during the latter part of the last century purchased, and moved to, the very fine audience room formerly built and used by the Baptists on Main street.

After the separation of the Presbyterian element of the town from the Cumberland Presbyterian Church, a new and quite artistic Presbyterian Church was erected on Fourth street about 1895, to which various friends contributed stained glass windows. Mrs. McIntosh gave the lot upon which this church was built.

Mr. Dodge donated the land for all the other churches in Beverly, regardless of denomination, as they each came to be organized.

A remarkable series of meetings was conducted in Beverly about the midsummer of 1841, by a Universalist minister and editor then residing in Zanesville—Rev. G. T. Flanders—which resulted in the organization of a Universalist Church to which many of the most intelligent families of the vicinity united.

In 1856 Rev. J. H. Barker came as a missionary to Beverly and started the Baptist Church with 15 members.

The Methodists had services in Waterford township from the first quarter of 1800, but did not have a church in Beverly until 1837. Since then services have been held uninterruptedly at the corner of Sixth and Center streets with many able men in the pulpit.

Each of the churches named has had its societies for social and charitable purposes.

The Episcopalians have had special services at homes in the neighborhood, and the Roman Catholics a lecturer now and then at the Opera House.

Fraternal Orders.—Mount Moriah Lodge, No. 37, Free & Accepted Masons, was established on the 28th of September, 1816. The first meeting was held at the residence of John Dodge, Esq., and the officers elected were: Ebenezer Bowen, master; Eli Cogswell, S. W.; Obadiah Scott, J. W.; William Riply, secretary; William Rand, treasurer; William White, S. D.; Elias Woodsorf, J. D.; John Dodge and Andrew Story, stewards; Samuel Andrews, tyler. St. John's Day of 1817 was celebrated with all the rites of the order. The lodge, beside being one of the earliest in Ohio, contained in it the best men of this region, and still maintains its high character.

In 1879 a fine brick and stone building was erected for the use of Mount Moriah Lodge. The present membership is about 80. Many more have been initiated here, however.

The Independent Order of Odd Fellows was founded March, 1847, being Beverly Lodge, No. 84. The first officers were: Samuel Thompson, noble grand; Robert Ramsey, vice grand; C. L. Bowen, secretary; W. V. N. Wheeler, treasurer. They have for their use today one of the best assembly halls in town. In the building built by them is also an opera house of quite considerable seating capacity.

The Grangers have a society in Beverly which had several years ago about 75 members.

Physicians.—The physicians of the early days were Drs. McIntosh, Farley, Baker and Pardee. Of a little later period Dr. Bowen was identified with medical work many years, as was Dr. Israel Stone Dodge, who, however, soon located in Cincinnati and practiced there over 40 years.

Drs. Gilbert Campbell, Berkly and Reynolds were well known about 1849. Dr. Ramsey practiced, and died here at the time of a fever epidemic. Dr. James Little was a successful physician and took an active part in educational affairs.

Dr. P. Kelley has had from 1850 until recently a constant patronage in his profession.

Dr. Joseph Parker continued in practice here until he lost his health and died. Later came Dr. Frank Clark, and after him Dr. Kennon.

Dr. John Reynolds succeeded his father in 1865, but later moved to Oregon.

Dr. Culver resided here and practiced some years, as also did Dr. Chas. M. Hunston, of Kentucky. Dr. John Patterson Dodge was in partnership with him two years, later going to California,—he was appointed brigade surgeon in the Spanish-American War from Ohio.

Dr. Adair has practiced several years in Beverly, as has also Dr. Funk from Northern Ohio.

Dr. Arthur Bowen practiced in Waterford up to 1880, when he moved to Columbus.

Dr. Wallace Seely, who was born here, became an oculist of reputation in Cincinnati.

Dr. A. S. Clark has had a large practice here for years. Dr. Theodore Hayward is now practicing in the vicinity of Beverly and Waterford.

Dr. Henry Clark was a well-known dentist. Dr. Howe, who afterward moved to Mexico, was likewise a successful dentist. Also Dr. Connor of Cumberland. Dr. Hartnell is at present the leading practitioner in this branch.

Schools.—The public schools of Beverly were inaugurated in 1854, the amount paid all the teachers that year being $380. The first school building cost $3,000. This has been superseded by a very much more convenient and modern one, built during the last decade at a cost of about $20,000. A view of this school appears on a preceding page of this history. The superintendents have been: John Tarbell, Z. G. Bundy, Mr. Smith, T. C. Ryan, Jefferson Heston, and Frank Wagner. Dr. Little and Dr. Glines, as school directors for some years, took a marked interest in the methods of instruction:

Industries.—Industries now operating in Beverly and the vicinity are two flouring mills, two sawmills, a wagon shop, three blacksmith's horseshoeing shops, and a veneering and box factory on the Waterford side, most of those engaged living in Beverly. A fine woolen factory, flouring mill, planing mill and iron foundry were destroyed by fire within a few years, greatly injuring the prosperity of the town.

Merchants.—The leading merchants engaged in business are: Warren W. Palmer, who has been very successful and has an attractive store. The leading bakery is owned by Mr. Smith, who succeeded Mr. Meller, who is now connected with the dry goods house of Mr. Palmer. William Maygucken, who is a G. A. R. man, is very popular both personally and in trade, being engaged in a dry goods and grocery house. William Morris has the leading clothing house and chinaware store; he is a merchant of experience and has an extensive acquaintance through the country about here. Charles Langenberg has a fine grocery trade, and also buys in various lines for shipping. Miss Minnie Mathews has kept a grocery and woolen store for some years very profitably. Oliver Tucker has been in the mercantile business longer than any one now in business in Beverly. Rufus Tucker, brother of O. Tucker, is associated with him in the same building but has a separate hardware store. Hart & Powers also combine hardware with other lines. Louis C. Robinson has been for some years in the carriage and agricultural implement business but is now engaged in manufacturing carriages in Coshocton. Mr. Fowler, one of the early citizens of Beverly, has had a store and tinware trade combined with that of undertaking, which he recently conveyed by sale to Mr. Schob. W. P. Robinson was also formerly in the agricultural implement business. Pomeroy Brothers have a large lumber, hardware and shipping business in which they are very successful. Mr. Dye's novelty store is a convenient home for many lines of goods at bargains. The leading drug store of the town is owned by W. R. Parker; there is combined with this quite an extensive general store for books, china, glass and objects of art of a character much better than is common in a town of this size. Dr. Funk has also a handsome drug store. Miss Reynolds for many years has been the leading milliner; Mrs. Jackson more recently went into the same trade and has been popular in her work. Mr. Mitchell has a large nursery for fruit and other trees.

Horses.—There have been some very fine horses raised and owned in the vicinity of Beverly. The region is as conducive to success in this direction as the blue grass country of Kentucky, this part of the valley having special advantages. The Humston and McIntosh farm has large stables near town.

Mr. Shaw three miles below has usually a number of horses for persons from abroad. There is a race track and some stables near town connected with the Tri-County Fair Grounds. The Dana farm and others have fine flocks of sheep.

Park.—Beverly has a beautiful park of several acres given to the town by the founder, John Dodge, Esq., and planted by his granddaughter; also a small park or open green that was Mrs. Dodge's gift, near the boat landing or lock.

Banking.—Waterford township, particularly that part around Beverly, having long been the wealthiest township in the country, has made Beverly quite a financial center. Aside from having regular houses in business, there was always a large trade in wool, lumber, agricultural products and live stock and from other products brought to this point.

As there was great necessity for a bank, a meeting was held at Union Hall in September, 1863, after the "National Banking Act" made the founding of a bank likely to be a success. The directors for the First National Bank of Beverly were: George Bowen, Patterson O. Dodge, E. S. McIntosh, H. C. Fish, J. B. Bane, Charles Bowen and C. M. Devol. George Bowen was made president and William McIntosh, cashier. The capital was $150,000.

The Citizens' Bank was organized in 1875. E. S. McIntosh was president and C. W. Reynolds, cashier. The bank is conducted at the corner of Fifth and Ferry streets, in the same building as the American House. There was a post office established in Beverly in 1838, John Keyhoe being the first postmaster.

Prominent Persons.—Among the persons who have been identified with the history of Beverly, and who became eminent were Hon. John Sherman; Thomas Ewing, whose family lived close by Beverly; and C. A. Dodge. The last named, who was in the United States Senate and was afterward minister to Spain, lived here in his youth, as did for a time John Sherman.

Stephen Powers, who was a war correspondent and went with General Sherman on the "March to the Sea," resided on the old Powers farm near Beverly. Mr. Baker, one of the early editors, became minister to Central America in Cleveland's administration. The Fawcett family at one period lived here; one of its members, Mrs. Fawcett, is one of the singers of Ohio, having published a volume of poems.

Rev. Oliphant Patterson, whose family came from Virginia to Beverly or Waterford township, was an eminent divine and theological writer, having been in active service in the Presbyterian denomination for over 50 years, dying at Oxford, Ohio, about 1870.

Miss Virginia V. Dodge, of Beverly, has written quite extensively upon art and upon Spanish-American subjects, also a number of poems. As a critic in certain lines of art, she was made a member of the first board of judges where women have ever been appointed at the Columbian Exposition, also later at other international expositions.

Mr. Craig, a landscape artist living in Colorado, was born near Beverly. Mr. Reinhardt, an artist of much talent, spent some time here, as did also Lily Martin.

There have been quite a number of minor inventors. Phineas Yates had some good ideas upon aerial navigation, but his machine for flying was not perfected. George Hahn patented some inventions.

The lawyers who practiced longest in Beverly were Samuel B. Robinson and J. C. Preston, now mayor of Beverly. Both these gentlemen held the office of prosecuting attorney of Washington County. Will Ellsworth Fowler of Beverly became judge in Clay County, Missouri, and has been recently nominated for Congress; he wrote a number of poems about Beverly and the environs.

Charles Fowler, cousin of Judge Fowler, also of Beverly, is colonel and president of the Kentucky Military Institute and has written text books in mathematics.

Dr. James Little and son, Dr. Jenison Little, prosecuted their studies in astronomy and higher mathematics, as well as in medicine, with marked success. The untimely death of Dr. Jenison Little only prevented the completion of what astronomers regarded as a valuable work. Dr. Little was the possessor of a very fine telescope with which they made their observations.

Prof. E. S. Cox, formerly of Beverly College, is a special instructor in "English usage" and is arranging a work upon this subject.

Col. E. S. McIntosh, a prominent citizen, kept a diary that was of local value.

Beverly in the Wars and Reforms.—As Washington County furnished a larger per cent. of soldiers for the Civil War than any county except Hamilton, it is not strange that the spirit of patriotism ran high in the vicinity of Beverly, inhabited, as it was, by the descendants of a fighting and heroic stock. There was not a man left in town or about at times during the war to attend to necessary work. Those who were unable to go, by reason of health or too young, and a few from political opposition, were all left to stand guard when the famous raider from the Confederate side, Morgan, swept across the valley. Women buried their treasures and hid their horses and children.

There was a Union meeting called at the first outbreak, and committees appointed to enroll men for enlistment and provide for their wants. The resolutions adopted by the "Union League" are truly thrilling, and they stood nobly by the work until the last soldier returned.

One of the resolutions shows the spirit of sacrifice that animated the people:

Resolved, That we heartily wish God-speed to our fathers and husbands, our sons and brothers, who go to the front to defend the Union. That we will do all in our power to sustain them in the heat of battle and in illness.

A Soldiers' Aid Society was loyally kept up all during the Civil War and sent quantities of supplies to the camps and hospitals.

The G. A. R. Post of Beverly is named for the first soldier who was killed, Capt. Dick Cheatham. The Post roster contains the names of many brave men and officers. Dr. Lindner, a surgeon with General Crook, still resides in Beverly. He had also seen service in Europe. Gen. Hiram Devol also lived in Waterford until within a few years.

The Fearing family, of which Gen. Ben Fearing of the Civil War was a member, lived in Beverly from its early settlement. Captain Grubb and other war veterans reside in Beverly.

During the Spanish-American War, Lieut. Carroll Devol, formerly here, was connected with the Quarter-master's Department. Dr. John Patterson Dodge, of Beverly, was made, by President McKinley, brigade surgeon with the rank of major. Milton Nixon, a teacher of Beverly, served in the Philippines during the Spanish-American War. Clifford Wistell who was a volunteer from Beverly in this war, died at Camp Alger from fever. Joseph Null was in the service in the Philippines.

The spirit under which the Northwest Territory Constitution was conceived made most of its settlers strongly Anti-Slavery. Several families lived at Beverly who used to help slaves escape to Canada on all occasions possible.

In the temperance cause several ladies from the most prominent families took part in the original "Ohio Crusade," and a society for the furtherance of this needed work has long existed, but neither this nor the Prohibitionists in town have succeeded in abolishing the liquor traffic, as public or general opinion supports it still.

THE DODGE FAMILY.

The Dodges of Washington County are lineally descended from Pierre Dodge (or Douge), who came from Normandy, France, to England in the army of William the Conqueror, and whose descendants were settled in Cheshire and Kent counties, England, and came to Massachusetts in 1629. The direct ancestor of the Dodges of Beverly was John Bathurst Dodge, to whom was given a coat of arms and crest (recorded in College of Arms, London,) for valiant service in the wars of Edward I. In America there have been members of the family conspicuous in military and civil life since the first colonization of Massachusetts.

Capt. John Dodge, a portrait of whom appears on a preceding page, engraved from a drawing that was prepared for this purpose, was the head of that branch of the family which has the distinction of helping to establish civilization in the Northwest Territory and Ohio. He was an officer from Beverly, Massachusetts, who had entered the Revolutionary War at an early age and served until its close. He joined the Ohio Company of Associates with the others of his name when it was organized in Boston in 1787.

Following the commission Captain Dodge held in the Continental Army, he had executed an undertaking which had a very important bearing upon the ability of these Northwest Territory colonists to arrive in Marietta the year they did, and for this he received a vote of thanks on his return to Congress.

In order that the treaty might be effected for the safe removal of the Ohio Company to the Northwest Territory, it was necessary that someone take the long and hazardous journey into the Ohio Valley, to confer with and escort the various chiefs of the tribes owning its lands, to Philadelphia, where Congress was then sitting and where the final arrangements were to be made for the ceding of a tract of country. That Captain Dodge was the officer delegated to this mission speaks in itself of the great confidence reposed in him and of his unusual qualifications. Having been bred to the profession of arms from the time he was a lad, and having accompanied several military and surveying expeditions to distant parts of the new country, he had acquired a knowledge of Indian customs and languages that made him able to approach, and succeed in his mission with them at this perilous time, when to pass into the wilderness of the Ohio and Muskingum valleys, where an almost incessant border warfare raged for rights of possession, was a deed of daring in itself. Captain Dodge was a firm believer in the power of God to protect him, and though, like Eleazar in battle, he "clave unto his sword," he also knew the arts of peace, and the annals of the historical societies recording this mission show it to have been accomplished without one act of bloodshed.

He had a most intelligent, enduring and fleet horse called "Dart," as accustomed to the crackle of forest trails, mountain roads, torrents and frontier fare as was his master. On this horse he returned to Boston from Philadelphia after his trip of thousands of miles over the Alleghanies and back. When Captain Dodge again set out for the Ohio country with the colonists he was accompanied by his young wife and child, John Dodge, who afterward became the founder of Beverly, Ohio.

While out on this preliminary expedition Captain Dodge made camp one night in the Muskingum Valley, beyond Fort Harmar about 25 miles, near the mouth of what was afterward called Wolf Creek, and found a beautiful fall of water that would afford at that time quite a strong power. He thereupon located the place with a view to its future usefulness. Upon the advent of the Ohio Company at Marietta, Captain Dodge showed this to a relative and a brother officer—Maj. Haffield White and Col. Robert Oliver.

The three officers, Major White, Colonel Oliver and Captain Dodge then formed a partnership, very notable both because of its enterprise and because of its being the first corporation for doing business in the vast territory of the Northwest, since so richly teeming with great industries. They erected at these falls, about one-half mile from the present town of Beverly, Ohio, and Waterford, grist and saw mills, and built nearby a fortification or block-house for the protection from Indian attacks of those connected with the mills. These mills, according to Dr. S. P. Hildreth and other historians, furnished the bread stuff for the colonists of Marietta for a year or so before any other mills were erected in the Northwest Territory. The products of these mills were conveyed to Marietta in pirogues (a kind of dugout canoe), and attended by an armed guard. The banks of the Muskingum River at this time were covered with a labyrinth of foliage and vines that furnished a safe hiding place for many an unfriendly red man. As hostilities increased toward the last outbreak of the Indian wars of this special period, it became necessary to abandon the mills until the close of the war, when they were again put in operation. The millstones used in these mills were of very fine quality and quarried in the Blue Ridge Mountains. At the time of the Columbian Exposition in Chicago the Ohio State Historical Society asked the privilege of exhibiting these in the Anthropological Building, where they were objects of great interest. The stones, in a perfect state of preservation, remain in the possession of the Dodge family of Beverly, and are relics of extraordinary interest, also the gun which was used here and which Captain Dodge brought with him from Massachusetts when he joined the Ohio Company. An accompanying illustration depicts one of the millstones; also the gun referred to, and other objects associated with the family's history.

During the Indian War Captain Dodge took his family from the settlement in what is now Waterford township to reside in the block-house in Marietta, where they had relatives.

Mrs. Susanna Morgan Dodge, wife of Captain Dodge, like her kinsman, Gen. Daniel Morgan, to whose line she belonged, took a brave and active part in the frontier life of this period. According to the records of the military surgeon who came on periodical visits to Fort Harmar, Marietta, Beverly, the French settlement of Gallipolis, and other points, "there being no physicians in the forts in his absence," Susanna Morgan Dodge "cared for a number of his patients." The gifts which had shown in the society of the East were adapted with saving common sense and courage to the exigencies and sacrifices of life in this new country. At the mill settlement made in Waterford township by her husband, flax fields were planted and wheels for the making of thread and looms for weaving were started under her care. A linen garment made at this time is preserved by the Ohio State Historical Society. Twice a week after the establishment of Forts Dean, Tyler and Fry, when she had returned to their place near Beverly, she instructed the children from these settlements in the catechism of the Puritan faith and spiritual essentials. Family worship was maintained by her, and for many generations after her death the custom was still kept up in the same house, her works truly following her.

The Marquis De La Fayette, who had known Mrs. Susanna Morgan Dodge, at the close of the War of the Revolution, when he heard that she had joined the Ohio Company, said to an American gentleman: "There will be a Princess in the 'Courts of the Wilderness.'" Such an impression had this matron who had come to preside over one of the best known homes in the heart of the Muskingum Valley made upon the aristocratic ally of the American cause. Her wedding ring was inherited by Mrs. Susannah Dodge Cook, her granddaughter, of Marietta, Ohio.

Her son, John Dodge, Esq., of Beverly, Ohio, married for his first wife Mary Stone. The eldest son of this union, Dr. Israel Stone Dodge, was for 40 years a prominent physician of Cincinnati and also identified with the medical college there as lecturer. His portrait accompanies this article. She was also the mother of Sidney Dodge, of Iowa, of William A. Dodge, of Christopher Columbus Dodge, of Eliza, of Melissa, and of John Dodge, who died in his youth. Of the other members of this branch of the Dodge family, one of them, Sidney Dodge, moved from Beverly to Iowa and became a leading citizen of Muscatine County. His son, Judge John Edward Dodge, was the youngest judge to sit upon the bench in Nebraska. Another of them became United States Minister to Spain, and still another a member of the United States Senate, a father and son both being in Congress at the same time. Of those of Captain Dodge's branch of the family who were engaged in the Civil War, Maj.-Gen. Granville M. Dodge, the son of his brother, Phineas, from Massachusetts, attained perhaps the greatest distinction, although the army register of the United States contains the names of a number of other relatives directly connected with the Capt. John Dodge branch who have given brilliant military service to their country.

John Dodge, Esq., of Beverly, married for his second wife Nancy N. Patterson, of Virginia. Her family were closely related to the Baltimore Patersons, whose daughter, Elizabeth, married Jerome Bonaparte, and Mrs. Nancy Patterson Dodge bore a striking resemblance to her cousin, Madame Bonaparte. Her father and mother, Mr. and Mrs. Patterson, came from Virginia to Waterford at a very early date in the last century, to reside near Mrs. Dodge. Mr. Patterson held several public offices in Washington County and died there, being buried near his wife and daughter, Prudence (who was betrothed to Mr. Stewart, a statesman of Pennsylvania, at the time of her death) in the old Waterford cemetery, where are also buried a large number of the Dodge family.

The sons of Mr. Patterson were all college-bred men, educated in the East. The eldest was Rev. Oliphant Patterson, an eminent Presbyterian divine, who preached over 50 consecutive years in the Ohio Valley and was the author of a number of theological works. He died at Oxford. The other sons were Alfred Patterson, for many years a banker in Pittsburgh; Thomas Patterson, a large cotton planter, who lived in Louisiana and Texas, dying in New Orleans; and Ewing Patterson, who entered the ministry, but died in his youth.

The children of John Dodge, Esq., of Beverly, and Nancy N. Patterson, of Virginia, were Patterson Oliphant Dodge and Colina N. Dodge, who married S. B. Robinson, a lawyer of Beverly, also at one time prosecuting attorney of Washington County.

Patterson Oliphant Dodge, who inherited that part of the estate of his father which remained of the plain land and hills back of Beverly after Mr. Dodge had laid out the bottom in the town proper, was the only one of Mr. Dodge's sons who remained in his native town until his death. Although absent in St. Paul and the West and in New Orleans for extended periods at different times, he was deeply attached to the Muskingum Valley. He took an active interest in agriculture as practiced upon his own place. He was a director in the First National Bank, established in Beverly, and one of the principal promoters and owners of an oil refinery built there. He also, in company with J. B. Bain, built the "Island Mills," then the largest flouring mills in Waterford township. He owned other manufacturies at different periods, an iron foundry, a tannery, and also operated a steam ferry between Waterford and Beverly, the rights for which he inherited from his father. Mr. Dodge was a very intellectual, as well as a patriotic man. At the outbreak of the Civil War he offered his services to his country. On account of his then failing health he was not permitted to do service, but he contributed generously to the fitting out of several military companies. He had been quite an extensive traveler in his own country. He died in the prime of his life, about 44 years of age, and is buried in Beverly, Ohio.

Patterson Oliphant Dodge, in 1859, had married the youngest daughter of Hon. Silas Heimway Jenison, a statesman who was Governor of Vermont for four terms and an author, residing at Shoreham, on Lake Champlain. The widow of Mr. Dodge, Mrs. Laura Louise Jenison Dodge, now resides with her family on the estate left to her husband. She was educated in the most cultured and exclusive society of the New England of her day, and received additional advantages in the famous French convent of Montreal, Canada, where she was taken by her father, Governor Jenison, receiving afterward also instruction from private tutors. Mrs. Dodge was one of the organizers of the Soldiers' Aid Society at the beginning of the Civil War. She was one of the original members of the "Ohio Temperance Crusade." She has presided over her household as hostess to a long succession of guests and friends, with the gentle dignity of the chataleine of that school of manners and morals in which she was so fortunately born and reared. The last of that perfect flower of her generation whose like is not reproduced in the atmosphere of this later day. Her portrait, reproduced from the painting by Rhinehardt, is shown on a near-by page.

Major John Patterson Dodge, eldest son of Patterson Oliphant and Laura Louise Jenison Dodge, was educated for the profession of medicine, practicing several years in Beverly in partnership with Dr. Charles M. Humston and afterward lived some time in Arizona and California. He was a graduate of Starling Medical College, of Columbus, Ohio, and also attended post-graduate courses there and at the New York Post-Graduate School and Hospital. At the beginning of the Spanish-American War, Dr. Dodge was appointed by President McKinley brigade surgeon with the rank of major, serving until the disbandment of the Cuban and Puerto Rican forces on the staff of Generals Andrews, Wade and Coleby. His services in the Montauk Detention Hospital work and elsewhere are given very honorable mention in the report of the Surgeon-General, Sternberg, upon the Spanish-American war. His portrait accompanies this sketch.

Jenison Brooks Dodge, second son of Patterson Oliphant and Laura Louise Jenison

Dodge, was educated in the public schools and college of Beverly, and afterward took a business course at Poughkeepsie, New York. He has been engaged in the lumber and drug business previous to his removal to California. He is at present a resident of Kansas City, being connected with a chemical company. He is the last of the family of Ex-Gov. Silas Heimway Jenison to bear his name.

The daughters of Patterson Oliphant and Laura Louise Jenson Dodge were Virginia Ve Dodge, who lives at the Dodge place, Beverly, and Agnes Dodge, a young lady who died in 1890. Agnes Dodge was a very gifted musician, her inspirational power being of a high order. She had produced several musical compositions of merit for the piano and banjo, and was also the possessor of a soprano voice of extraordinary quality and scope, that had been cultivated by the best masters. Her early death deprived the world of the fruition of a genius that would doubtless have made a brilliant career for itself.

All the members of the Dodge family from the earliest settlement of Washington County have been members of the Masonic order and loyal to its principles. During the time of the disaffection in the United States with Masonry on account of the supposed killing of one Morgan, the Mount Moriah Lodge of Beverly, Ohio, one of the first in the State, was enabled to maintain itself in its proceedings through this period by the courtesy of John Dodge, Esq., who gave up the finest upper room in his house for the use of this lodge. There the members met secretly until public disfavor was removed.

The political faith of the Dodge family has been that of the Republican party since the day of its establishment in 1856. Various members of it have been prominently identified with its work and interests. All have been loyal to its principles.

John Dodge, Esq., the founder of Beverly and of Beverly College, was born in Beverly, Massachusetts, in the year 1784, and came as a child to live in the block-house at Marietta with his parents during the Indian wars of that period. At their close in the last decade of the 18th century the home where he was reared was built by his father, Captain Dodge, on the left bank of the Muskingum, in what is now the town of Beverly. Although John Dodge, Esq., inherited a goodly estate, he was the promotetr of a great number of enterprises in his day which not only added materially to the fortune left him but increased the general prosperity of the region where his family, as pioneers of the Northwest Territory, had cast their lot.

Early in the century it was the desire of Mr. Dodge to advance the educational interests of the community in which he lived; he therefore obtained from the State of Ohio a charter for the establishment of a college, intended by him to be the nucleus of a large institution for classical instruction. He built entirely at his own expense a substantial brick building of three stories well arranged for the purpose for which it was designed in that day, and secured the co-operation of well known educators. The bell placed on this building was from a noted firm of bell makers and is one of the finest-toned in the valley.

In the life time of John Dodge, Esq., he made liberal and frequent gifts to several schools and to the promotion of religious works. His home was a rendezvous for all ministers of Puritan faith who frequented the vicinity where he lived, or who passed through the valley bound east or west. In order that Beverly College might draw to itself strength from outside sources, Mr. Dodge vested the charge of this institution in the synod of the Cumberland Presbyterian Church but not as a sectarian school. Benjamin Dana, a friend of the same faith as Mr. Dodge, later co-operated with him toward the support of the college, by giving a tract of land and coal bank, in order that the revenue from these might help to maintain the college at Beverly.

The Dodge Park.—At the time that John Dodge, Esq., founded the town of Beverly, he gave for park purposes a piece of land very beautifully located on a plain in the upper part of the town. It had been a portion of the land grant made his father, Captain Dodge, for his services in the War of the Revolution. It was also a spot held as an Indian conference ground, and he considered that it would be of special interest for the purpose for which he donated it on account of its historic associations. No improvements were made on this however by the town which received the gift, until within the last decade when the granddaughter of Mr. Dodge, Miss Virginia Ve Dodge, asked the Town Council the privilege of planting it with trees and shrubbery in order that it might be completed in her life time according to the original intention of the donor. Miss Dodge was elected by vote of the people, park director. The Park is now very well grown and a great improvement to the town. It was for about 50 years after the gift was made used as a circus ground, common and pasture. Mr. Dodge also gave to the town of Beverly a plat of ground adjoining the lock walls which would answer for a boat landing and serve other purposes of conveniences. Since the government took charge of the Muskingum River improvements, this plat of ground has been kept in a beautiful lawn and has a very sightly little house for the lock keeper and makes an inviting approach to the village.

John Dodge, Esq., also made gifts of land to churches of all the denominations then existing in Beverly on which to erect church buildings. He was the means of making the town of Beverly, which he named for his birthplace Beverly, Massachusetts, the beautiful and famous spot that is now known to be, as a resort and place of residence, in a valley so widely celebrated for its charms.

Hamilton Brooks, son of Melissa Dodge and Maj. Samuel Brooks, was prominently associated with the business of Beverly previous to the Civil War and operated in company with his uncle, Patterson Oliphant Dodge, the "Island Mills," then the largest in Beverly. Following this he moved to Memphis, Tennessee, where he has since become one of the wealthiest and most honored men of that place.

WATERTOWN TOWNSHIP.

Watertown township is the largest in the county, containing an area of 42½ square miles.

At the date of its establishment, June 4, 1806, Watertown, then Wooster, included only the fourth township of the tenth range. The commissioners at a subsequent meeting set off of Waterford and attached to Wooster that part of the town of Waterford lying in the third township of the tenth range, and the eleventh range, and so much of the eighth township of the eleventh range as lies south of the west branch of Wolf Creek.

At the September session of the commissioners, 1813, six sections, 31 to 36, of Union, were set off and annexed to Wooster. The name of the township was changed from Wooster to Watertown, December 6, 1824, the object being to avoid the annoyance of having two Woosters in the same State, there being a town and township bearing that name in Wayne County. The name "Watertown" was selected in honor of the Waterman family, one of whose members lost his life in the early settlement.

Watertown received an important addition of territory in 1877 when Union township was partitioned. Union township, when originally established in 1812, included the whole of township three, range nine, and sections 31, 32, 33, 34, 35, and 36, of township three, range nine. This tract had previously been a part of Marietta and Adams. Watertown as it existed before 1813 had originally been a part of Waterford.

The territory of Union had grown smaller by annexations to Watertown, Adams and Muskingum, and finally the town, December, 1877, lost its identity entirely. The part bounded by a line beginning at the southwest corner of section 26, and running due east to the southwest corner of section eight, then north to the south line of "Wiseman's Bottom allotment," then west to the southwest corner of Wiseman's Bottom, then north to the southeast corner of lot number five, in Rainbow Creek allotment, then west to the southwest corner of lot number 10, in same allotment, then north to the northeast corner of lot number 16, then west to the line of Watertown township, then south to the place of beginning, was annexed to Watertown township. The territory constituting Watertown was originally embraced in Marietta and Waterford. Legal divisions generally became smaller as the population grew more dense, but every change of boundaries but one (when Palmer was established) has resulted in the enlargement of this territory.

Much of the early history of Watertown is embraced in the history already given of the expansion of the Ohio Company. The valley above Wolf Creek was settled in 1797 by an English family named Mellor; soon followed by Mathew Corner, John Bacon and James Quigley. Two servants of the Blennerhassets came into Wolf Creek after the ruin of their master.

The first school in Watertown was taught in 1799 by Nathaniel Gates. Schools were in existence on West Branch and in the Starling neighborhood at an early date. Several mills have been erected on the site of the original Wolf Creek Mills previously described. A mill at Watertown was erected as early as 1825 by John Paine.

The village of Watertown sprang up at the intersection of the Marietta-Lancaster road and the county road from Waterford. The first store here was opened in 1828 by Abijah Brooks, who was also first postmaster. Churchtown P. O. was established in 1875 with M. Leitch as postmaster.

A meeting house of the Methodist denomination was the first to be erected in Watertown township. It was called Wolf Creek Chapel and was built in 1802 on the west branch. The "First Methodist Society of the town" was organized in 1810. A Methodist Church was built on the North Marietta road in 1830 and the Salem Church in 1871. The Watertown Church was organized in 1880. The First Presbyterian Church of Wooster was incorporated in November, 1821. Ten years later the church in Watertown was organized. In 1848 a village Presbyterian Church was organized. In 1853 the two Presbyterian churches united. The First Universalist Church was built in 1835 and reorganized and rebuilt, after destruction by fire, in 1870. In 1845 a Lutheran society purchased the Methodist Church but built a new church in 1855. A Catholic Church was organized about 1850. Two churches were built in 1806,—the Ave Maria Church on Rainbow Creek, the other on land donated by Mr. Judson. The Catholic Church in Watertown is one of the finest in the county. The United Brethren society built Pleasant Grove Chapel in 1871.

The following sketch, kindly furnished us by Deming L. Breckenridge, of Watertown, will be read with interest by many who live in other parts of the county.

THE BRECKENRIDGE FAMILY.

During the times of commotion when Bruce and Baliol were contending for the throne of Scotland, many emigrated from the Lowlands to the Highlands, some taking up their abode in the mountain region and others occupying the fertile glen near the sea-shore. Among the latter, settling in Argyleshire in the Highlands, were the ancestors of the Breckenridges of this county.

John and Andrew Breckenridge were grandfathers to those of the name first coming to Washington County. The children of John were Hugh, John, Andrew, Isabell, William, Thomas, Peggy, Mary, and Jane. Of these only four ever came to this country. Isabell married John Clark and settled in Virginia. Thomas came to this country in 1830 and settled in Belpre, where he died a few years since. His family have mostly moved to the West. John and Mary came at a later date. Andrew Breckenridge, Esq., of Belpre and the late John, David and George Breckenridge, of Barlow, were sons of Hugh. "Deacon" John and Rev. Thomas Breckenridge, of Indiana, were sons of John. Thomas Breckenridge, of Barlow, and his sons, John and some of whom have moved from the county, were sons of David Breckenridge a descendant of Andrew,—brother of John referred to, and a son of Hugh Breckenridge.

The children of Andrew Breckenridge, who married Nancy Brown, were: Robert, born February 24, 1794; Isabell, January 7, 1796; John and Hugh, who were twins, May 12, 1798; Edward, January 25, 1803; William, December 10, 1805; Elizabeth, March 30, 1808; and Nancy, October 10, 1815. All were born in Argyleshire. All of these became residents of Washington County and their descendants with few exceptions have remained here, really comprising the Breckenridge family solid of the county.

Robert, who came first, was married to Catharine Harvey, April 25, 1818. They left Greenock for America June 1st, landed in New York, September 1st, and walked the greater part of the way from there to Philadelphia and from there to Pittsburg, whence on keel-boat they journeyed to Marietta, arriving in October, 1818. They first settled in Wesley township removing to Barlow in 1828, where Mr. Breckenridge died October 2, 1871. By his death the Barlow Presbyterian Church lost not only its senior elder, but also one of its main supporters. His wife survived him a number of years. Their family of six children were: Nancy, Catharine, Isabell, Elizabeth, James H. and Mary Ann. Catharine died December 21, 1839; Isabell died May 21, 1865; Nancy died in September, 1893; and Elizabeth, who married James Milligan, is also dead.

Isabell, daughter of Andrew and Nancy (Brown) Breckenridge, married James Colville in 1814. They came to America in the fall of 1837. Their family of eight children were: Nancy, Isabell, Robert, Andrew, James, Martha, John and Ann,—three of whom have died—John in October, 1853, Andrew in the spring of 1863, and Nancy in July, 1864. Mr. Colville was born in Scotland, 1791 and died April 2, 1877. His wife died February 2, 1870.

John and Hugh came to this country in 1820, settling in Watertown (now Palmer). John was married December 6, 1821, to Agnes Fleming who died July 7, 1838. Their family numbered three sons and three daughters. Andrew F., John, Robert, Jane, Nancy and Martha. John died December 13, 1862. The others settled near the old homestead, excepting Martha the wife of C. A. Brown. Mr. Breckenridge was elected County Commissioner in 1849, serving a term of three years. He was married again, in 1852, to Mrs. Margaret Breckenridge, who died February 5, 1871.

Hugh married Martha Harvey, January 23, 1824. Their five daughters were: Ann, who died April 14, 1862; Nancy; Elizabeth, who died June 7, 1846; Jane; and Isabell. Mr. Breckenridge was killed April 8, 1838, at a barn raising on the farm of Nathan Bell of Barlow, his brother John receiving severe injuries at the same time. Mrs. Breckenridge, who survived her husband over 30 years, died March 11, 1869.

Edward, William, Elizabeth and Nancy in company with 15 others came to the county in 1830. Edward married Jane Fleming in 1832 and settled in Watertown township. Their family of nine children were: Andrew, John, William, Edward, James F., Agnes, Jane C., Mary and Elizabeth. Elizabeth died July 12, 1848, and John, July 25 1857. James as a member of the 148th Reg., Ohio Vol. Inf., died at Baltimore, Maryland, while in the service of his country, September 10, 1864. Mrs. Breckenridge died December 19, 1865, and Mr. Breckenridge, January 20, 1892.

William settled in Barlow and married Margaret Harvey in the spring of 1831. She died February 12, 1846, leaving an only son Harvey, who is a resident of Marseilles, Illinois. Mr. Breckenridge was married again in 1847 to Ellen Reed, of Wheeling, West Virginia. Their three children are: Andrew W., Oliver, and Maggie E. Mr. Breckenridge died September 20, 1893, and his wife, May 7, 1894.

Elizabeth married David Reed in 1838.

Their family consisted of Hugh, David, Nancy, and Isabell.

Nancy married David Greenlees in 1833. Mr. Greenlees came from Scotland to this county in 1832 and settled near Watertown village on the farm where he lived 59 years. He died October 4, 1891, and his wife, July 7, 1890. Their family of two sons and three daughters, Sarah, Andrew, Thomas, Jane, and Agnes, are all residents of Washington County.

THE HARVEST HOME PICNIC,

Which is held in August, has for the last twenty years been one of the pleasant social events in Watertown. The first picnic, of which we have any record in the county papers, was held Saturday, August 19, 1882, in Curry's Grove. The speakers were Rev. G. W. Wesselius, J. M. Murdock, George B. Quinn, Gen. Rufus R. Dawes, Gen. A. J. Warner and Judge F. J. Cutter. Music was furnished by the Watertown Band and a glee club. Messrs. Roscoe Wolcott, James Dunbar, and Eli Gingham are named among the promoters, but no official record is given. The reporter for the Marietta Register closes his account by saying,—“The day ended pleasantly and the picnic was inaugurated as an institution to stand and to hold annual reunions.” From this sentence we suppose that the meeting of 1882 was the first. At the last meeting held (August 9, 1902), it was estimated that 8,000 people were in attendance. A. W. Ramsey was elected president, and J. A. Palmer, secretary and treasurer.

WESLEY TOWNSHIP.

Wesley township was established on petition of Joseph Palmer and others, in 1810, and originally embraced the territory of township three, range ten, and township seven, range eleven, then belonging to Wooster, also the south half of township eight, range eleven, belonging to Roxbury. Afterwards sections one, two, three, four, five, six of township seven and sections one, two, three of township eight were added. At present it is nine miles long from north to south, and four miles wide, containing in all 30 sections, embracing an area of almost 20,000 acres.

Wesley claims as one of its earliest settlers Hon. Thomas Ewing, whose lowly cabin stood just west of Plymouth. Other early settlers were Woodruff, Rardins, Breckenridge, Mullen, Coaley, Cable, Ames, Arnold and Smith.

The first school house was built a mile north of Plymouth about 1820. The first teacher was Miss Hewitt. Bartlett's Academy was organized in 1856, the Board of Trustees being Joseph Penrose, president, Joseph K. Bucy, Isaac Emmons, James King, Jefferson M. Heston was first principal.

The Methodist Episcopal Society erected the first church building in the township about a mile north of Plymouth in 1825. It was a log meeting house and was used until the church at Pleasanton was built in 1855. A Friends' Church was organized in 1837 and a building erected in Plymouth. The Friends' Church (Southland) was a branch from the first society and erected a church four miles west of Plymouth in 1850. A United Brethren Church was erected in 1870, less than a mile south of Patten's Mills; another branch has a church in the northwest part of the township, erected in 1870.

Plymouth, on the State road in the center of the township, was founded by Harvey Smith in 1835. Mr. Smith was the first store keeper. Pleasanton was established at an earlier date, the post office being named Bartlett in honor of Amos Bartlett, the first postmaster. The first mill was erected on Wolf Creek by George and John Martin in 1816 near the present site of Patten's Mills.

CHAPTER XIII.

TOWN AND COUNTY SOCIETIES.

HISTORICAL SOCIETIES—AGRICULTURAL SOCIETIES—FRATERNAL AND SECRET ORGANIZATIONS—CIVIC AND INDUSTRIAL SOCIETIES.

HISTORICAL SOCIETIES.

Marietta's historic position as the pioneer city of the Ohio and of the old Northwest was recognized at an early date as unique. In less than a year after the settlement at the mouth of the Muskingum was made, the directors and agents of the Ohio Company "Resolved, That the seventh day of April be forever considered as a day of public festival in the territory of the Ohio Company, as their settlements in this country commenced on that day." The day has very generally been remembered and, especially in later years, commemorative exercises have been held.

Washington County's first historical society was organized in 1842 as the Marietta Historical Association, but the times were unfavorable and the society amounted to little. In the latter part of 1869, however, a call was issued to the descendants of the 48 pioneers who came to Marietta in 1788 to meet and form a pioneer association. The organization of the Washington County Pioneer Association was completed February 22, 1870, and the following officers were elected: President, William R. Putnam; vice-president, E. S. McIntosh; treasurer, Samuel Shipman; recording secretary, John M. Woodbridge; corresponding secretary, A. P. Nye; executive committee, Augustus Stone, Sumner Oakes, George W. Barker, Henry Fearing and William Pitt Putnam.

From 1870 to the present time meetings have been regularly held on the 7th of April of each year. In the year 1838, the semi-centennial of the landing of the pioneers had been appropriately celebrated and the centennial celebrations in 1888, of the landing of the pioneers on April 7th and of the instituting the Northwest Territory on July 15th, were events of national importance.

The Women's Centennial Association, of the city of Marietta, Washington County, Ohio, was organized August 19, 1886. Its object: "To commemorate in any way it may deem advisable, the settlement of Marietta, and the establishment of Civil Government, in the Northwest Territory." The membership at present counts 127 ladies. Meetings are held Monday afternoons, from October until May, on which occasions a literary or musical program is presented. A fine "Relic Room" has been established, possessing many interesting and historical articles.

The New Century Historical Society was organized December 31, 1888, with 10 charter members. The object is to commemorate the settlement of Marietta and several monuments have been erected at different places about the city for this purpose. The present membership is about 60. The society meets in Library Hall, No. 306 Front street. In January, 1891, a granite stone was put up near the foot of Washington street bearing this inscription: "S. W. Corner Campus Martius, 'The Stockade,' occupied by the first Governor of the N. W. Territory and by the Pioneers of Ohio during the Indian War 1791-5." Another was placed on April 7, 1892, in the yard of the west side school, reading "Site of Fort Harmar, built 1785, Headquarters, 1786-8, of Gen. Josiah Harmar, of Pa., Gen. in chief U. S. A." On July 15, 1892, a granite monument was erected in Muskingum Park, bearing a bronze plate inscribed "Near this spot, July 15th, 1788, Gen. Arthur St. Clair, of the Revolutionary Army and President of Congress, 1787, was inaugurated first governor of the Territory of the United States Northwest of the Ohio River. On this ground stood Centennial Hall of the celebration, July 15th to 20th, 1888."

AGRICULTURAL SOCIETIES.

Washington County Agricultural and Mechanical Association.—At a meeting of a number of citizens of Washington County—and of Wood County, Virginia—held February 22, 1819, at McFarland's hotel in Marietta, was taken the first action looking toward the organization of the first agricultural society which had an existence in this immediate region. Capt. Jonathan Devol was chosen chairman and A. T. Nye, clerk. A committee was chosen to form a constitution for a society and prepare an address to the people. Its members were Ephraim Cutler, Joseph Barker and Alexander Henderson.

At a meeting held at the old Court House in Marietta, June 24, 1846, with Hon. Joseph Barker in the chair, and Darwin E. Gardner acting as secretary, this organization was organized under an act of the Legislature entitled "an act for the encouragement of agriculture" passed February 27, 1846, as the Washington County Agricultural Society. At this meeting a constitution and by-laws were adopted, which continued in force as amended from time to time, until the adoption of its present constitution and by-laws. The present constitution was adopted by the Board of Directors August 5, 1875, and by the Association at its annual meeting held September 9, 1875. The present by-laws were adopted by the Board August 5, 1875.

At a meeting of the Board held August 7, 1858, the name was changed to the Washington County Agricultural and Mechanical Institute. At a meeting of the Board, held June 29, 1867, the name was changed to the Washington County Agricultural and Mechanical Association, its present name.

FRATERNAL AND SECRET ORGANIZATIONS.

Freemasonry, the history of which dates back to the misty past, was working in the provinces when the Revolution with the mother country broke out and Maj.-Gen. Joseph Warren, M. D., in command of the colonial forces, who was "Grand Master of Masons in Boston," was killed in the battle of Bunker Hill. This aroused the Masons who were particularly active in volunteering and July 24, 1775, "St. John's Regimental Lodge" was chartered by the "Provincial Grand Lodge" of New York. The next to be formed for army work was among the troops from Roxbury, Massachusetts. They applied to John Rowe, Grand Master of Massachusetts, who issued a charter to American Union Lodge, No. 1, F. & A. M. as follows:

John Rowe, Grand Master of the Grand Lodge of the Province of Massachusetts Bay, do hereby appoint and constitute you, John Barker, of the County of Washington, State of Virginia, and skill of the ancient craft do appoint and constitute you Master of the American Union Lodge, now created in Roxbury, or wherever your body shall remove on the continent of America, provided it is where no grand lodge is appointed. You are to promote in your lodge the utmost harmony and brotherly love and to keep up to the constitution, for the reputation of the craft. In your makings you are to be very cautious of the moral character of such persons and also of visitors who desire to become members of your lodge. You are to transmit to the grand lodge a fair account of the choice of your officers. Any matters coming before your lodge that can not be adjusted you are to lay the same before the grand lodge for decision. As often as the grand lodge meets, you are to attend with your two wardens and will be notified of the time and place. In order to support the grand lodge, your lodge is to pay into the hands of the grand secretary the sum of twelve shillings each quarterly night, all of which you will pay due regard to. This communication to remain in full force and virtue until recalled by me or my successor in office. Given under my hand and under the hands of the grand wardens (the seal of the grand lodge first affixed) this the fifteenth day of Feb., A. M., 5776, of Salvation 1776. By order of John Rowe, Grand Master; Richard Dudley, D. G. M.; William Burbeck, S. G. W.; William Hoskins, Grand Secretary.

The seal of this lodge, suggested by Benjamin Franklin, was made of 13 links around the square and compass and connected at the top by clasped hands. American Union moved with the Colonial Army, meeting in New York, August 13, 1776, and in the battle of Long Island two weeks later its master was taken prisoner and several of its members killed. When it convened on its third anniversary, in Connecticut, Samuel H. Parsons was elected master and June 24, 1779, at the Robinson House on the Hudson it was visited by General Washington, and again at Morristown, New Jersey, December following. Captain Heart was chosen master in 1780 and after the lodge ceased work in the army he held the charter, still having it with him when he was given charge of the garrison at Fort Harmar in 1790 and on June 28th at the Campus Martius, with this charter as authority the lodge was reorganized, being the first Masonic lodge in the Northwest Territory: Present, Jonathan Heart, W. M.; W. Benj. Tupper, S. W.; Rufus Putnam, J. W.; Thomas Stanley, William Burnham, Griffin Greene, William Mills, Robert Oliver, William Stacy. August 2, 1790, it was visited by Major Dougherty, who after erecting Fort Harmar had built Fort Washington at Cincinnati and was now on his way east. Master Heart was killed at St. Clair's defeat, November 4, 1791.

The Massachusetts Grand Lodge was informed of all proceedings and a letter from Moses M. Hayes, G. M., December 6, 1791, confirmed the warrant as follows: "The brethren of the Grand Lodge, duly impressed with affectionate and benevolent expressions in your address, commend the same, and are pleased with your laudable undertaking. Your warrant is without doubt a perfect and a good one and in full operation until a grand lodge is founded in your territory when it will become your duty to surrender it and be re-chartered." On the night of March 24, 1801, the house used for a lodge burned, and this charter was probably destroyed by fire, with all jewels, etc. The members again applied to Massachusetts for authority to work and were granted a duplicate charter by which all rights were re-affirmed, by the Grand Lodge of Massachusetts; to Daniel Story, W. M.; Ebenezer Sproat, S. W.; Ichabod Nye, J. W.; of said American Union Lodge. This was signed by Isaiah Thomas, G. M.; Simeon West, D. G. M. For some years 1802-10, meetings were held in the little Ohio Company office.

After a Masonic grand lodge had been formed in Ohio, that body asked the Marietta lodge to secure a new charter, but some of the brethren contended that American Union still had the right to work under the Massachusetts charter. The Grand Lodge of Ohio thought differently and threatened to proclaim the Mariettians as clandestine Masons. The matter was compromised by American Union retaining its name and number but accepting a re-charter from Ohio, January 5, 1816. Lack of space forbids our giving its long list of past masters, many of whom have been prominent men. George T. Hovey, who was first elected master in 1862, and with four years omission served until 1882, was longest in the chair and conferred the degrees on over 150 candidates. This lodge celebrated its centennial June 24, 1876, when 5,000 visitors came to Marietta. Seats were placed on the college grounds for 3,000 and tables in the park to set 1,000 at a time. Charles Woodward, Grand Master of Ohio, was present, Richard Vaux, Grand Master of Pennsylvania, delivered the oration and many other prominent Masons were present.

The present membership is 134. The lodge owns the hall at the northeast corner of Front and Butler streets, meeting each Monday that occurs on or before the full moon.

Washington Lodge was also chartered by the Massachusetts Grand Lodge to work in the patriot army, one by North Carolina, and six by the Pennsylvania Grand Lodge, but American Union No. 1 is the only one still in existence that was chartered in the Colonial Army.

American Union Chapter, No. 1, R. A. M., was organized in Marietta June 6, 1792, and has had practically the same experience as that given for the blue lodge heretofore enumerated. Its charter was burned in the same fire and it was re-chartered by the Grand Chapter, January, 1804. Its present charter is dated October 24, 1816. Its first officers were: James T. Willard, H. P.; David Trowbridge, K.; William Skinner, S.; Levi Barber, Augustus and Sardine Stone, Anaximander Warner, Oliver Dodge, Peter Howe, and Samuel Hoiet. The membership is about 165. It meets the second Friday of each month at Nos. 133 and 135 Putnam street.

Harmar Lodge, No. 390, F. & A. M., held its first meeting June 8, 1867, and was chartered October 16th, following, with 13 members. The first officers were Elijah Locker, W. M.; A. S. Curtis, S. W.; S. H. Tidd, J. W.; T. J. Pattin, treasurer; W. H. Smith secretary.

Marietta Commandery, No. 50, K. T., was chartered September 24, 1891. Its present membership is about 125. Meetings are held on the first Friday of each month at Nos. 133 and 135 Putnam street.

Marietta Council, No. 73, R. & S. M., was chartered September 26, 1893, with C. R. Stevens first T. I. M. It meets on the fourth Friday of each month, at Nos. 133 and 135 Putnam street.

Eastern Star Chapter, No. 59, was organized in 1896, with about 20 charter members, and now numbers 120. Meetings are held on the second and fourth Tuesdays of each month at the Masonic rooms.

Marietta Lodge, No. 67, I. O. O. F., was instituted August 29, 1846, by John Brough, later Governor of Ohio, with J. P. Beach first N. G.; W. N. Marsh, V. G.; W. F. Curtis, secretary; Owen Franks, treasurer. More than 500 have been initiated into the lodge. The present membership is about 80. Regular meetings are held every Monday night.

Harmar Lodge, No. 115, I. O. O. F., was instituted August 5, 1848, the petitioners having been William Mansfield, William H. Widger, William C. Olney, L. E. W. Warner and Joseph Humbold. Ten were initiated the first night and some 400 since. The present membership is 125. About 1862 Harmar Lodge purchased from the Sons of Malta the building now used by No. 2 Fire Department which served as a lodge home until the present fine three-story brick Odd Fellows' Hall was put up in 1894, which with lot cost about $5,500. It is located at the corner of Maple street and Gilman avenue. The first floor is used as a store. The lodge meets every Tuesday evening.

Elkaye Encampment, No. 99, I. O. O. F., was organized June 11, 1867, with 14 charter members; P. Emrich was C. P.; J. Miller, S. W.; J. G. Fields, S. It meets in Guttenburg Hall the first and third Fridays of each month.

J. E. McCoy Rebekah Assembly, No. 230, I. O. O. F., was organized about 1885. It meets at No. 115, Odd Fellows' Hall on the second and fourth Fridays of each month.

Augusta Rebekah Lodge, No. 272, I. O. O. F., was instituted July 13, 1889, with 15 members. It meets on the second and fourth Fridays of each month at Guttenburg Hall.

Manhattan Tribe, No. 35, I. O. R. M., was established January 27, 1868, and chartered July following. Henry Bohl was the first sachem. The Tribe meets every Tuesday at the Red Men's Hall in the Hagan Block.

Raynald Lodge, No. 82, K. of P., was organized May 27, 1875, with 18 charter members; J. C. Folger, first C. C.

Pioneer City Lodge, No. 43, K. of P. (colored), was organized May 10, 1898, with 30 charter members. Meetings are held every Monday evening.

Muskingum Council, No. 40, Jr. O. U. A. M.—The Junior Order, a patriotic organization, was started about the time of the Civil War. The Muskingum Council was established in June, 1889, with 18 charter members. Henry Posey was the first councilor. It meets every Monday night.

Mound Tent, No. 322, K. O. T. M., was formed at Marietta, in May, 1896, with 12 charter members, and at present numbers about 200. It meets every Thursday evening.

The Ladies of the Maccabees was organized in 1892 at Port Huron, Michigan. On January 1, 1900, the membership was 56-267. The Hive at Marietta was organized in March, 1897, with 25 charter members. It meets the second and fourth Tuesdays of each month.

Marietta Camp, No. 4138, M. W. of A., was organized August 21, 1896, with 15 charter members. The object of the order is fraternal insurance. The Camp meets the first and third Fridays of each month.

American Insurance Union was organized at Columbus in 1894. On January 1, 1900, it had 6,080 members. The Marietta Union was organized November 17, '99. It meets the last Friday of the month.

The Elks Lodge, No. 477, B. P. O. E., was organized April 27, 1899, and in one year had erected the fine building now standing facing the Park. The Home with lot, fully equipped electric light plant and other fixtures, invoices about $30,000, and is a lasting credit to its enterprising builders. Regular meetings are held at the Home every Monday evening. The general objects of the order are charity, justice, brotherly love and fidelity.

The Pathfinders is a modern, fraternal insurance order, organized at Akron, Ohio, in 1898, and on December 31, 1899, reported 5,923 members. The lodge at Marietta was organized September 13, 1899, with 44 members. It meets the second and fourth Mondays of each month.

Marietta Council, K. of C., No. 478.—The Knights of Columbus, a beneficiary society composed of Catholics, was organized at New Haven, Connecticut, in 1882, having a membership, January 1, 1900, of 26,336. Marietta Council was organized January 28, 1900, and has a good membership. It meets the first and third Wednesdays of each month.

The American Order of United Workmen, which was organized back in the "seventies," and has 16 members, meets at the call of the master workman.

The Royal Arcanum was organized at Boston, Massachusetts, in 1877. On January 1, 1900, it had 193,868 members. Marietta Council, No. 1544, was instituted December 11, 1893. It meets on the second and fourth Thursdays of each month at No. 67 Odd Fellows' Hall.

Buell Post, No. 178, G. A. R., was organized at Marietta in December, 1881, with 25 charter members. It meets the first and third Thursdays of each month.

C. B. Gates Post No. 468, G. A. R., was organized in 1884, with 20 charter members. It meets alternate Saturdays at Fairview Heights.

Buell Women's Relief Corps, No. 70, was organized in 1885. Its object is to aid the G. A. R. and to assist such old soldiers as need help, their widows and orphans. It meets at Buell Post Hall the first and third Tuesdays of each month.

C. B. Gates Women's Relief Corps, No. 186, was first organized in 1884, being named after Charles Beman Gates, a young lad killed while in the service of Com. Huggins. Mrs. S. H. Putnam was the first president and served until 1890. The Corps was reorganized in April, 1892, and has been quite prosperous and done much relief work. It meets the first and third Fridays of each month.

Daves Camp, No. 509, Sons of Veterans, was organized August 23, 1899, with 29 charter members. Its object is to perpetuate the honor and memory of what their fathers fought for. It meets every Monday evening.

CIVIC AND INDUSTRIAL SOCIETIES.

Marietta Council, No. 32, United Commercial Travelers, was organized in 1893.

Knights of Labor, Local Assembly, No. 265, was organized in 1886. It meets every Monday.

Trades and Labor Council was organized in 1890. It meets the second and fourth Fridays of each month.

Brotherhood of Railroad Trainmen, Lodge No. 504, was organized November 4, 1894. It meets the first and third Sundays of each month.

Brotherhood of Locomotive Firemen, Muskingum Lodge, No. 144, was organized in April, 1896. It meets the first and third Sundays of each month.

International Association of Bricklayers, No. 26, was organized in October, 1897. It meets every Thursday.

American Flint Glass Workers' Union, No. 40, was organized October 15, 1898. It meets on the first and third Saturdays of each month.

Retail Clerks International Protective Association, No. 398, was organized March 22, 1899. It meets on the second and fourth Fridays of each month.

Laborers' International Protective Union, No. 8336, was chartered May 5, 1899. It meets on the second and fourth Wednesdays of each month.

The Marietta Improvement Society was organized in the spring of 1898, its object being to encourage such improvements as tend to promote the health and beauty of the place.

The Marietta Band was organized about 1884. The number of pieces has varied from time to time and at present it has 21, being the best musical organization in Southeastern Ohio. The history of the Marietta Orchestra is identical with that of the band as most of members belong to both organizations.

Marietta Guards, O. N. G., were mustered into the State Guards on April 19, 1900, as Company B of the Seventh Separate Battalion, with 65 men.

The Board of Trade was the leading spirit to advocate many of the various improvements that have been put in operation within the past decade. It has also been the means of locating several manufacturing plants here and of keeping some firms that thought of leaving Marietta. In its membership today are found about 175 names, many of whom are among our most progressive citizens and from the start it has had the influence of Marietta's best brain workers. J. H. Grafton was its first president and B. F. Strecker, the first secretary.

REPORT TO THE MINISTERIAL TRUSTEES.

The following report presented to the "Ministerial Trustees," of Marietta township (Dr. George O. Hildreth, J. P. Ward and W. A. Patterson) October 7, 1901, shows the number of church members over 12 years of age who reside within the township. In the distribution of the "Ministerial Fund," members who do not reside in the township are, according to law, not to be counted.

The total amount distributed in 1901 was $728.70—about 15 cents for each member.

BAPTIST CHURCHES.

The First Baptist Church of Marietta

Was organized on the 5th day of September, 1818, under the name of "The First Baptist Church in Marietta Township." The first record on the Church Book reads thus: "On Saturday, the 5th day of September, A. D. 1818, we, Ephraim Emerson, William Churchill, John Thorniley, Bain Posey and Mary Case, met in the easterly part of Marietta, and formed ourselves into a church by subscribing to the following articles of Faith and Covenant."

Then follow articles and covenant, signed with the above five names present at the first meeting, together with Simon Merwin, Phebe Merwin and Anna Burnham, who became members in October following. Then follow the rules of the order, and the next record is on the day following, September 6:

"On the Lord's Day, September 6th, 1818, we received the right hand of fellowship of the Baptist Church of Christ in Parkersburgh, Va., at which time Elder McAboy preached and broke bread to the church."

Ephraim Emerson and William Churchill were the first deacons—chosen October 3d, 1818.

For a number of years the membership was scattered over a good deal of territory, along the Ohio on both sides, along the Muskingums, &c., from Newport to Cat's Creek; and, as the church had no house of worship, its meetings were held in the houses of members, "in the school house at the mouth of the Little Muskingum," "in the school house up the Little Muskingum," "in the meeting house below the mouth of the Little Muskingum," at Lower and Upper Newport, "in the Dye Settlement," and at Cat's Creek.

In Marietta for some time there were few members; and, though a center of territory, no meeting was held here for several years after the constitution of the church.

The first record of a church meeting in town is dated May 24, 1823, Caleb Emerson and wife and others having become members. After that, meetings were quite frequent in town, generally for some time, at the house of C. Emerson.

In the meantime, and subsequently, the membership continued to increase in all the branches, and the several branches were acquiring sufficient strength and numbers for separate and distinct churches.

The first pastor, as we have seen, was Rev. James McAboy, who began his labors for the church with its first origin—preached the first sermon, and administered the first communion. During his connection with the church there were frequent accessions, by letter and by baptism; and the number of members was greatly increased. He was the pastor for seven years. On the 10th of November, 1825, he tendered his resignation, which was accepted with expressions of gratitude and affection, through a committee of the church.

At the same meeting an invitation was given to Rev. Jeremiah Hale, who had already been laboring successfully within the territory occupied by the church, to assume the pastoral charge. He accepted the call and sustained the relation until his death. He was a man of fervent spirit, devoted indefatigably to his work; and his labors were greatly blessed in each branch of the church, as well as in other places where he preached, on both sides of the Ohio. During his ministry the church was in an almost continual state of revival. He was pastor for about six years, and died on the 4th of September, 1831, in Danvers, Massachusetts, his native place, whither he had gone on account of his waning health.

Soon after this sad event, Rev. Alfred Dana was chosen pastor. He served for about two years, during which period quite a number were added to the church.

The name of Rev. Allen Darrow appears first in the minutes, under date of January, 18, 1834. He took up his residence in Marietta, and commenced preaching here regularly. On the 22d of February, following the last date, it was "Resolved, That it was expedient to hold church meetings here [in Marietta] as a branch of the Marietta Church, once in every month."

Rev. Mr. Darrow, having accepted the pastoral charge, applied himself to the interest of the church with characteristic energy and activity. At first the meetings were held "in the old," and "in the new Court House," "in the Library Hall," &c. But a building committee was, soon after, appointed, and measures taken to erect a house of worship. And by the persevering efforts of the pastor, the house on Church street was finished, and opened for worship in April, 1836. That house the church occupied until it was destroyed by fire in 1855. The present edifice on Putnam street, which was already in process of erection when the other was burned, was occupied in the same year.

Rev. Mr. Darrow resigned at the annual meeting, December 30, 1837, when the Newport Church was constituted, and took charge of that church. His faithful labors at Marietta, at Newport, and throughout the wide field, were owned by the Master. Large accessions, especially at Newport, were made to the membership.

During the year 1837 letters of dismission to members applying were voted for forming out of the membership three new churches, Little Muskingum, Newport, and one in Wood County, Virginia. The Cat's Creek branch had been dismissed, on application, to form the Adams Church, in 1832.

Rev. Hiram Gear, the next pastor, was chosen by the church in January, 1838. From that time the church enjoyed regular preaching every Lord's Day. Under his faithful labors and judicious conduct, the church prospered, and was increased in numbers and influence, and was instructed and confirmed in the doctrines of the Gospel. No minister was ever more beloved by his people; and by his kind temper, his friendly manner and his Christian deportment in all his intercourse, he won the favor of all the citizens. He died on the 20th of February, 1843. A monument standing in the cemetery, erected by the citizens, testifies to their regard for him.

He was succeeded by Rev. Eber Crane, who ministered faithfully to the church a little over a year, and resigned August 7, 1844.

On the 16th of October, 1844, Rev. Ira Corwin was called to the pastoral charge. He labored successfully with the church for over eight years. During the whole period the church was edified, and at peace, and enjoyed a good degree of spiritual prosperity, and was steadily increased in its numbers. His resignation was reluctantly accepted; not until a committee had asked him to withdraw it, December 8, 1852. Under his pastorate a Young People's meeting was organized, which has existed ever since. It is now in the form of a Christian Endeavor Society.

In the next September the church obtained the services of Rev. J. P. Agenbroad. He was ordained by a council called by the Marietta Church, and held his first pastorate here. He preached with acceptance to the church for about two years, when he thought proper to resign.

Rev. L. G. Leonard entered upon the pastorate in September, 1855. Tokens of refreshing attended immediately upon his ministry; and during the following winter occurred the great revival of 1856, the greatest the church had ever enjoyed, and, indeed, that Marietta had ever witnessed. Its influence was felt all through the community; converts were multiplied; and the blessed results will be seen, in their full extent, only in eternity. By his devotion and faithfulness to his charge, he gained the hearts of all his people; and by his gentleness and affability of a Christian spirit, he won the confidence and esteem of "those without." He sustained his relation to the church for nearly eight years, and resigned on the 15th of May, 1863.

During his pastorate the church enjoyed uninterrupted prosperity. Some of its most efficient members were brought in; and the membership was more than doubled; and the church took a new position, with greatly increased influence in the community.

Rev. I. N. Carman became pastor in 1864. He remained with the church until 1868, when he resigned on account of ill health. Mr. Carman was a very successful pastor and a preacher of much ability. His ministry was one full of good fruits. He was highly esteemed by the community, as well as by the church.

Rev. J. D. Griebel succeeded in a brief ministry of a little over a year.

Rev. Marsena Stone, D. D., began his pastorate December 1, 1869, and continued with the church for four years. Dr. Stone was an able man. As a preacher he was logical and clear to a marked degree. In 1873 he resigned to enter upon the work of "Freedman Education" in training ministers.

Rev. J. W. Riddle became pastor in 1874. In February of that year he was ordained by a council called by the church. Under his ministry of five years there were many accessions to the church.

Rev. George R. Gear, D. D., was ordained by a church council in March, 1879. He began to supply the church in the fall of 1878, but did not formally enter upon the pastorate until May 1, 1870. His pastorate was over a church in which his whole life had been spent. He continued for upward of 20 years. There were many seasons of notable revivals. There were 235 accessions by baptism during the pastorate. Some $1,800 was spent in church repairs. Dr. Gear closed his pastorate July 1, 1899.

Rev. L. Kirtley, D. D., became pastor in November, 1899, and still occupies that position. His pastorate has been eminently successful. The congregations are large, and the membership of the church has increased by baptism and by letter, until now it numbers considerably over 500. Recently there has been erected a fine chapel in Norwood, at an expense of some $2,500.

Out of the five members who constituted the first church have grown six churches, and the original five constituent members have increased more than one hundred fold in the Marietta Church alone.

The Baptist Chapel at Norwood.

On Sunday, July 27, 1902, the new Baptist Chapel in Norwood was formally dedicated under the auspices of the mother church, of which Rev. L. Kirtley is pastor. The completion of the building, which Sunday's service signalized, is the outcome of the zeal of the Norwood Bible School.

The new chapel is located on the corner of Poplar and Oakwood avenues, is brick veneered, 35 by 50 feet in size and will seat 350 people. The furnishings are in light wood, and the ceilings of steel, the interior of the building being light and cheerful and exceedingly tasteful. It can be divided into two rooms, for Sunday-school use, the larger of the two being made 35 feet square, while the smaller room is to be used for the primary department.

Like all things else in this life, the Norwood Bible School had a beginning. This beginning assumed tangible form November 11, 1900, and has now passed into history, which if chronicled in detail would read something like this: "On Sunday afternoon, November 11, A. D. 1900, a company of seventy-four persons met in what is known as the Fultonburg school house in the easterly end of the city of Marietta, Ohio, for the purpose of organizing a Bible school. Some of these were earnest Christian men and women from the First Baptist Church in the city; others were representatives from the homes in the immediate vicinity of the school house. Harry Cogswell was chosen superintendent; H. D. Babson, assistant superintendent; Miss Emma Wilson, secretary; Miss Elizabeth Johnson, superintendent of the primary department; Miss Bernice Mason was put in charge of the junior department, and of the music; and after a few Sundays Enoch Johnson was secured as teacher of the Bible class. Great interest was manifested in the school and the attendance increased until on Sunday afternoon, December 9, the school numbered 115."

SKETCH OF THE HISTORY OF THE MARIETTA ASSOCIATION
FROM 1825 TO 1900.

(By George R. Gear, D. D.)

There is always a great interest clustering about the beginnings of any institution that has been to humanity a source of blessing. The beginning of our national life; the beginning of our Constitution; the beginning of the settlement of the great Northwest—we all know how deep is the interest we feel in such events. As Baptist churches, associates together in what is known as Marietta Association, we feel a deep interest in the beginning of our associational history. Having come to the 75th year of our age, it is fitting to glance backward and inquire of the past.

It was in the delightful month of June, 1825, that delegates from six Baptist churches met with the Bristol Church in Morgan County to consider the matter of forming a Baptist Association. What church was it that proposed that meeting? Who were the men and women who took the initiative in the matter?

These questions we cannot answer. Much of interesting history is unwritten. We see clearly effects, but cannot always discern the causes. That there was an association formed at Bristol we know, and the names of the seven churches that constituted the union have come down to us. They were: Zanesville, Marietta, Cambridge, Brookfield, Bristol, Salt Creek, and Salem township (now Adamsville). These churches were young in years. The oldest was Salt Creek, a child of 13 years. Marietta was seven years old; Zanesville, four; Cambridge, two; Brookfield, one. The seven were also weak in numbers. Their combined membership was only 350. But they were strong in faith, and strong in purpose. They were not confined in their sympathies, and not content to be shut up in themselves. They sought fellowship in the work of the Lord. Nor were they content to have that fellowship confined merely to associational bounds. When the Association was less than one year old, a call came for a State gathering of Baptists at Zanesville, at which the Ohio Baptist Convention was organized. At that first meeting three of the new churches were present by delegates, and a fourth, Marietta, had a delegate appointed, who failed to be present only because the day of meeting was mistaken. So practically four of these young churches became constituent members of the new missionary organization. The horizon of responsibility was no narrow one.

Attending the Associations was no easy matter in those early days. The world had no knowledge of such a thing as railroads. On the Ohio there were a few steamboats, but none on the Muskingum, for it was not then a navigable stream. Roads were rough, and out of the beaten lines of travel scarcely more than openings through the woods. Much of the country was a wilderness. Delegates usually came on horseback. Some who were not favored enough to own a horse, and, too poor to hire one, walked, sometimes 50 miles, so eager were they to attend the Association. Those were days when men were not afraid to make sacrifices to be present at the annual gathering. A little more of like interest upon the part of the members of our churches of to-day would much increase the interest in our associational meetings.

The new Association formed at Bristol was called Meigs Creek. This name was given it because Meigs Creek, which rises in the upper part of Morgan County, and empties into the Muskingum near Beverly, was nearly a central line between the churches. Bristol Church was on Meigs Creek. For 46 years the name continued. Like most names it survived many years after it ceased to have any appropriateness. In 1871 the name was changed to Marietta, which it has borne ever since.

There were five ministers present at the organization of the Association: George Sedgwick, William Sedgwick, William Spencer, William Rees and Jeremiah Dale. Long since they all passed to the General Association above. The last one died in 1871. At the 50th anniversary held with the New Harmony Church there was but one survivor of the constituent members—Deacon David Greer, of Brookfield.

The new Association grew rapidly in its earlier years. New churches were added nearly every year, and the boundaries of the Association were considerably enlarged. Woodsfield and Coshocton were among the new churches. In 10 years the original seven churches had become 30, and the membership had increased from 350 to 1,502. The field so widened that in 1839 a division was made and the Wills Creek Association—now Cambridge—was formed. The number of churches was then 39, and 19 of them were dismissed to form the new Association. Other divisions came later, and churches were dismissed to Coshocton and Zanesville associations. Our Association bounds have so narrowed that now we have no churches in Morgan or Muskingum counties, where formerly some of the best churches were found.

The Association originally met on Saturday and continued over the following Monday. Sunday was the great day. Great crowds gathered from every quarter. There was preaching morning, afternoon and evening. Certain evils, however, grew up in connection with the Sunday services, such as led, in 1865, to a change of time. Ever since the meetings have been near the middle of the week. !

The total number of churches that have been connected with the Association from its beginning up to the present time is 89. Many of them have been dismissed to other associations. Several of the number have ceased to exist. One of these is the Bristol Church, where the organization meeting was held. Some of the dead churches have had but a brief life; for example, Belpre reported but one year. We have never gained any permanent foothold in that part of Washington County west of the Muskingum River. At one time there were churches reporting at Wesley, Watertown and Belpre, but all of them seemed to have a feeble life. We have but one small church in the extreme western part of the county, Little Hocking, organized a few years ago. Within the last 25 years Beverly, Bethesda, Corinth, Cow Run and Hockingport have become extinct. We know not all the causes that have brought about this loss. Doubtless in some cases it is due to the decay of the communities, or to the shifting of population. In some cases the church was organized unwisely. Be the cause what it may, it is always a sad thing to be compelled to furl our Baptist flag where once it has waved. Expansion, and not contraction, is the true order of church life.

It would be impossible in the limits assigned to this paper to give anything like a history of the individual churches. Some of them, such as Marietta, Zanesville and McConnellsville, because larger in numbers and stronger financially, and centers of influence, have occupied more prominent parts in associational life. Marietta furnished an efficient moderator in the person of Judge T. W. Ewart, who held that office for a quarter of a century. McConnellsville for nearly an equal period gave us a treasurer in the person of Charles H. Barker. Both of these men have rested from their labors, Brother Barker having survived until January, 1899. Marietta is now the only city church in the Association. It has been a mother of churches, seven others having sprung from it. It is growing in numbers and in influence, and in spiritual power, under its faithful and efficient pastor, Dr. L. Kirtley.

The present number of churches on our associational roll is 28, with a membership of about 1,900.

Sunday-schools were early encouraged. In 1827 a circular letter was written by Rev. William Sedgwick. It contains these words: "The great utility of Sunday-schools very few at the present day doubt. The sweet showers of descending grace on so many Sunday-schools proclaim the approbation of Heaven. We sincerely hope that all will take great pains in forwarding their introduction into every neighborhood." In 1834 the churches were called upon to report their Sunday-school work. Next year Marietta reported 10 schools with 400 scholars. Reports, however, were at first imperfect and incomplete, and were not embodied in the table of statistics until 1843. It was felt that some organization was needed to arouse more general interest in the work. In 1857 a Sabbath School Convention was organized at Zanesville. For many years the convention met the day before the Association. In 1874 the plan of making the Bible school work a department of the work of the Association was adopted. That plan has continued ever since.

There were many efficient Sunday-school workers in those early days. A prince among them was T. W. Ewart, who for 40 years was superintendent of the Marietta Sunday-school. He visited the different churches and neighborhoods, and helped in organizing many new schools. He was full of enthusiasm and energy and was a very efficient talker on Sunday-school topics.

Sunday-school Institutes have been one way of stirring up interest, and promoting greater efficiency in the work. These Institutes have been conducted by a Sunday-school Board appointed by the Association. They have been in the past very helpful. At many of these Institutes very efficient aid was given by the State Missionary Secretary, Charles Rhoads, appointed by the Publication Society.

Marietta Association has always had an active interest in every form of mission work. I have already alluded to the fact that when the Association was less than a year old a ma-majority of the churches forming it had a part in the organization of the Ohio Baptist Convention, whose object was to promote missions in the State. In 1827 resolutions were adopted recommending foreign missions, especially the work in Burmah and among the Chinese in Siam. Five years later Rev. Allen Darrow carried to the Triennial Missionary Convention, meeting in New York, an offering of $100, of which $50 was from Marietta Baptist Association. He traveled in his own carriage, which was then the only way of communication. The journey occupied two weeks. Mr. Darrow handed the money to the president of the Convention, Dr. Herman Lincoln, in a $100 bill. Dr. Lincoln waved the note before the audience, exclaiming: "This is the first sheaf from Ohio." Thank God that first sheaf proved the forerunner of many bountiful harvests for missions in this Ohio field.

The wider fields of mission labor—State, national and foreign, have not been cultivated to the neglect of associational needs. At different periods there have been special efforts to assist and build up the weaker churches. In 1855 Rev. J. H. Barker was appointed Associational Missionary at a salary of $500, of which $200 was contributed by the other churches. In 1880 Rev. J. L. Wyly was appointed a missionary in co-operation with the State Convention. Such special missionary work has alternated with the plan of giving assistance to individual churches in the support of a pastor. The latter plan has been the more common one. The average yearly amount spent for associational missions from 1855 to 1875 was $235. Since 1877 the average amount has been nearly $150. The aggregate sum spent in 43 years is $9,717.

The question may be asked, "What are the results? What have we to show for this large expenditure?" It may be truthfully said that we cannot know all the results. There is history of this work that is written only in the Lamb's Book of Life. How many souls have been led to Christ? How many brethren have been cheered and encouraged and helped to a better life no one can tell. As regards particular churches we may point to Valley and Caldwell as showing part of the permanent results. One thing is certain: No earnest work attempted for Christ's sake ever falls fruitless. Results may not meet our anticipations, but the labor is not in vain.

There is no class of men who have so much to do with shaping associational life as do the ministers of the Gospel. If they are in the main broad-minded, intelligent, self-sacrificing; wise in planning and active in execution; if they be godly in life and discreet in deportment, and unblemished in character; then will the associational life take on many of the same features. Marietta Association has had in its 75 years of history many such ministers. In the early life the name of Jeremiah Dale is one that is remembered because of his remarkably devoted and efficient pioneer work. The two Sedgwicks were men of prominence in early Ohio Baptist history. Allen Darrow is another name remembered for his works' sake. He was a man of much force of character, and of indomitable energy. He was closely associated with my father, Hiram Gear, who died in Marietta in 1843. J. D. Riley was probably longer in point of service than any other pastor in the Association. About 43 years he filled with different pastorates. He was a true servant of Christ and loved to preach His Gospel. Henry Lyons also had a long period of service. Father Pearce was for many years a prominent factor in associational history. Other names of prominence in days past were Hervey Dale, son of Jeremiah Dale, B. Y. Siegfried, L. G. Leonard, J. D. Leonard, S. G. Dawson, first pastor of the Valley Church, and afterward superintendent of State missions, T. C. Johnson, L. B. Moore, W. N. Wyeth, C. H. Gunter, Nathan Crooks, and many others whom there is not time to mention. Of these who long have been connected with our Association, and who survive to the present day are brethren E. W. Daniels and Watson Dana. Brother A. K. McCall has also spent much of his ministerial life in this Association. In the semi-centennial year there were 16 ordained ministers in the Association. Of that number only two are members of the Association to-day, the venerable father William McPeak, and Watson Dana. More than half of the number are dead. One of that 16 was J. S. Covert, who wrote the historical review of the first 50 years. To his carefully prepared paper, printed in the minutes of that year, I am indebted for many of the facts of our early history.

Many laymen have there been who were wise in planning, liberal in gifts, and foremost in every good work. There will readily occur such names as Ephraim Emerson, Caleb Emerson, Joseph Barker, Deacon Ira Hill, Thomas W. Ewart, Luther D. Barker, Charles Barker, W. P. Sprague, Stephen Dana, George W. Dye, John Pool, J. M. Amos, John Miller, and I. K. Adkins.

This is by no means a full list. Others will probably come to the minds of the older ones, who have done good service in years past, as well as many who are still active in every good work.

In 1843 a young man about 18 years of age was present as a delegate from the Zanesville Church. His name was William Ashmore. In 1860, 17 years later, he was again present, but not as a delegate. He was just home from China on a vacation tour. A few months ago some of us had the privilege of hearing this same Dr. Ashmore at the missionary conference in Parkersburg. Doubtless no one expected in 1843 that the young man who sat with them would become so widely famous in connection with the Lord's work in China.

One of the most prominent features of modern church life is the greater activity of the young people in church work. It has doubtless always been true that the younger members of the church have had some share in church activities. But the proportion of children and young people was not so great in our earlier history as it is now. Early conversions were rather the exception. And yet some of the early pastors learned to see wisely in this matter. Rev. Ira Corwin, who was pastor of the Marietta Church from 1844 to 1852, received into the church so many young people that he felt the need of some special service for their development. He organized a Young People's prayer meeting, which has continued in the Marietta Church for about 54 years. The organization of the young people into a Society of Christian Endeavor came much later. Societies of young people were organized in other churches of the Association. The thought of an associational Young People's Union soon engaged attention. In 1891, the young people asked the approval of the Association for such a Union. It was cordially and unanimously given. The Union was organized during the same session at Lower Salem. The name adopted was "The Young People's Union of the Marietta Baptist Association." The first officers were: Fred Fisher, president; Miss Eva Hill, vice-president; J. Ernest Hutchings, secretary and treasurer; Miss Selina Pearce, corresponding secretary. In the Association program of that year a place had been given to the topic "Young People's Societies," which was discussed under three heads: "Their Relation to the Church," by the pastor of the Marietta Church; "What Should Be Their Aim," by the much lamented E. U. Smith; "What Can They Do for Missions?" by Fred Fisher.

The first statistical report appears in the minutes of 1892. There were six societies with a total membership of 252. That the young people felt some special responsibility in the line of missions is shown in their offerings, which amounted to $119. The statistics of 1899 give the present number of societies as nine, with a membership of 356. The mission offerings were $126.

So far the Young People's Societies have proved a valuable feature in church work. It would seem as if they had come to stay. Conducted wisely, they are a great help to the pastor. With right church and pastoral encouragement, oversight and direction, they can do much to help in the cause of Christ.

Organization is the characteristic of the age. It is a day of many societies of all sorts, and for a great variety of purposes. We have seen the young people forming a special associational organization in 1891. It was many years earlier than this that the women of the Association began to band themselves together in mission circles. The importance of the work was early recognized. At the semi-centennial meeting in 1875 there was offered by T. W. Ewart the following resolution, which was unanimously adopted: "We hail the Woman's Missionary Society, the object and work of which has been presented to the Association today, as an important field opened before the women of this Association for usefulness, and cordially recommend the organization, if possible, in each of the churches of this Association of a Woman's Missionary Circle, auxiliary to the Woman's Society of the West." Mrs. Riddle, Mrs. Ewart and Mrs. Stone were appointed a committee to take the matter in charge. In the minutes of 1879, of the meeting held at Lower Salem, appears the first report of circles. McConnellsville, Marietta, Valley and Good Hope reported organizations. The mission offerings of these circles was $62.16. Ever since, women's work for missions has had a place in the associational program and in the statistical tables. The number of women's circles in 1899 was 13. The offerings for home and foreign work amounted to $230.87. Great good has come out of these organizations. They have tended to inspire and make more active the missionary spirit, and to enlarge the offerings. If it be always kept in mind that each circle is but a department of church work, and that its offerings do not take the place of the regular church collection, but only serve to swell it to larger proportions still larger usefulness is in store for the women's circles.

It is a matter of no small importance that a church should have a suitable house of worship. The building should be one large enough to accommodate the people, neat and attractive in its appearance, comfortable in its seating and suited to the locality, and in expensiveness to the ability of the people. Several new church edifices have been built within the past 25 years. Among them are the church buildings at Troy, Little Hocking, Matamoras, Liberty and Lawrence. Other churches have been so remodeled and improved as to be practically new. There has been decided progress along the line of church edifices. As a whole our church buildings are much in advance of what they were 25 years ago. Neat and comfortable houses of worship have taken the place of some very shabby structures.

I have already spoken of the fact that some churches have become nearly or wholly extinct. Some of these churches had houses of worship, which other churches of the Association had helped to build. It was felt that it was important to get possession of these abandoned buildings, and sell them for the benefit of the Association. Accordingly steps were taken in 1884 to secure for the Association articles of incorporation, which would enable it to hold property. The legal steps were announced as complete at the session of 1886, and six trustees were appointed. Under the authority given to them by law three church buildings have come into our possession, and have been sold for the benefit of the Association. These buildings were those belonging to the churches of Beverly, Bethesda and Hockingport. From the money received by the sale of these, considerable contributions have been made to the edifices at Lawrence, Liberty, Little Hocking and Matamoras. So it has come to pass that these abandoned edifices have been moved, as it were, to communities where church life still exists.

St. Mary's Roman Catholic Church.(By Rev. F. M. W. Gorman.)

The early history of Catholicity in Marietta connects itself with the unselfish zeal of the pioneer missionaries of the church, who traveled from place to place, for miles and miles, on horseback, and, wherever they found scattered families of the faith, brought them together and arranged them into missions or small congregations—which served as the foundation of future well organized congregations and churches.

However, before we come to record the connected incidents of the church in Marietta, it is of interest to note the historic fact that the Holy Sacrifice of the Mass was the very first instance of Christian worship ever offered in what now constitutes the oldest city of the Northwest Territory. The French government, which held possession of the Northwest Territory, often sent out troops for the purpose of inspecting and examining their large domain. In the year 1749 Roland Michel Barin, Marquis de la Gallissoniere, governor general of Canada, sent out Celeron de Bienville with 300 men, accompanied by Rev. Father Joseph Peter de Bonnacamp, a Jesuit missionary, as chaplain, on a tour of inspection.

Coming down the river Ohio from Fort Duquesne, they pitched their camp at the confluence of the Ohio and Muskingum rivers, where they also buried a leaden plate, found in 1798. During this journey the chaplain would hold services for the troops and would also preach to the Indians. When successful it was wont to establish an Indian mission. From the records sent to Rome by Father Bonnacamp, it is evident that here also, on August 16, 1749, he offered, in the presence of the troops and the Indians, who had assembled from the neighborhood, the Holy Sacrifice of the Mass.

Long after this event nothing is of record as to the growth of the church until we learn that the early missionaries again offered the Holy Sacrifice of the Mass in the little brick house of one Felix McGuire, on the corner of what is now called Hart and Fifth streets, which served as the place of worship, where the early pioneers gathered. A Father Lee and Russell, as tradition has it, used to come, sometimes by boat, sometimes on horseback, presumably from Wheeling, and instructed the little flock in the faith of their fathers and attended their spiritual wants. It is also of record that in the year 1830 Father Russell, who came from Wheeling, gave a lecture on "The Church," in the Court House. The lecturer drew a large crowd. In those days and long years afterward a Catholic priest was looked upon, by outsiders, as a very strange kind of animal. They used to flock to the boat landing of the Ohio to see him come and go very much like the Indians used to view the first advent of Columbus and his companions, excepting that the Catholic priest was not considered as belonging to the gods or angelic choirs, but rather was supposed to be horned and tailed. To get a glimpse of these appendages was the incentive to the curiosity exhibited. Alas, for the malice of preachers and the stupidity and ignorance of men!

Just prior to 1838, Rt. Rev. John B. Purcell, encouraged and assisted by the co-operation of the few zealous Catholic people of Marietta, bought the present church grounds from Mrs. Mary Brophy, at a very reasonable price—Mrs. Brophy herself being a Catholic. The house which occupied part of the lots (there were two, 180 by 180 feet) had been erected by John Brough, father of the war governor (1863) of the State of Ohio. He sold it to Mrs. Brophy, and when it fell into the hands of the then Bishop of Cincinnati, he placed Patrick Waters in charge of the property. By him the building was used as a grocery store. Being a two-story brick building, one room on the second floor was used, at intervals, as a chapel, where the visiting priest said Mass and preached the Word of God to the little Catholic flock of Marietta.

Such was the state of affairs prior to June, 1838. In that year Rev. James McCoffery was made the first resident pastor. He converted the store-room of the building into the first church and occupied the second floor as a parsonage. He remained in charge for 11 years, and besides the little flock at home he attended the widely scattered Catholic people along the shores of the Muskingum River, as far as McConnellsville, and also at Newport on the Ohio, at Fleming, Vincent and Cutler, going north also as far as Cambridge. In the month of October, 1849, he was followed by Rev. Robert I. Lawrence, who remained until April, 1850.

Rev. Peter Perry was appointed pastor and took charge, in the month of April, 1850. By this time, in consequence of the Muskingum River improvement, many additional Catholic people came to Marietta, and the necessity of a larger and more commodious church became the problem that presented itself for solution. Hugh Brennan and John Burke—the uncle of D. B. Torpy—interested themselves very much to the end of erecting a new church. Under the leadership of Father Perry, the new church was begun.

At that time, however, the agitation was commenced to change the location. The objection then, as now, was that the church would be too near the river and in a district where the floods would inevitably reach it. The contest grew warm—many contending that the church should be built farther up the street—nearer to the cemetery, which had been located at the other and upper end of Fourth street. Under the leadership of Hugh Brennan, who from selfish motives wished to retain the present locality, he having a grocery and saloon near by, on Greene street, Rt. Rev. John B. Purcell was prevailed upon to decide in favor of the first chosen church location. The fear of a flood accounts for the height of the church floor from the street level. The year 1884, however, the flood rose above the altar table.

The church was begun in 1850, and after three years completed. The greatest amount subscribed by any one individual was $100, and that amount was given by but three persons, i. e., Father Perry, Hugh Brennan and John Burke.

What may be of interest to state is the fact that the clay out of which the bricks for the new building were made, was taken from an old Indian mound—supposed to be an old prehistoric fortification, situated about where now passes Sacra Via street.

Rev. Peter Perry remained in charge for five years. Owing to the poverty of the individual members of his flock, he was unable to meet the total indebtedness incurred and hence, when in September, 1855, he was succeeded by Rev. R. P. O'Neil, the church debt of some few thousand dollars was one of the heavy burdens with which the new pastor had to contend. The new building, as yet unfurnished, had cost something like seven or eight thousand dollars—four of which had been paid. Father O'Neil, however, bravely faced his new duties and it is during his short administration that we find the first attempt made to commence a parochial school. A school society was established, the members of which paid a monthly fee of 25 cents, which, placed in the treasury, was the beginning of a school fund and served afterward as a little foundation on which a parochial school was built and maintained for a few years.

Father O'Neil was succeeded in the pastoral charge of St. Mary's Church by Rev. R. B. Hardy, April, 1856, and he remained only a year, was succeeded in March, 1857, by Rev. O. A. Walker.

Father Walker had temporarily severed his connection with the Dominicans, owing to the filial duty that devolved solely upon him to support his aged father and mother. Accompanied by his parents, he took possession of the old grocery building, which had served its time as both church and parsonage, and used the second floor as a parsonage. The first floor—the old storeroom—the first chapel—he immediately converted into a school room.

This, then, is the first attempt, carried out successfully, toward the maintenance of a parochial school.

The action taken was as commendable as it was necessary. John Sheridan, a brother of Gen. Phil Sheridan, was engaged as teacher and served in that capacity for a very meagre salary—$15 per month—for several years. In the meanwhile the thought of converting part of the church basement into a school room was ripening. The year 1858 saw the change effected. The basement of the church was partitioned off and the school was continued under the new arrangement. John Sheridan was followed as teacher by Miss Elizabeth Griffin; she in turn by Mrs. C. H. Bukey; who was succeeded by Miss Rose Minor.

The school did not give entire satisfaction and during its lease of life of about five years—from 1857 to 1862—was continually struggling for its very existence. The pastor in charge, Father Walker, did his utmost to bring the school up to the necessary standard of excellence, but being continually hampered by a want of proper assistance, on the part of his flock, unable in consequence to pay a teacher the proper salary and, above all, his care mostly taxed for the purpose of liquidating the church debt, it is not at all to be wondered at that, when the Civil War distracted the country, the increasing difficulties soon determined the fate of the first brave effort in behalf of Christian education.

In the meanwhile Father Walker had the old church (parsonage) school building taken down and used, as much as feasible, the old material in the construction of the present parsonage. He placed the new parsonage in the rear of the lot so as to make the pastor's entrance to the church direct from the house, in immediate connection with the church building. The church debt was now paid, the elegant center altar procured, a school attempted and, against mountainous difficulties, carried on for five years, the new parsonage erected and completed—when in June, 1862, Father Walker was succeeded by Rev. J. D. Ryan.

During the latter's administration the church building was condemned as no longer safe for public meetings. The increasing weight of the shingle roof began to spread the walls outward, and hence, for some time, while the necessary repairs were being made, church services were held in the Court House. At this time the agitation for a new location, out of reach of high water, again forced itself to the front. Not understanding the principle that "present sacrifice secures future enjoyment," the majority of the congregation contented themselves with doing only what, at that very moment, was absolutely necessary, and repaired the church by tying the walls with iron "hog chains," and by supporting the roof with two rows of pillars.

Father Ryan was the first resident pastor who died in the parsonage. The sad event occurred in the month of August, 1870. The body of the beloved pastor was buried in the Catholic Cemetery of Sidney, Ohio. His parents had made Sidney their home and, in accordance with their wishes, the remains were placed in the family burial lot of the cemetery at that place.

Rev. Charles F. Shelhamer became pastor on the demise of Father Ryan and continued the administration for five years, i. e., from August, 1870, to November, 1875. During his incumbency, the church was handsomely frescoed and stained glass windows replaced those of the ordinary glass. Father P. Thurheimer succeeded Father Shelhamer in the administration of affairs and during his pastorship of three years (November, 1875, to September, 1878) he tried his utmost to revive the parochial school. He realized very keenly the necessity of such a school, but the apathy of the church members checked every effort made in that direction. In September, 1878, Father F. J. Campbell was appointed pastor of the church and he, too, at the earnest injunction of the then Bishop Rosecrans—the first bishop of the Columbus diocese, which had been established in March, 1868—endeavored to resurrect the parochial school. The same apathy, the same indifference that made every zealous effort of his predecessors abortive, in that direction, prevailed again on this occasion. Discouraged, he asked for and obtained a new charge, and in November, 1879, the next year, was succeeded by Rev. John B. Kuehn.

The administration of Father Kuehn proved the longest of any in the history of this parish. Taking charge in 1879, he continued to zealously labor in the interest of the flock entrusted to his care until July, 1892, when, after three weeks of serious illness, fortified by the sacraments of the church, he peacefully died. At his own request he was buried in the cemetery of his bereaved flock. He had said: "I want to be buried among my people."

During Father Kuehn's administration the church spire was completed, a chime of bells procured, the interior of the church again beautifully frescoed, and, under his paternal guidance, the flock seemed to take a new life and Catholicity, in Marietta, seemed to be rejuvenated, breathing forth its spirit of pristine vigor.

Father Kuehn was succeeded by Rev. F. M. Woesman. He found also, shortly after his advent, the absolute necessity of establishing a parochial school. The catechism hour of a Sunday, the meager and irregular attendance, on the part of the children, seemed to him to be far from sufficient to meet satisfactorily the urgent needs of a moral training, which constitutes the sacred right of the little ones of the flock. To insure the future spiritual well-being of the flock, to fix the influence of the church on a more permanent basis, to properly meet the demands of the rights of "the little ones," the establishment of a school for Christian education long, long ago has proved itself one of the most essential adjuncts to attain the end which our Lord has marked out for his church, i. e., the salvation of immortal souls. Encouraged by his Lordship, Rt. Rev. John A. Watterson, Bishop of Columbus, who on the occasion of his visit to Marietta on May 19, 1895, earnestly advocated the design of the pastor of erecting a parochial school,—the rector immediately took the initiative and on June 14th of the same year the first step toward carrying out the long projected design was taken. Though, at first, the members of the congregation seemed to be in a hesitating mood, as to helping on the work, this apathy was soon pushed aside by the earnestness displayed and the great majority generously assisted with their monied contributions. As nearly everywhere, so also here, there were a few who on other occasions were loudest in their professed zeal, for the spiritual advancement of God's church, on this occasion became not only eloquently dumb in encouraging the work as it was progressing, but were suddenly stricken by imaginary dire poverty and contributed nothing or very little toward the great object in view. But this did not impede the work in the least, and it is confidently asserted that the shirkers in the ranks did not enrich themselves by deserting the standard of duty. "God always blesses the cheerful giver and is not to be outdone in generosity."

It is also worthy of record to state, that, on this occasion also, as several times before, in the history of the parish, a futile effort was made to change the locality of the church edifice—to seek a more central location—out of the reach of future probable floods. In fact an option was secured on a piece of property situated on the corner of Fifth and White streets, above Putnam. It could have been purchased for $5,000. Rt. Rev. John A. Watterson approved of the project of erecting a temporary church and school combination building on the newly selected site, but the outlay of probably $20,000 deterred the people from entertaining the project. They had occasion, however, soon to regret their shortsightedness, when, on March 28, 1898, three years after their school building had been completed, the Ohio and Muskingum rivers rushed out of their banks and the water rose to the height of four feet and a half above the first floor of the new building.

The new parochial school edifice was erected in the year 1895 and dedicated by Rt. Rev. Bishop John A. Watterson, September 6, 1896. On the occasion of the dedication, the Buell G. A. R. Post and Knights of St. George presented the school with "the flag of the stars and stripes." The beautiful parade that preceded the dedicating ceremonies was headed by a platoon of the city police. They had just received their new uniform and for the first time in the history of the town, its police graced a public parade with their presence. The then acting mayor was said to be conveniently indisposed and did not honor the occasion with his presence. Such events, however, sometimes occur and in small places are expected.

The white-robed nuns of St. Dominic were invited to take charge of the school. It opened September 7, 1896, with three class rooms, preparatory to fitting the pupils for a high school course. Sister Frances Lilly was the superioress of the little band of five Sisters who inaugurated this new venture, in the interest of Christian education.

Associated with the Superior were Sister M. Austin (Rush), Sister Constance (Keely), Sister Isidore (Bennett) and the housekeeper, Sister Augustine (Lawlor).

Sister M. Austin became the prefect of the school and it is owing to her ability and unselfish zeal, next to the blessing of God, that the new undertaking is thus far crowned with success. She succeeded Sister Frances Lilly as superior of the community, and for the last three years, acting in that capacity, besides continually advancing the interest of the High School Department in particular and the entire school in general, she has displayed an executive ability of no inferior order.

From the very outset, the school proved a most decided success and at this writing counts an attendance of more than 200 pupils, with four class teachers, two music teachers and one art teacher. The blessing of God surely rests upon this undertaking.

The new parochial school building was enlarged two years after its erection as to the convent part, giving an additional large dormitory and four additional music rooms, bringing the financial outlay of the structure to nearly $10,000. Since then, however, the congregation has finally taken the first step toward procuring a new church site, by the purchase of the "Putnam Hall" property. It is the most central location to be found in Marietta for a Catholic Church. It is unsurpassed for the beauty of its location and it comprises a tract of land 180 feet square. It is situated on the Northeast corner of Fourth and Wooster streets. The price paid is $15,750, and was bought from Fidelio S. Henry.

This closes the little sketch in these school annals. May God bless his church and shower down his benediction upon this portion of his flock, so that Marietta may indeed worthily bear the name of Mary, the mother of Jesus Christ, Our Lord and God.

Note:—There is a large Catholic church at Churchtown, St. John's; Ave Maria, not far from Lowell; St. Ambrose at Vincent; and a chapel at Belpre.

The Central Christian Church

Purchased the house of worship on Fourth street, formerly occupied by the Presbyterians. This building was badly damaged by the tornado which passed over Marietta in the summer of 1902, and for the present the congregation is meeting in the new Presbyterian Church on Sunday afternoon. The pastor of the Central Christian Church also ministers to a congregation at Reno.

The Christian Union Church.

Among the smaller church organizations in Marietta, the Christian Union Church, located near Mile Run on the west side, contributes in a large degree to the active religious work accomplished in the city. Work was begun by this congregation first as a mission, and under the pastorate of Rev. Mr. Ridsen, a large number of spirited revivals were held, giving great encouragement for the organization of the church.

The organization was accomplished in 1895, and work was begun on a church edifice. The present church building is a neat and attractive frame structure, and is a great credit to the members, through whose unaided efforts the necessary funds were raised.

The church society is non-denominational, and is accomplishing a vast amount of good in the locality in which it is situated. Connected with the church is a well organized Sabbath-school which is in a very flourishing condition.

CONGREGATIONAL CHURCHES.

The First Congregational Church of Marietta.

(From a sermon by the present pastor, Dr. J. R. Nichols.)

The pioneers, whose advance guard floated down the Ohio and landed at the mouth of the Muskingum River, April 7, 1788, were men who took a deep interest in religious and Christian education. The movement which brought them into the Western Country was not distinctively a religious movement, as that earlier one had been, which brought our fathers to Plymouth Rock, but many of them were worthy descendants of noble sires, who had inherited a strong love for the institutions of religion and education, and not a few were men of marked religious life. Among the promoters of the Ohio Company was a prominent New England clergyman, Rev. Manasseh Cutler, LL. D., who visited the colony at Marietta during the first summer and preached to the colonists, although he never became a resident; in the charter of the company, provision was made for the cause of education and religion by setting aside certain sections of land in every township to their support. In coming into this Western world, the pioneers had no idea of leaving behind the institutions whose benefits they had enjoyed in the East, and which had contributed so much to the worth of the civilization which they hoped to transplant to the valleys of these beautiful rivers. In July, Rev. Daniel Breck, a Congregational clergyman of Topsfield, Massachusetts, visited Marietta, coming either in company with the second deputation, who landed July 13th, or a few days behind them, and on the following Sunday, July 20th, he began public worship in the Northwest Territory, preaching in a "booth" on the banks of the Muskingum, probably nearly opposite this church. Said booth had been erected a few days before for the first Fourth of July celebration. Mr. Breck spent five Sundays in Marietta and it is probable that he conducted religious services on every Sunday. Immediately on his departure, came Rev. Manasseh Cutler, who conducted worship in the Northwest Block-house at the Campus Martius, on the three following Sundays. Being thus well started, services were regularly conducted by laymen for several months, and ever afterward in the brief intervals when the colony was without an ordained clergyman, until the coming of Daniel Story, on March 19, 1789. Until 1797, Mr. Story was in the employ of the Ohio Company and looked to them for his salary, although there is evidence that part of his salary was raised by subscription. December 6, 1796, the church was organized with 31 members, and 16 months later Mr. Story was asked to become the first pastor, although it is probable that he had acted in the capacity of a religious teacher up to this time, since his name appears among the charter members. In the spring of 1797, Mr. Story left Marietta for the East, and it was not until the spring of 1798, nearly a year later, that the matter of salary and other perplexing questions were settled, and Mr. Story accepted the call and was ordained to the gospel ministry in the East, on August 15, 1798, before returning to his Western parish. Rev. Manasseh Cutler had been instructed to act for the church in co-operation with Mr. Story, in calling the ordaining council, which convened in Hamilton, Massachusetts. In April of the following year, two years after the call had been extended by the church, Rev. Mr. Story returned to the young church on the banks of the Muskingum, which had been patiently awaiting the return of their pastor.

Up to this time religious services were held principally in the Northwest Block-house, at Campus Martius, with supplementary services at Munsells' Hall, at "the Point." Sometime in the year 1797, the Muskingum Academy was projected, which building was completed on the lot adjoining this church early in the year 1800, and became the meeting place of the church for public services until the erection of this building, some years later, and for business and devotional meetings until its removal to Second street, in 1832, where it was used as a dwelling house until 1887, when it was torn down and an ancient landmark was destroyed.

As the community grew and the number attending divine worship increased, the old Academy building became too straitened for a meeting place, and plans were under consideration looking toward the building of a church. In the meantime the First Religious Society of Marietta was organized, March 2, 1801, and articles of agreement had been drawn up and signed by 127 male citizens, which is supposed to have comprised nearly every male citizen in Marietta at that time. The Society seems to have been formed to secure the co-operation of all the citizens of the town who were favorable to the maintenance of religious teaching and worship, but who for one reason or another were not members of the church, which had been Congregational in spirit, sympathy and in forms of government and worship from its formation. This Society has continued unto the present day the efficient organ and helper of this church in looking after its material interests, although the membership of the church and Society has been practically identical for many years.

As early as February 7, 1803, a committee was appointed by this Society to report "a plan of meeting house, together with the probable expense thereof." But owing to differences of opinion, which brought divisive influences into the Society this committee never rendered a report, or, if so, it was not recorded. Three years later, in 1806, October 11th, the Society took steps looking toward incorporation by an act of the State Legislature, in order that they might own and control property; and such an act was passed in the following February. At the same meeting, which provided for incorporating the Society, the following resolution was passed: "That Rufus Putnam, Joshua Shipman and Benjamin Ives Gilman be a committee to report a plan of a meeting house for the use of this Society, with an estimate of the expense," and they also provided for a second committee to apply to the trustees managing the lands set apart for religious purposes for such rents as had accrued to the credit of the First Religious Society for the purpose of building a meeting house or houses. Very soon after the act of incorporation was passed, this committee reported to the Society a plan for a meeting house on February 24, 1807.

The scheme for raising funds to build the church was novel. It contemplated raising all moneys either from rents accruing from lands set aside for such purpose or from the sale of pews, and all subscriptions made for the building were to be regarded as a loan to the Society and to draw interest from the time the money was paid. A subscription paper was drawn up and circulated, which bears the names of various well known citizens of that time, stating the amounts they agreed to pay and the commodity in which they would pay, whether lumber, merchandise, leather, shoes, etc. This very interesting and valuable document has been preserved even unto this day. One is led to wonder whether such a scheme was ever adopted for building another church? When sufficient encouragement had been given to guarantee the success of the scheme, work was begun in the summer of 1807; in 1808, the building was enclosed and used for public worship, and in 1809, on May 28th, it was dedicated to the worship of God, amid the praises and rejoicings of the people. A hymn written for the occasion has been preserved.

The church in which we meet, this morning, is essentially the church which was built and dedicated on that May day, 92 years ago. To be sure, it has been repaired many times and somewhat modified in its interior arrangements, and yet this church is in its architecture, structure and general arrangement the church which was planned and erected by the pioneers before the community had completed the second decade of its history. Tradition has credited Rev. Samuel P. Robbins, the second pastor of the church, with the plans after which the church was constructed, but others have claimed, upon what seem to be good grounds, that Gen. Rufus Putnam was the originator of the plans. Henry Shipman, the father of H. B. Shipman, still living in Marietta, was the master builder, and much of the work was done by his own hands. The entire cost of the church, when completed for dedication, was $7,349.0½. The half cent probably indicates the accuracy with which the accounts were kept.

From the best information I am able to gather at this day I conclude that the old high family pew with seats all around, such as were common in New England in an early day, were never in use in this church. The first pews were large rectangular pews with a door opening into the aisle. The original plan of seating was one center aisle extending from the front entrance toward the pulpit with narrower aisles on either side of the church, and a row of pews extending the whole length of the church against either side wall similar in construction to the body pews. Beyond the side doors on either side were a few pews facing the pulpit, standing at right angles to the pews in body of the house. The original pulpit was about on a level with the gallery and was reached by winding stairs from either side. The pulpit was lowered about two feet in 1836, and again in 1866 a platform was erected and the pulpit which has been in use up to the present time was put in. The original columns supporting the gallery and roof were square, covered with wood, somewhat ornamented and painted to give them an attractive appearance. The singers had seats in the west gallery until the second organ was purchased in 1889, when they were removed to the rear of the platform.

FIRST CONGREGATIONAL CHURCH, MARIETTA.

THE OLDEST CHURCH IN THE NORTHWEST TERRITORY.

From the two towers the church early came to be known as the "Two-Horned" church, and it is within the truth to say that there is no building standing in Marietta, or Ohio, or the five States which were carved from the original Northwest Territory, which for nearly a century has been so closely identified with the social, educational and religious interests of the community in which it stands as has this old church. It occupies a position entirely unique.

The fact that the pioneers were so slow in organizing a church and providing a meeting house has called forth surprise and conjecture. There were enough Christians here before the end of the first year to warrant the organization of a church, and this step had been contemplated by some of them before leaving their New England homes, and yet nearly a decade passed before the church was organized. It is also unquestionably true that there was wealth enough to provide for a church building, and people enough to nearly fill it before the beginning of the 19th century, but two decades had passed before this church was dedicated. Other colonies coming later, and which were not so strong either financially or numerically, had organized a church and built a meeting house and so gained a historic prestige which belonged by right to the colony on the Muskingum. But I am persuaded that a careful study of the early records of the church and Society will discover the occasion of this delay in their unwillingness to bring any divisive influence into the community. The pioneers were tolerant to a fault. A large majority of those who were professing Christians had been members of Congregational churches in New England, but they did not desire to force their form of government nor their peculiar beliefs upon those who were not of this way of thinking. The early doctrinal basis of the church was broad and tolerant and simple. The Society was formed to enable all those who could not or did not unite with the church, and who yet believed in the value and importance of religious teaching to unite in supporting public worship and the ordinances of religion; and yet it did not wholly accomplish its purpose, for when it became manifest that the Society proposed to do its work in connection with the First Church, a spirit of discontent broke out on the part of some who did not believe in the Congregational way. To insure peace and harmony, the Society proposed to support two religious teachers, and the pastor, Rev. Daniel Story, was asked to share his salary and the privileges and prerogatives of his office with another, although the stipulated cash salary was only $300 per year. But even this proposal and an honest effort to carry it out, did not bring peace, for in 1803, several persons withdrew and formed a Second Religious Society and employed Rev. Stephen Linsley as a religious teacher. Soon after, a Presbyterian Church was organized, which continued a precarious existence for some years and then came to an end on the withdrawal of the pastor. Several persons belonging to this Second Religious Society also formed a "Religious Meeting House Society" and began the erection of a brick building on Third street, below Greene, which was, however, never completed. It is safe to say that but for this unfortunate division of sentiment and forces this building would have been erected several years earlier. But while there were several persons in this church during all the early years of its history who preferred the Presbyterian form of church government, yet it should be said to their credit that for the most part they put aside their preferences and worked loyally with the people of this church until 1865, when the growth of the town warranted their peaceable withdrawal and the organization of the Fourth Street Presbyterian Church, which has been a strong religious factor in the community, meeting the needs of those who prefer this form of government.

When the frame of the church was up and the building enclosed, the trustees of the Society offered the pews for sale at public auction, in order to raise funds to reimburse those who had advanced money and material for the building. A limit was placed on the value of the pews below which they could not be sold; all pews below No. 78, on the lower floor, should not be sold for less than $70. and no front pews in the gallery for less than $60. The pews were transferred to the purchaser in fee simple to have and to hold and to transmit to his heirs or assigns just as he would transfer any other real property. Copies of the deeds are yet extant. The pews were nearly all sold and for years were owned and transferred as a house and lot would be. Gen. Rufus Putnam, who was one of the most generous givers toward building the meeting house, owned about 30 pews at the time of his death, which were disposed of in his will along with other property.

This plan was not peculiar to this church, and it may have been a financial necessity, but it proved here, as it proved everywhere, a source of weakness and a perpetual annoyance. Sometimes the pews came into the hands of outside parties who rented them as an investment. Those who owned the pews were not always willing to contribute to the current expenses of the church, and the Society was compelled to apply to the Legislature for a change in the articles of incorporation granting them power to levy a tax upon the pews, which was granted in 1836, within certain restrictions. Again and again in the history of the Society, the trustees were compelled to impose a tax on the pews to pay for repairs on the church or provide against a deficit in current expenses. Sometimes those who held pews opposed strenuously all effort to levy a tax on the pews to provide for deficits in the current expenses. They were willing to submit to taxation for necessary repairs, but not to provide for deficits in current expenses. Some years the trustees were not able to raise the pastor's salary when it was not more than $750 or $800 per year, and sometimes the deficit was permitted to run on year after year, and the records would seem to indicate that there have been times when the deficit was charged up to the pastor's account. At times the price of pews was greatly inflated. In 1827 there was a record of a transaction whereby pew No. 18, which had come into the possession of the Society and which was appraised at $120, was sold to Mrs. Martha

Robbins, through her agent, John Prune, for $200. As late as 1848, the trustees were considering the advisability of selling pews in the gallery to members of the College faculty to raise money to repair the church. The weakness and inconvenience of the system of pew ownership was fully realized, but it was not until the year 1867, when the most thorough repairs were completed which have ever been undertaken up to the present time, that most of the pew owners were prevailed upon to surrender their title to the pews in the house of the Lord, and the pews became practically free, although many families continued to occupy the same pews as before. It was a great victory when men were prevailed upon to surrender the title to property in the house of God which they could rent out for a profit and transmit to others without regard to their interest in the progress of the Kingdom of Christ upon earth. The Society has never found it so necessary to raise money, whether for repairs on the church or for current expenses, as since the titles to the pews have come into the hands of the Society and all revenues are raised by voluntary contributions. The experience of this church has proven that a system of pew ownership and taxation is a failure as a means for raising revenues for carrying on the work of the Christian Church.

In 1836, after the first general repairs on the church were completed, the Society voted to make the gallery seats belonging to the Society free, and on motion of William R. Putnam they were assigned as follows: The north gallery to the faculty and students in Marietta College, the south gallery to general use, while the seats abutting against the east walls were set apart for people of color, men in the north and women in the south gallery. This, it is believed, was the first movement for free seats in this church.

For thirteen years there was no provision for heating the church except by means of the small foot stoves such as were common in New England in an early day. There is no means of knowing whether people were staying away from church because of cold feet and the general discomfort of the room, or whether the zeal of their hearts caused them to forget all bodily discomforts; but, in 1821, a meeting was called to provide the church with stoves and pipes. In 1822 two stoves were purchased and put in the church, but for want of chimneys the pipes pass the whole length of the church under the gallery and passed out through the windows. Such an arrangement in modern times is regarded as indicating a lack of thrift.

The house has been repaired and slight alterations have been made at various times. The first general overhauling took place in 1836, at an expense of $1,768.64, and the business meeting at which arrangements and provisions were made for these alterations, was held on Christmas Day, 1835. This is a commentary on the way the fathers kept Christmas. The repairs and alterations made at this time consisted in putting in a vestibule and providing stairs and new slips in the gallery, changing the arrangement of pews, painting the church within and without and putting on a new roof. In 1858, at the close of the first half century, the question was seriously considered whether the old church should be thoroughly repaired or a new one built, and the trustees were made a committee to consider and report upon this question. The committee in due time rendered its report that the necessary repairs and alterations would cost $5,000, and that a new church suitable to the needs of the congregation would cost at least $12,000. But action was delayed owing to the discussion which arose concerning the question of securing the "Putnam Trust Fund" pews, and long before this was settled, the disturbed condition of the country and the outbreak of the Civil War absorbed the attention of the people until 1865, when the matter was again taken up in earnest, and a system of repairs was undertaken which continued through two seasons and was the most complete the old church has ever undergone. New windows with inside blinds were put in, the old pews with doors gave way to modern pews, the old high pulpit was removed and a recess was provided for the reconstructed pulpit, the side doors were removed to the rear of the church, the galleries were reseatd and the building was painted both outside and in, at a total cost of $5,105.46. This thorough renovating of the church, involving the most radical changes which have ever been made in the building itself, prepared the way, also, for a decided change in methods and spirit, and most of the pew-holders were prevailed upon to relinquish their claim to ownership in the church pews as before indicated. Thus it ever is in the life of an institution that changes in the outward form and structure correspond to changes in the inner life and spirit. It is safe to say that this honored and sacred structure has not changed as much as the spirit and method of the generations who have worshipped here.

The only repairs of any importance besides those already mentioned were in 1880, when the interior was painted and frescoed, which with some other minor repairs cost about $810, and, in 1889, when the recess at the rear was enlarged to make room for the new organ and choir, the pulpit was pushed forward and seats were put in the front gallery, occupied up to this time by the choir, at a cost of $450. For the last 10 years very little has been expended in repairs, because the conviction was general that the next overhauling would of necessity be more thorough and complete than any the church has yet undergone. The total amount expended on the church in repairs and alterations, of which account has been kept, is $9,115.26, which added to the original cost of the church makes the total cost $16,464.29, a sum only one-third larger than we contemplate for remodeling. This is, of course, exclusive of the cost of the chapel, organ and bell as well as the parsonage, which was purchased, in 1874, at a cost of $8,000. The total amount of these extras is $13,833, which added to the cost of the church and alterations, makes a grand total of $30,297, which the property of this church has cost in the past century. The alterations and additions now contemplated will add fully $20,000 to this total, including the organ, and will give us a property richly worth the $50,000, which it will have cost.

to annoy for many years, was the question of devoting a church to what were regarded as secular uses. Since nearly every one in the community had contributed something to the cost of the church, and it was for years the one auditorium in the city capable of accommodating large gatherings, the trustees were being constantly besieged by parties who desired to use it for lectures, concerts and miscellaneous entertainments. There were times when there was scarcely a meeting of the trustees when this question did not come up. While ever seeking to be liberal to all worthy causes, the purpose of the trustees as expressed in various resolutions has been to exclude everything not in keeping with the spirit and purposes for which the church was erected.

But there is one institution which has ever been accorded the freest use of the church, viz., the College; the founders of the College, and its early supporters were chiefly members of this church and Society. For years every public exercise of the College was held in this church. The six presidents, who have in turn presided over the destinies of the College, were here inducted into office; nearly if not quite every baccalaureate address has been delivered from this pulpit, more than 50 generations of students have here completed their course of study, received their degrees and gone forth to assume the duties of citizenship, and here many young men have made their first appearance on the public platform who have gone forth in later years to move men to action by their eloquent and well framed appeals. Probably more than 600 students have graduated from this platform and gone forth to find their place amid the world's great activities.

Postscript.—At a largely attended meeting of the church and Society held January 16, 1901, a decision was reached in favor of remodeling and enlarging the present edifice in general harmony with the plans submitted by Payne & Gardner of Springfield, Massachusetts. W. W. Mills, J. S. Simpson, J. E. Vandervort, Howard W. Stanley and John Kaiser were elected a building committee with power to raise the means of carrying out the work contemplated in the plans. This committee began work immediately; more than $18,000 were raised or pledged for the work. The old house was raised, enlarged, and beautified and when completed there was placed in it, by the munificence of Mrs. W. W. Mills, an organ, the finest ever brought to this county. It was given as a memorial to her parents, Beman Gates and Mrs. Betsey Gates. In the week from January 12, to January 17, 1902, the new house was dedicated with thankful service. Two of the former pastors, Rev. Theron H. Hawks, D. D., of Springfield, Massachusetts, and Rev. E. D. Dickinson, D. D., of Cincinnati, the historians of the church, were present and added much to the interest of the exercises.

The Harmer Congregational Church.

On January 1, 1840, a little company of believers assembled in the Town Hall of the then village of Harmer, known as Marietta, west side, for the purpose of organizing a Congregational Church.

Rev. Joel H. Linsley, D. D., President of Marietta College, conducted the exercises and preached the sermon. The articles of confession, which had been prepared and previously adopted by those intending to be members, were read by Rev. William Linsley and the covenant by Rev. James B. Walker.

The "constituting" prayer was offered by Rev. William Walker and the benediction pronounced by Rev. William Linsley. After the organization, a meeting of the church was held and the following officers elected,—Deacons, Douglas Putnam and Daniel P. Bosworth; clerk, Douglas Putnam.

The membership of the new church was made up of those who transferred their membership from the following places: Marietta Congregational, 25; Warren Presbyterian, 5; Watertown Presbyterian, 2; Belpre Congregational, 2; Sandusky Congregational, 1; Watertown Cumberland Presbyterian, 1.

For nearly eight years the church continued to worship in the Town Hall, when David Putnam donated a lot for both church and parsonage, the former being built in 1847. The dedication services of November 27th were conducted by Rev. Gideon Dana, then pastor and by Rev. William Wickes.

The first public worship was held in the new "Meeting House," Sunday, November 28, 1847.

In 1848 a new bell was purchased, the money being raised by concerts given by a quartette of young men from the College.

At various times the church has undergone repairs and been enlarged,—when in 1868 under Rev. William Wakefield a lecture room was built and again in 1894, during the pastorate of Rev. Silas Smith, when a Sunday-school room was erected on the side of the building.

For some months after the organization of the church, the pulpit was supplied by Dr. Linsley when on May 4, 1842, Rev. Milo Hickock was ordained and installed as first pastor. By request of himself, the pastorate terminated April 8, 1844.

In October, 1845, Rev. Gideon Dana began his labors with the church but not until January, 1847, was a call extended to him to become settled pastor. This was accepted, the installing services occurring October 20th, the same year. The pastorate terminated March 1, 1850.

The summer following, Rev. David Gould accepted an invitation to supply the pulpit and a call was subsequently extended to him. He was installed pastor May 28th, the following year, and continued his labors until January 16, 1855, when health compelled him to cease work.

Within a week a call was extended to Rev. William Wakefield which was accepted the following March, and in April he began a long and fruitful pastorate. This pastorate of nearly 17 years, which terminated February 20, 1872, is the longest in the history of the church.

During the following November, Rev. Josiah H. Jenkins began to labor with the church and continued until June 1, 1881.

In September, 1881, Rev. H. C. Haskell became the pastor and remained as such until September 1, 1887. It was during this time

Rev. Mr. Haskell was led to believe that his work was in the foreign field and at the termination of the pastorate he resumed missionary work in Bulgaria where he is working today.

On October 1st, the same year, Rev. D. F. Harris began a pastorate of five and one-half years, which terminated May 31, 1893. The pulpit was then supplied for some time by Prof. John Mills.

Rev. Silas Smith was called to the pastorate August 28, 1893. He labored energetically and as a result many members were added to the roll and the church throughout greatly strengthened and built up. It was during this pastorate the Sunday-school room adjoining the church was built. In the summer of 1895, Rev. Mr. Smith was stricken with typhoid fever and after a hard struggle the end came October 6th.

In January of the following year, the church called Rev. Jonathan Smith who labored less than a year, closing work November, 1896.

Rev. Virgil Boyer accepted a call from the church and began a faithful pastorate April 11, 1897. His work continued until August 7, 1901, when after a period of five months Rev. Lee J. Travis began work.

The Second Congregational Church of Marietta Township

Was organized March 3, 1859, by Rev. V. G. Fry. During the summer of 1858, Rev. Mr. Fry had been preaching at the Presbyterian Church, Cedar Narrows Congregational Church, Stanleyville and Lynch Methodist Church. Upon invitation, he included School District No. 8, Marietta township, in his appointments. In February, 1859, a protracted meeting was held in this church which resulted in the formation of the society with 24 members, 21 by profession and three by letter.

Rev. Mr. Fry acted as pastor until 1863, but having a wide field his visits were necessarily infrequent. Rev. John Noble was associated in the pastorate in 1873, and this church was supplied once each Sabbath. Rev. Mr. Noble was soon forced by ill health to resign the charge, and at the close of the year, Rev. Mr. Fry accepted a call to Lexington, Ohio, and the society was left without a pastor. Up to this time, there had been 11 additions to the membership. During 1864 and 1865 Rev. L. L. Fay and Prof. J. L. Mills preached occasionally. During 1866 Professor Mills preached regularly. During 1867 there was no pastor and the society maintained a doubtful existence. In the winter of 1868, Rev. George Athey, of the United Brethren Church held an awakening revival in which the members of the Congregational Church joined. A flourishing United Brethren class was organized, and both bodies worked together for nearly a year, when the United Brethren removed their services to Jennings' school house where they cultivated a much neglected field. J. H. Jenkins, then tutor in the College, preached for the Second Church once each Sabbath until 1872, when Rev. G. W. Wells became regular pastor in connection with the Little Muskingum Church and served until 1876. He was succeeded by Rev. Eugene S. Reed, who remained until 1880, when Rev. Mr. Wells was recalled.

A comfortable frame church was built in 1869. A Sunday-school has been maintained during the summer months, since the date of its organization.

At the present time there is no pastor for the church.

The Congregational Church of Lowell.

(This history was read before the Marietta Conference by Deacon B. F. Dyar.)

The Congregational Church of Lowell and Rainbow was organized November 13, 1857, with the following members: Cyrus Spooner, Thomas Ridgway, Charles T. Wetherby, Simeon Blake, William C. Balentine, B. F. Dyar, Almon Blake, Hannah Blake, Sophia Davis, Mary C. Blake, and Eliza A. Wetherby. George Spooner was elected clerk; C. T. Wetherby, S. N. Merriam and Amasa Blake, trustees. Rev. Charles Wetherby was the first pastor of the church and considerable prosperity attended his labors. The congregations were large and services were held for a time in the Methodist Episcopal Church. A house of worship was erected in 1858 and 1859. This is a substantial brick structure 40 by 50 feet, and cost $1,600, exclusive of the lot which was donated by Dr. Cyrus Spooner. Of this amount $300 was donated by the American Congregational Union. The community was much interested to sustain the new church. A little later a festival was held to raise money for a bell which was liberally patronized and $125 realized. More was raised by subscription and a bell was purchased, costing something over $150.

In 1865 the services of that venerable, good man, Rev. C. N. Ransom were secured who preached in the morning at Lowell, and in the evening at Rainbow. Following him, the church was supplied by Rev. G. V. Fry, Rev. M. Moore, Rev. M. Noble, and Rev. L. L. Fay. In 1873 Rev. George W. Wells served the church and in 1874, Prof. J. L. Mills, Rev. Samuel Lewis (Methodist) preached for about two years commencing in 1876. In 1879 Rev. E. B. Reed labored with great earnestness and five were added to the church. About this time an organ was secured for the use of the church and Sunday-school. Rev. C. S. Irwin commenced labor here in 1881 in connection with three other churches, his labors continuing for about two years. The pulpit was subsequently supplied by Rev. S. Lewis, R. R. Sloyd and D. D. Davis, students in Marietta College, Rev. Edward Mirick and Rev. G. W. Wells. There has been no regular preaching since 1883. The house of worship was injured by the flood of 1884 and repaired at a cost of $46.50, and in 1887 a tin roof was put on the church at a cost of $150. The kind hearted people of Marietta churches have liberally aided this church from time to time. A Sunday-school was sustained for many years with a good attendance but the church has been weakened by death and removals until there are only four members in Lowell, and five others living at some distance in the country. The Sunday-school was finally closed for want of persons to sustain it, and the house of worship is now closed. The population of the place has greatly changed, there are now in the village of about 300 people, three other churches, Campbellite, Baptist and Lutheran, and some have thought it may be best to sell the church structure. For 35 years this has stood as a house of worship where many have been instructed in righteousness and have been strengthened in their purpose to live and labor for Christ. Some of these are now faithful laborers in other places.

St. Luke's Protestant Episcopal Church.

Rev. Philander Chase, Bishop of the diocese of Ohio, visited Marietta in August, 1820. He says he was well received and treated with kindness and hospitality, and that "a considerable number of persons in town and vicinity, of great respectability and worth, expressed themselves sincerely attached to the church." He held two meetings in Marietta and one in Harmar on Wednesday, August 8th, and on the following morning administered the right of confession to seven persons. Incipient steps were taken at this time toward forming a parish by the name of St. Luke's Church.

In April, 1822, Philander Chase, Jr., then a deacon, preached several times in Marietta. In 1825, Judge Arius Nye, a zealous member of the church, returned to Marietta, and immediately undertook to effect an organization, and his efforts were successful among people whose sympathies were with the church, the original members being Arius Nye, Billy Todd, Daniel H. Buell, John J. Jolin, James English, A. V. D. Joline, and Edward Rector.

Meetings were occasionally conducted by missionaries in the Court House, and in the old brick school house in Harmar. In 1829 the parish had 10 communicants. In 1832 Rev. John T. Wheat was elected rector, and on the 13th day of December, the sacrament was administered to 14 persons.

The church was incorporated by act of the Legislature on January 9, 1833, Rev. Mr. Wheat preaching his inaugural sermon on April 14, 1833.

In 1833 a house of worship was built on the corner of Fourth and Scammel streets, where the new Lutheran Church now stands. In 1857 the church sold its old house of worship and removed to their present home on Second street. Rev. Mr. Wheat's rectorship continued until October, 1836, and Rev. C. L. F. Haensel was his successor. Since Rev. Mr. Haensel resigned, the successive rectors have been: B. J. Bonner, D. W. Telford, Edward Winthrop and John Boyd.

Rev. John Boyd, D. D., was elected June 11, 1850, and continued in active service until April, 1892,—the longest pastorate in this county. On the 9th of September, 1900, on his 50th anniversary, D. D. Boyd preached a sermon which contains so much of general interest to the public that a large part of it is given below. Of the original members of his church but five were present on this anniversary occasion, Mrs. McIntosh, Mrs. Ralston, Mrs. Rhodes, Mrs. Charles Hall, and F. A. Wheeler. The church have elected Rev. W. H. K. Pendleton as their rector, but he has not yet entered upon his duties.

This parish was organized March 27, 1826. October 17, 1834, the first church was formally consecrated by Bishop McIlvaine. September 20, 1857, we had the old church farewell. In those 31 years there were six rectors, 160 baptisms; 64 were confirmed; there were 48 marriages, and 65 funerals. I am running hurriedly over these items. But there are memories which will not be hurried. Each item touches magic springs of association, and joys and sorrows are moving back in review. While I am giving figures some are recalling images; sitting again in the old-time seats, and sitting beside them are the forms of friends and kindred who have passed into the unseen. To strangers, to the eye of sense, that old building is but a meeting place of worshippers. To our eyes it is a hallowed chamber in Christ; gallery of grace, filled with living images of Himself. That church is sa-creed with sacred memories. In it, hearts ached, and hearts rejoiced; around it cluster the sweetest and the saddest associations of many a life. It holds in it the echoes of Te Deum and Miserere; the records of baptism,—baptisms of sorrow, baptisms of the spirit. Bridal parties have joyously entered it; funeral trains have moved mournfully out of it; "Till death us do part" echoed back by "dust to dust." He who consecrated the old church, and five who ministered in it are walking together in white. Yet the outer form is valuable only for the life which it conserves. Shall the mother-bird flutter and cry over the empty shells from which her fledglings have flown? The church is builded not of the stones in the walls, but of the souls in its communion. The Holy Spirit dwells not in the material, but in the mystic house. Let the old scaffoldings give way to the new, if only the mystic temple be builded and adorned. An artist of this city took a photograph of the new church, and, without himself knowing it, so placed his camera that far in the background is the distinct picture of the old one. It is a parable in art. Even when this new church is in the foreground of our thoughts and activities, in the background, transfigured in the perspective, is the church of the first love, with all its hallowed memories and associations. All that in passing was painful is now dissolved in the haze of the distance; and the heart holds only the endearments; the rose remains in full fragrance without the thorns.

The ministrations of the old church I divided with five others, all of whom rest from their labors. The new church knows no ministry but mine. Wednesday, September 9, 1856, the corner-stone of the new church was laid, in the hopes and prayers that it might mark an era in our spiritual history. In this stone we placed the Bible, significant of our faith, built up on the foundation of the apostles and prophets, Jesus Christ Himself being the chief corner-stone, and also the Prayer Book, as our distinctive, in which the spiritual substance of the Bible is assimilated for purposes of devotion. Standing on the corner-stone your minister spoke as follows: In the spiritual temple, of which this house is the symbol, we recognize One God,—Father, Son and Holy Ghost; One Gospel,—"The glad tid-ing of great joy—a Savior;" One aim and ob-ject,—the glory of God in the salvation of men; One day of grace in which to secure this,—this life only; One Name given among men whereby they may be saved, the Name above every name; One Fountain opened for sin and uncleanness,—the blood of the new covenant; One Altar,—the cross of Christ; One Sacrifice, once offered for all, of which the sacrament is the memorial; One Priest,—He who offered Himself for the expiation of sin, and who ever lives to make intercession for us; One incense,—the sweet savor of Christ, making fragrant our persons and our prayers; One Book,—the Bible as our rule of faith and life; One Interpreter,—the Holy Spirit who guides us into all the truth; One distinctive faith,—Jesus Christ and Him Crucified; One Church,—the mystical body of Christ which is the blessed company of all faithful people, whose union in Christ is the Communion of Saints; One Baptist,—the baptism of the Holy Ghost, symbolized in the baptism of water; One Confessional,—the Mercy-seat of Christ; One Absolution,—Him hath God ap-pointed to give repentance and remission of sins; One Assurance,—the witness of the Holy Spirit with our spirits that we are the sons of God; One Motive-power,—the love of Christ constraineth us; One Heaven,—the inheritance of holiness in the Presence of our Father and Savior.

These words were sealed in the corner-stone of the new building, with the hope and prayer that at each service they might be the inspiration of the message of the pulpit and the devotions of the desk and the pew.

September 24, 1857, the new church was consecrated by Bishop McIlvaine in due ritual form. Since then it has been receiving oft-repeated spiritual consecrations in fact;—consecrated in baptisms of the Holy Ghost; in souls new born to God; in sighings of contrite hearts; in concerts of penitential confessions; in jubilant songs of captives delivered from bondage into the glorious liberty of the sons of God; in refreshings from the Presence of the Lord; consecrated in the fountains of joy and song welling up all along the Sabbaths,—Sabbaths of the week, Sabbaths of the soul; consecrated in our home memories of birth and death, and of the new birth of that which dieth not; in associations of friendships and fellowships, formed in Christ, never to be sundered; in hours of communion of saint with saint, and saints with the Savior. We thought the church beautiful when first we entered it. Now it has new, associated beauty. Pulpit and chancel and choir and pew hold each its fragrant secrets. Memory touches the magic spring, and the inner life of each one comes up in review before him. Under the fading frescoes are memories that shall never fade. From every panel come up associations that gild and glorify the time-stained walls. In the soul's vision its ceilings are enameled with the beauty of holiness inlaid with jewels of grace; its tablets are transparencies and the Spirit as a lamp within illumines the letters of the Covenant of love. Here we have heard the voice of the Lord, and "seen His goings in the Sanctuary." Here Jesus has come in and supped with us and we with Him. Fathers have seen their children taken up in the arms of Jesus, mothers have had their sons and daughters received with them into the covenant and communion of grace. Wives have seen their husbands bending low their heads and hearts to receive the benediction of the Savior. Six who kneeled here in youth to join in our communion have since ministered in this pulpit and at this chancel, distributing here the elements which they had here received. three of them holding the sacramental cup to the mothers that gave them birth; two of them to mothers now translated; one of them a Missionary Bishop, administering confirmation here in this parish from which he had gone out, laying apostolic hands on the head of the now sainted grandchild of his own sainted mother. And thus this church, new in the calendar, is old in endearing associations,—associations with the heart experiences of well-nigh half a century; the birth-place of the Spirit to the many, the spiritual home and nursery to all. Were the building gone it would still abide in the memories, in the associations, in the annals of the soul's life. Would that every one who helped to build and decorate and sustain it were himself a living stone in the mystic temple, and that every one who joins in its responses and anthems be a voice in the orchestra of the saved.

In recalling our long relation you will pardon me if I record with satisfaction one experience. Never once in all these 50 years has there been one unpleasant word between the rector and his choir, never once in all this half century has there been a conflict or even a jar between the rector and his vestry and congregation. Disappointment there may have been, but no collision, no controversy. They may have desired better ministrations. He may have desired fuller attendance, deeper interest, yet there has been no alienation, no friction. If there has not been power there has been peace. If there has not been wisdom, there has been love. This pulpit has never once given vent to a personality, never spoken a bitter word, "a word which dying I would wish to blot."

We are small and isolated, off in a remote corner, 75 miles from the nearest parish in the diocese, practically cut off from parochial and ministerial fellowship. Yet, our little out-of-the-way parish has been remembered and honored by the diocese, in twice holding its annual convention here; and in choosing its minister to represent it in general conventions four several times. We have had here three ordinations;—one to the presbytership, two to the diaconate, one of whom had here been baptized and confirmed, a son of the parish. And remote and quiet as is our little parish in its eddy, it is yet made to feel the currents of change. It has been in two dioceses, under five bishops, two of whom are not, and one is laid aside. Still we keep our identity. You are worshipping in a church which was consecrated by Bishop Melvaine, and are ministered to by one who was baptized, confirmed, ordained deacon, and ordained presbyter by the bishop who consecrated both of your churches.

Looking over the congregation I see some still out of Christ; so many years farther from God and life. Some contribute to send the Gospel to the heathen, while their own souls are dying under the sound of its glad tidings. Some liberally subscribe to sustain the preaching of the Word, whose preaching condemns them. They support the ministrations of him who is constrained to tell them that they are strangers from the covenant of promise. They welcome to their homes the one whose presence is a reminder that their names are not in the parish register, nor in the Lamb's Book of Life. They attend here where saints commune, while they are not in the communion of saints. I see friends to me who are not friends to my Savior; who kindly regard the messenger, yet accept not the message. It bewilders me that I can have place in a heart that has no room for the Lord; that the poor services of a human friend are more than appreciated, while the sacrifice of the divine Friend is treated lightly.

But coming out from under this shadow, I see faces radiant with spiritual light, getting brighter as they near the coming glory. If it has been graciously given me to put new gladness into the glad tidings, to remove from before the vision a doubt or a shadow, to glorify the Savior in their eyes, to transfigure the cross, to throw light upon the new and living way into the holiest, to fix the faith when it would waver, to bring to them the Comforter in moments of sorrow, to break to them the living bread as Jesus had blessed and broken it to me, it is ministry enough. We shall rejoice together when our pilgrimage is ended, and we lay our staff and sandals down at home with the Lord.

Nearly all the old familiar faces are gone, they turn no more to listen to the message, they are in the beatific Presence, new faces are here in their stead. Some kindle at the word; some give back no response. Seven thousand times I have here told the old, old story; told it to hearts that drank it in as life; told it to ears that hearing heard not; told it to some who have gone beyond its sound, gone where it is told nevermore.

To one portion, far the largest portion, of the congregation of days far past, I have not yet spoken; nor could they hear me now, nor need they. Their lesson of grace is learned; their work of faith and labor of love is finished. They have gone up from the fellowship of the saints below to the saints above. Our little church has a stairway to the skies; and one by one as the night comes down and the angel calls, the tired ones go aloft where He giveth His beloved rest. All of you have kindred there. Our several families are represented in our Father's family on high, knowing as they are known, loving as they are loved. Many who here have sung with us our faint anthems, often in the minor key, now swell the tumultuous chorus of the harpers on the sea of glass. May your voice and mine in due time join them in the glorified song which none but the ransomed from sin can sing.

Fifty years of ministry. How long, and yet how brief. The ministry of your present rector reaches over a little more than two-thirds of your history. Half a century have his interests been identified with yours, his life bound up with your life. He has contributed to shape your views and experiences. His impress is on you. You are the better or the worse for his ministry.

Five still on our roll, and now present, were here when I came. Fifty years in Christ! How much must they have known of the divine communion; how much learned of the fullness of Christ for his people; how many promises many times proved in the experience. How ripe the character should be. Fifty years make of an infant a matured man, strong of sinews, broad of thought; make of a "babe" in Christ a "young man," strong to overcome the wicked one, and make of the young man a "father" rich in the knowledge and love of God. If, to any one, all these years have been lived out of Christ what irreparable loss; years of orphanage without Father, without hope and home. Here we reckon by days and years and centuries. Within the veil in the ineffable Presence the only calendar is consciousness,—one abiding consciousness of home, Father, Savior, ministry, unwearing; joy unspeakable, communion the same yesterday, today, and forever. Our sun goeth no more down.

Fifty years of ministry to one people. And this is the summary:—Many in Christ, many out of Christ; Some getting daily nearer to God; the light growing brighter, the communion richer, going from strength to strength; some getting farther from God, self-repelled; the voice of the Spirit growing fainter; the heart emptied of that which satisfieth: full of self-flatteries and promises which tantalize; promises made to the hopes broken to the heart; holding phantom cups to the lips while the soul is dying of thirst;—thirst which only Christ can quench. Is such a one here! Brother in Adam be our brother in Christ. The friend of sinners calls you to his fellowship. We, saved sinners, call you to our communion. Let me record below, let the angel of the covenant record on high, another soul saved; and let that soul be yours; and let it be now.

My first text was I. Cor. II, 2: "I determined to know nothing among you, save Jesus Christ, and Him crucified." I then accepted this as the one burden of my ministry. And here at the close of the half century, I call you to witness that I have kept my pledge. Ministers are not essayists, offering tentative solutions of the problems of life. These are solved in the revelation of grace. Men meet theory with theory and logic with logic. Conscience responds only to the authoritative work of God. We deliver God's message as yea and amen, challenging instant implicit faith and obedience. We are not apologists, but heralds, proclaiming pardon to the penitent; pointing the unclean to the one only Fountain for sin; offering the Gospel as the specific provision for the soul's specific needs. We are not reformers but evangelists; preaching not culture, but grace; not reform, but regeneration; not morality, but holiness. We are ambassadors bearing messages of grace; we are witnesses testifying what we do know. This pulpit has studiously kept itself aloof from the passing politics, the current questions of the press, the conventional moralities, the ever-changing philosophies and skepticism. The spirit of the Gospel is the conservative in politics; grace in the heart is the answer to the skeptic; the love of Christ is the soul of morals. The man surcharged with the spirit of God will carry that spirit alike into his Sunday devotions, his week day industries, and his political relations. Social problems are solved only in the spirit of brotherhood. When we know God as our Father, we will know man as our brother, and in that brotherhood feeling all social problems solve themselves.

I have indeed sought to keep this pulpit true to all the interests of man as man in all his relations, true to logic,—the logic of truth and life and love, logic on fire with grace; true to science,—the science of God immanent and transcendent; true to philosophy,—the philosophy of salvation by grace through faith; true to theology,—theology with the incarnation in the center, raying out the light of life; true to morality,—the morality whose body is the golden rule and whose soul is the love of Christ. I have devoutly sought in the fellowship of the Spirit, to glorify Christ, to unfold the unsearchable riches in Him for us. I have known only a Gospel of glad tidings, a Gospel of grace, a Gospel of holiness, a Gospel of brotherhood, a Gospel of trust and love and loyalty. I have sought to fill myself and you with the gladness of the glad tidings of a Savior. I have longed and prayed for a heart of fire, and a tongue of fire, to give the message in burning words, causing hearts to burn within them, burn with a flame of love; a flame that purifies and inspires. I shall not have prayed and preached in vain, if I have made spiritual things more real and Jesus more precious; if I have widened some one's horizon, kindling in the vision foregleams of the hereafter; if I have caused some despondent one to glow with hope; if I have manifested the love of God in Christ till hearts responded in trust and love and adoration; if I have held Him up till he fills all the field of vision. I shall have fulfilled my ministry, if I have stimulated any to higher ambitions and holier purposes; if I have helped souls struggling out of darkness into the light; let in a ray of sunshine into some shadowed life; made the glad tidings a personal gladness; put a new star—the star of Bethlehem—into some leaden sky; thrown a gleam of light across the path of some perplexed pilgrim; quieted a haunting fear; constrained a bowed heart to lay off its burden on the Burden-bearer; lifted a shadow from some home; put a jubilant note in some one's Psalm of life; kindled a redder glow over life's sunset, prophetic of a brighter sunrise beyond; taken a thorn from some pillow, resting the restless head; held the cross before the eye of the dying; given the viaticum to a soul in the last hour, as he passed to the Presence of his God. If I have been privileged to do this, I am content. My Master will graciously own my services done to His little ones as done to Him; and in eternity some hearts will bless God for my little ministries. And the Savior may fill for me, with the wine of life, the cup I have held in His name to thirsty lips.

And now the record of half a century is made. Would it were better, yet, as it is, it must stand. It has its lights and shadows; its place in the world's annals, it is yet in God's Book of Remembrance. God grant that all the names in our parish register may be found in the Lamb's Book of Life, that all who have here hearkened to the glad tidings may hear the glad welcome; "Enter thou into the joy of the Lord;" that all who have kneeled at this sacramental table may sit down at the marriage supper of the Lamb.

The first German church in Marietta was organized in 1839, under the name of the German United Evangelical Church (Deutsche Vereinigte Evangelische Kirche). The church building occupied the corner of Fifth and Scammel streets. In 1858 personal difficulties among the members caused a division. The larger portion of the members withdrew and organized January 26, 1858, as the United Evangelical Protestant St. Lucas Congregation. The new congregation purchased for $1,500 its house of worship, the only one in Marietta built due north and south. It had the form of a Grecian temple and was situated on the corner of Fourth and Scammel streets, where the new church now stands. In 1869 a neat parsonage was built on Third street, and in 1878 a large pipe organ was bought, it being the pride of the congregation and for many years the largest in the town.

For several years the congregation kept up a parish school. May 30, 1875, a new constitution was adopted, and the name changed to the German Evangelical Protestant St. Lucas Congregation or Church. It is now known as St. Luke's Evangelical Lutheran Church. It has been served by the following pastors: Revs. Zobel Mosebach, Seipel Fleischer, Arnold, Bruckner, Moser, Blass, Kammacher, Abele, Herberg, Fritza, Fleischer, Kruger, Rev. F. Theime and Rev. W. E. Brinckman.

These ministers belonged to different synodical associations, while the congregation itself kept always independent.

In 1893 some of the young people organized under the name of the "Evangelical Mission," as an English-speaking branch. They joined the same year the Miami Synod of the Evangelical Lutheran Church of North America, of which their pastor is a member.

St. Luke's Church has at present far above 500 members, two Sunday-schools with 350 scholars enrolled, and is very active in all branches of church work.

Their beautiful new edifice erected on the corner of Fourth and Scammel streets, was dedicated on Sunday, December 15, 1901. The sermon of dedication was preached by Rev. J. A. M. Ziegler, President of Miami Evangelical Lutheran Synod.

METHODIST EPISCOPAL CHURCHES.

The First Methodist Episcopal Church.

So far as the records show, Robert Marley was the first Methodist preacher to settle in Washington County. He crossed the Ohio River from (West) Virginia to Marietta June 20, 1799. He soon visited every settlement in the county and before the close of the year a number of classes were formed in the rural districts and a circuit was organized. In 1800 Jesse Stoneman and James Quinn were appointed to this work.

It was with difficulty that Methodism gained a foothold in Marietta. In 1804 George Askin held a camp-meeting within the town, but with meagre results. The next year a similar effort was made by Jacob Young and George C. Light, with larger success. A number of persons were converted and a class was formed under the leadership of Jones Johnson, who had been before his conversion a follower of Thomas Paine. This class was the beginning of Marietta Methodism. The members were: Samuel Green and wife, William Bell, and Elijah Francis and wife. This small beginning was as good seed sown in good ground. It has brought forth fruit abundantly.

In 1806, during the pastorate of the famous Peter Cartwright, a camp-meeting was held in Harmar at which a number of influential persons were converted. Marietta was at this time a part of the Marietta and Kanawha circuit which extended along the Ohio River for 150 miles and far into (West) Virginia. In 1808 the Marietta circuit was formed. The winter of 1809-10 brought another gracious revival which greatly strengthened the church. In 1815 John Stewart, a dissipated colored man, was converted and went out as a missionary to the Indians, thus inaugurating the great missionary movement of American Methodism.

For the 10 years after their first organization, the Methodists worshiped in private homes, the old Academy, and the Harmar school house. In 1815 the first church building was erected on Second street, near Scam-mel. It was a plain structure, 32 feet long and 28 feet wide. It was twice enlarged to meet the demands of the growing society.

In 1819 disaffection entered the society, but by the wise administration of Leroy Swormstedt, who was appointed to Marietta in 1825, it was healed and 125 members were added to the church. In 1833 Crawford Chapel was erected on the Harmar side. In 1835 these two churches were permanently separated from the outlying circuit and composed the Marietta charge until they became separate stations in 1848.

An epoch in the history of Marietta Methodism was the erection of the Centenary Church in 1839. It was a commodious, brick building on Putnam street between Front and Second, admirably adapted to the work of a progressive society. It was dedicated by Leonidas L. Hamline (later Bishop Hamline), assisted by David Young. The official Board that inaugurated and completed this splendid work was made up of the following persons: John Crawford, Joseph W. Babcock, R. P. Iams, Joseph Kelly, Junia Jennings, Wylls Hall, Robert Howeson, John C. McCoy, Abram Daniels, Daniel Protsman, Charles Tidd, James Whitney, Alexander Shanklin, and Benjamin Soule. The members contributed to the utmost of their ability and were abundantly rewarded for their generosity. The society prospered greatly in its new home. It would be difficult to find the record of a nobler body of Christians than that which composed the working force in this church.

In 1842 a notable revival came and 187 members were received. The greatest revival in its history swept the church in 1856 when 210 persons were added to its membership.

In 1859 the Whitney Chapel society was formed, principally from the membership of the Centenary Church. This separation was caused by the "painful differences in Centenary Charge, intensified by lack of wisdom in administration." This society erected a brick church on Second street near Butler and continued separate until 1875. During this period its pastors were: I. B. Brodrick, D. H. Moore (late Bishop Moore), E. M. Kirkham, William

M. Mullenix, Earl Cranston (later Bishop Cranston), Levi Hall, T. W. Stanley, J. H. Acton, Jesse Vanlaw, and James Kendall. The pastors of Centenary during the time of the separation were: A. G. Byers, T. J. N. Simmons, W. T. Hawey, H. R. Foster, C. D. Battelle, J. T. Miller, T. R. Ross, A. C. Hirst, and S. C. Frampton. The consolidation in 1875 was untimely and entire harmony did not prevail for a number of years. A revival during the pastorate of S. B. Mathews (1876-79) did much to re-unite the churches. Prosperity continued during the wise pastorate of W. G. Burns.

Another epoch in the history of Marietta Methodism was the selection of the present site on the corner of Wooster and Third streets and the erection of the present splendidly equipped building. This was a venturesome enterprise. The site was then on the outskirts of the town and the church was far beyond the needs of the membership that built it. The importance of this move cannot be easily overestimated. It was a preparation for a larger future. Since entering this church, the growth has been steady and substantial. The building now stands in the heart of the city and the membership fills it to overflowing. The building was constructed during the pastorate of T. M. Leslie and was dedicated July 19, 1885, by Charles H. Payne, D. D., LL. D. T. M. Leslie was followed by T. R. Taylor, T. G. Dickinson, L. H. Binkley, R. E. Bishop, W. M. Acton, W. V. Dick, W. D. Cherington and Herbert Scott.

During the pastorate of W. M. Acton, a fine pipe-organ was placed in the church. Three years ago the entire interior of the church was renovated and greatly beautified. It is now an attractive and impressive place of worship. The society now has a membership of over 650 and property valued at $25,000. The present members of the official Board are: Trustees, H. H. Burns, Dr. C. W. Eddy, Judge W. H. Leeper, M. McMillan, M. M. Rose, Judge Hiram L. Sibley, H. E. Smith, C. R. Stevens, and J. W. Sturgiss. Stewards, N. Bergen, Robert Dempster, W. L. Gorham, C. B. Jacobs, Lewis Klintworth, Dr. Oscar A.

Lambert, T. E. McKinney, G. A. Palmer, W. A. Patterson, E. L. Pixley, George D. Schad and John A. Stone. Class leaders, J. H. Young, S. S. Stowe, Mrs. Sophia Patterson, Mrs. Sarah Swingle, John W. Gorley, Rev. F. D. S. Bickley, and Mrs. Luella Pixley. Local preachers, Judge Hiram L. Sibley, F. W. Combs. Exhorters, H. H. Burns and John R. Franklin.

—Herbert Scott, Pastor.

The Gilman Avenue Methodist Episcopal Church

Was dedicated May 5, 1895, by Bishop Isaac W. Joyce, under the pastorate of Rev. F. R. Crooks. It is the outgrowth of what was known for a half century as Crawford Chapel. Up until about 1833 the history of Methodism on both sides of the Muskingum River was one and the same under the circuit plan; after that, separate organizations were formed, and the different societies began a work of their own.

The first house of worship was built on the west side in 1833, the lot having been donated by Rev. John Crawford. It was remodeled under Rev. W. H. Wallace, and the building occupied until the society moved into the handsome new structure on Gilman avenue.

The growth of the society has kept pace with the city. A great revival was held under the pastorate of Rev. C. B. Longman in which many were gathered into the church, a number uniting with other churches.

Many able ministers have been associated with the society, among whom may be mentioned Bishop Stephen Merrill, James Jamison, C. F. Creighton, D. D. Under the efficient labors of Rev. A. Hanby, the Epworth League was organized, and the new parsonage erected. Among the laity, the names of Crawford, Price, Spaulding, Judd, Barber, Burlingame, and Preston will shine resplendent in the local annals of Methodism.

Today the church has a membership of nearly 300. The Sabbath-school enrolls 200. The church is well organized, and is doing efficient work under the care of its present pastor, Rev. Adam J. Hawk.

It has sent two missionaries to the foreign field,—Miss Carrie Jewell to China, and Miss Esther Devine to India.

The German Methodist Episcopal Church.

(This history of the German Congregation of the Methodist Episcopal Church at Marietta, Ohio, is from the semi-centennial report of the church.)

This congregation is one of the oldest in German Methodism, founded in the month of June, 1839. At the session of the Pittsburgh Conference (1839) Charles Best was appointed minister to Monroe and Marietta Mission, and Nath Callender as presiding elder. Both were English preachers, and, because of their knowledge of the German language, they were appointed to this mission, which extended to 70 miles in length and 40 miles in width. Father Danker had prepared the way in 1838 and preached as a Lutheran minister to the Germans in Marietta and borne the Gospel so earnestly that the promise, "My word shall not return unto me void," was gloriously fulfilled. Spiritual awakenings took place and prayer meetings were instituted. But as Dr. Luther said, "Where God's word is preached clearly and purely, there it begins to rumor." Danker's parishioners divided and he said farewell to them and united with the Methodist Church and preached regularly in the old English Methodist Church building at Marietta. To be sure he had gone in the right direction, he asked the Lord to seal his preaching in the conversion of one soul at his beginning. This prayer was answered; Peter Wilkens experienced a very vigorous conversion—the first fruit.

The second quarterly meeting was held in November, 1839. Many were converted then and joined our congregation in Marietta and Bonn. Father Danker and J. H. Bahrenburg acted as local preachers until the former was received in 1840 as member into Pittsburgh Conference and was appointed to Captina Mission and H. Kœneke to Marietta Mission.

Kœneke's work was of great success and in spring, 1841, the old frame church was bought from our English brethren for $800. This frame church constitutes a prominent part in the history of Methodism. It was in 1841, when Jacob Stewart, the Indian pioneer missionary, was converted in this church, who went first to the Delaware Indians and then to the Wyandots.

The work spread among the Germans and at Christmas, 1840, John Geyer and William Dressler from Chester, manifested deep interest in quarterly meeting and in lovefeast they asked to be prayed for. Both were converted and went their way rejoicing, asking Mr. Kœneke to visit them. Shortly after New Year's, the following brethren went 40 miles on foot to Chester: H. Kœneke, J. H. Bahrenburg, C. Kœneke, J. Ficken, J. Link, C. Helwig. Great was the success, and Chester and Pomeroy were made appointments and good classes organized. Pittsburgh Conference appointed, in 1841, H. Kœneke to Chester Mission, J. H. Bahrenburg to Captina and John Miller to Marietta. In 1843 John Geyer was sent to Marietta and worked two years with great success, especially among his countrymen, the Bavarians along Bear Creek.

The names of the first members were: The families of Ailers, William Klingworth, H. Bahrenburg, John Olhaber, George Helwig, P. Wilkens, Claus Otten, Claus Duden, James Link, J. Sildren, J. Fischer, J. Ficken. The single persons: Caroline Helwig, Carl Helwig, Kurt Bahrenburg, C. Bahrenburg, Sophia Helwig, Herman Weber, Adelheid Berscher and Eliz Brickwede.

The Marietta congregation was the spiritual birth-place of such noble men of God and stanch pioneers as G. Danker, C. Kœneke, J. Ficken, C. Helwig, J. Geyer, P. Helwig, J. Brawer, P. Wilkens, H. Bahrenburg, George Oettinger, and will be original types of old Methodist fiery zeal and acts in the power of the Holy Ghost, and historically will remain to German Methodists an interesting place. To save souls was their missions, devoting themselves wholly to their work in spite of all mockeries and severe persecutions.

Here is a list of preachers who consecutively served at this congregation: C. Best and E. Riemenschneider, 1839; G. Danker, 1840; H. Kœneke, 1841-42; John Miller, 1843; John Geyer, 1844-45; John Mayer, 1846; Paul Brodbeck, 1847-48; Conrad Bier and William Dressler 1849-50; C. Vogel, 1851; F. Heitmeier and G. Ricke, 1852; W. August, 1853; G. Danker, 1854; A. Wuensch, 1855; C. G. Fritsche and J. H. Horst, 1856; F. Schimmelpfennig and W. Eckemeier, 1857-58; G. Weidmann and A. Graessle, 1859-60; J. Rixse, 1861; P. Broadbeck, 1862-63; C. Vogle, 1864-66; I. G. Reiber, 1867; J. Mayer, 1868; J. Phetzing, 1869; J. Haas, 1870; C. Helwig, 1871-72; H. Warner, 1873; W. Riechenmeier, 1873-76.

The old frame church on Second street became irreparable and in 1874 a much more suitable place in the midst of the city was bought for $1,500. Under W. Riechenmeier's administration the erection of a new church was planned and when Mr. Fischbach came here he found the building in progress. Within the limits of the then small Cincinnati Conference and at a financial famine he collected $900.

Our church is situated on the corner of Third and Wooster streets, with a steeple 110 feet high, and fronting to the north is a two-story brick building 36 by 60 feet. A fine church bell of 1,800 pounds weight is mainly due to P. C. Fischer and Martin Seemann. The church with all its appurtenances cost $7,300.

The preachers hereafter appointed were: J. W. Fischbach, 1877-78; A. F. Miller, 1879; J. H. Horst, 1880-81; D. Grassle, 1881-84; G. H. Fiedler, 1884-87; A. F. Miller, 1887 and March, 1890; J. Mayer, 1890; William Andree 1890-93; H. Jend, 1894-99; and at present H. Herzer.

A nice parsonage was built on the southern side of the church at the expense of $1,500.

If all those that were converted here and joined our society had remained resident here, we would have a membership of over 800.

The Barlowe Methodist Episcopal Church.

(Capt. by F. H. Palmer.)

At the request of Rev. Reese Woolf, a local preacher of Parkersburg, (West) Virginia, the Baltimore Conference, in 1798, sent out Robert Manly, to what was then known as the Kanawha circuit. During the year, he crossed over and commenced preaching at the different settlements in this county. Societies were formed at most of the settlements by him and his successors, and it can be said that no society has ever been without a regular minister.

The society of Barlow was formed during the early years of the century, consisting of the Greens, Woodruffs, Vincents, McGuires, and Houghland families, with Cornelius Houghland, class leader.

Meetings were held at the Houghland school house, located on the northwest point of Cemetery Hill, on the Houghland Farm, and at the homes of Duty Green, Abner Woodruff, the McGuires, Vincents, Houghlands and at the Old Hickory school house.

In 1816 Cornelius Springer and Thomas A. Morris were sent to the circuit, with Jacob Young, presiding elder. It was during their ministrations that several camp meetings were held on the line between the Gordon and Greenlees farms, a short distance west of Wolf Creek. At one of these meetings Jacob Young baptized over 80 persons by immersion, pouring and sprinkling.

At the death of Cornelius Houghland, March 10, 1818, the class consisted of the Houghlands, Duty Green and wife, Smith Green and wife, Caleb Green and wife, Duty Green, Jr., Ely Green, Mrs. Turner, two sons and two daughters, John Laffin and wife, Lyman Laffin and wife, Herman Chapman and wife, Rhoda Chapman, Samuel Chapman, William Vincent and wife, Beman, Pamela, Eliza and Lyda Pond, Joseph Palmer, Jr., and wife of Palmer, Isaac Hutchinson, Moses Gill and others.

After Mr. Houghland's death, Joseph Palmer, Jr., was appointed class leader, which office he filled until after the formation of the class in Palmer, when Duty Green, Sr., was appointed. He filled the office until the spring of 1823. His successor was John Houghland.

In April, 1826, the society bought a lot of Smith Green at the Cross Roads, on the farm now occupied by Robert Hays, and built a log church, which was used until 1830. It was deeded to the trustees of the Methodist Episcopal Church and successors, Duty Green, Sr., John Laffin, Isaac Hutchinson, William Vincent, Moses Gill, Caleb Green, Smith Green, Joseph Palmer, Jr., and Samuel Chapman.

The use of this house was tendered to the "Old School" Presbyterians until they built their church at Barlow Cross Roads. This latter church was in turn tendered to the Methodists for holding quarterly meetings.

In 1834 the class was divided and Luman Richards was appointed leader of the north class. February 12, 1836, John Houghland, David Ormiston and Luman Richards were appointed a committee to make arrangements for building a new church in Barlow.

The site of the present church was selected and deeded by Jesse Lawton and John M. Procter to John Houghland, Luman Richards, David Ormiston, Daniel Goss and Jacob Bridges, trustees.

After the erection of the present church, the north class, when not favored with preaching at the church, held prayer meeting at the North school house, located near Edward Tomkin's old residence.

In 1836 the name of the circuit was changed to Belpre, with William P. Strickland and Dudley Woodbridge, ministers and John Ferree, presiding elder.

At a quarterly conference held at Barlow July 15, 1837, the first Missionary Society was formed with John Ferree, president, William P. Strickland, vice-president, Cromwell Culver, secretary and Luman Richards, treasurer. The first Sabbath-school report, made at this meeting, reported Sabbath-schools, six, officers, teachers and scholars, 252, volumes in library, 514, amount collected $38.10. This was for the entire circuit. In 1838 Mathew Scovel and Sheldon Parker were sent to the circuit with Samuel Hamilton, presiding elder. At the commencement of a protracted meeting in Barlow, Miss Roxana Devol, a very zealous church worker, was teaching our schools. She became so interested in the conversion of her scholars that she called the attention of the school to the subject of religion and earnestly entreated each one to seek Christ as their Savior and to make his service the main object of their lives. Her appeal was so earnest and sincere that it made a lasting impress on all present. The result was the conversion of a large portion of the school. Owing to the many additions at this time, a third class was formed which was known as the central class, with Benjamin Baker, Jr., leader.

In the summer of 1840 the old parsonage was built and was first occupied by Mr. and Mrs. James B. Austin. Their memories are still cherished by all who knew them. In 1843 the name of the circuit was changed to Barlow, with Andrew S. Murphy and Richard A. Arthur, ministers and R. O. Spencer, presiding elder. Two cupola meetings were held on the Houghland farm a short distance southwest of the cemetery. At this time Benjamin Baker resigned his office of leader of the central class and Joseph Palmer was appointed.

In the spring of 1848, John Houghland removed to Guyandotte, (West) Virginia, and Darius Baker was appointed leader of the south class, which office was filled by him and Sion Evans until 1860, when John Milligan was appointed. In 1848, Luman Richards resigned and David Huffman was appointed leader of the north class. From 1852 to 1859 the Barlow circuit was regularly filled by A. Cartlich, W. W. Cherrington and Levi Munsell. During the pastorate of J. L. Durant—the trustees, Daniel Canfield, John Milligan, Joseph Palmer and David Huffman—rebuilt the old church, adding cupola and bell in 1872.

At the death of David Huffman, Lewis Lawton was appointed leader of the north class. In 1874 J. C. Arbuckle was sent to the circuit. During his pastorate an organ was placed in the church by the Ladies' Social of Barlow. Ezekiel Canfield was the first organist, Mrs. T. J. Nourse from 1875 to 1878, Miss Fannie Lasure until 1881, Miss Anna Ford until 1883, Miss Blanch Riggs until 1891, Miss Edna Ford until 1896. Since 1896 the organ has been presided over by Miss Bessie Ford with Rena Steed, assistant. This society has given to the church in the past, Mighill Dustin, Charles H.

Lawton and Richard A. Huffman, who proved to be very effective ministers, and, recently, Daniel D. Canfield. As local preachers Rev. Elza Houghland, late of Fort Madison, Iowa, Gabriel Raine and Elias Davis. In the past, our church has lost many members by emigration, and lastly though not least by the formation of the church in Vincent. The leaders in recent years are all so familiar that I did not think it advisable to take up time in rehearsing them. I should state that the church was thoroughly repaired during the pastorate of Rev. J. L. Landsittle. Our parsonage at present is located in Barlow village.

The Palmer Methodist Episcopal Church.

It is not supposed that there was preaching as early as 1788 here except on this circuit. There is a correct record of the church—and when this place had preaching first—as it was written out in the history of Palmer township for the Centennial and it is in Marietta now. In the same book in which Joseph Palmer kept the above record, he writes: "Dedication of the new meeting house in Marietta November 7th, 1841, by David Young from Psalms 132, 17; by Bishop Hamlin Psalms 8:4 'What is man that thou art mindful of him?' also Romans 8:7, 'Because the carnal mind is enmity against God;' also Matt. 11.29, 'Take my yoke upon you and learn of me, for I am meek and lowly of heart, and ye shall find rest unto your souls.'"

The Palmer Church spoken of and discussed through the Register by several was built during the year 1837; the money for the building was raised by subscription; the list is still preserved. The house was made upon honor, the frame heavy and strong, the inside ceiling of pine, the land donated by Isaac Palmer, and the property deeded to the Methodist Episcopal Church January 4, 1838. The church stood as built with some small repairs but no change, until 1873, when the people of this place organized a Mite Society, the proceeds to be used to give the house a thorough repairing; all took an active part, not only church members but those that were not working for the interests of the church and its people; after the Mite Society began the work, there was soon a sufficient sum raised so that in 1877 the house was repaired, weather-boarded and painted on the outside, house raised, inside plastered, re-seated and furnished at a cost amounting to $380.85. Many of our most influential members have been taken from us by death, but others take their places. In 1892 the Society again repaired the church, painted both out and inside, carpeted it anew, and put in an organ; still it is the same old church—nothing left but the massive frame of former years. In the past 20 years, the Mite Society has benefited the church and Sabbath-school $840.72, and yet we have been set down as "devoid of religion;" yet we strictly adhere to the rule "Do unto others as you would that they should do unto you." "Love thy neighbor as thyself" and especially "Bear ye one another's burdens."

The African Methodist Episcopal Church.

It is not definitely known when the African Methodist Episcopal Church was formally organized, but meetings were probably held as early as 1860, at first in private houses, and later in the lecture room of the Baptist Church. The membership was small, but in 1895 the "Old School" Presbyterian Church on Third street was purchased. The membership has steadily increased, and much good has been accomplished. The Sunday-school has a good number of attendants, and a small library.

The Wesleyan Methodist Church.

Among colored circles the Wesleyan Methodist Church, situated on Second street, between Sacra Via and Montgomery streets, is an important factor. Services were first held in a building on Third street, above Scammel, and next in a school building on the corner of Third and Scammel streets. The old engine house on Fourth street was next purchased, and moved to Second street, on the location of the present church structure. Services were held in that building for a number of years, until about four years ago, when during the eldership of Rev. Amos Lawrence, the present church edifice was erected. Funds for the new building were raised by the members, and also by a number of church entertainments. The church building is neat and comfortable, and the church society is large and flourishing. The church has an excellent choir, and a large Sabbath-school.

The First Presbyterian Church.

Presbyterianism was late in effecting a permanent organization in Marietta. There seem to have been those of Presbyterian preferences among the early settlers, for a movement toward the forming of a second church organization, Presbyterian in polity, in the lately founded village was started in 1803, under Rev. Stephen Lindley. A church building was begun on lower Third street, near the river, but was never finished. It is doubtful whether a regular organization was effected, and in 1816 the enterprise was given up. For many years the Presbyterians in Marietta worshiped with the old Congregational Church. It is well known that early in the last century, under the so-called "Plan of Union," the relations between Presbyterianism and Congregationalism were very close, and Presbyterians, coming to Marietta, were quite content with the already existing church, which they regarded as practically their own. But as the city grew in population, the separation was sure to come, that it was so long delayed proves how harmonious the relations were. In 1841 a Presbyterian Church connected with the "Old School" branch was established; a house of worship was built on Third street, and services were held there for some time. The building is now owned by the African Methodist Episcopal Church. This little Presbyterian Church ceased its separate existence after a few years, but was united with the Beech Grove Presbyterian Church, about six miles to the east of the city. On several later occasions the suggestion of a Presbyterian organization was made, but nothing further was done until 1865.

In the summer of that year, a favorable opportunity having occurred, the movement started again, and this time it succeeded. On August 27th the church was organized with 53 members, and was shortly after received by the Presbytery of Athens, of which it is still a part. Of these 53, the names of 14 still stand on the church's roll; probably a third of the rest are living. The first elders elected were Silas Slocomb and Sala Bosworth, both now deceased. The first trustees were J. D. Cotton, M. D., Silas Slocomb, R. R. Dawes, Stephen Newton, and G. N. Eells. Rev. Henry Ballantine, D. D., now of Baltimore, Maryland, was called to the pastorate, and the building now owned by the Central Christian Church was erected and dedicated January 28, 1866. In June, 1869, after a most successful work, Rev. Mr. Ballantine resigned, on account of impaired health, and in the following September Rev. William Addy, D. D., was called. His long and blessed pastorate continued for 22 years, but in December, 1891, this good man passed away to his reward. During this period the present parsonage was purchased, and the church enlarged. In June, 1892, Rev. William E. Roe, D. D., was installed as pastor, which office he still occupies. In June, 1897, the present handsome stone building was dedicated, and the name, previously "The Fourth Street Presbyterian Church," was changed to "The First Presbyterian Church of Marietta." Subsequently a fine organ was put in, largely through a bequest of the late Miss Mary Cone, of Marietta, and the debt, resting on the church was provided for.

The present membership is slightly over 300; since the beginning 800 in all have been connected with the church. At present the elders are Stephen Newton, Charles H. Newton, Elmer M. Monfort, Clifford E. Corwin, and Charles D. Webster. Quite recently H. B. Shipman, an elder for many years, passed away. The trustees of the church are J. D. Cotton, president; Charles H. Newton, secretary; T. M. Sheets, treasurer; W. F. Robertson, L. J. Cutter, G. B. Sunderland, and M. F. Noll. The Sunday-school numbers 240; the superintendent is Clifford E. Corwin. The president of the Christian Endeavor Society is William Wagner; of the Women's Foreign Missionary Society, Mrs. W. E. Roe; of the Women's Home Missionary Society, Miss S. J. Cutler; of the Ladies' Aid Society, Mrs. A. W. Hutchison.

With a central situation, complete equipment, and a united people, its early struggles past and on the pleasantest terms with all its sister churches, the Presbyterian Church looks forward most hopefully to its future work, believing that it will not be unimportant.

The First Unitarian Society of Marietta.

On January 30, 1855, the following call appeared in the Marietta Intelligencer:

Be it remembered, that on the 30th day of January, 1855, a call was issued by the undersigned, to a meeting of the friends of God in Unity and not in Trinity, in accordance with the plain, unmythified letter of the Bible. I shall be at the court room of the Court House, on Saturday next, Feb. 3, at seven o'clock, P. M., that we may exchange Christian views of our duty to God and man, and then and there agree, if we can, upon our future course.

In accordance with the above notice, a few friends assembled at the appointed hour, and were addressed by Mr. Ward in regard to the object of the meeting; after which he submitted the following, as a basis of organization for a society:

We, the undersigned, citizens of Marietta and vicinity, in the county of Washington and State of Ohio, Believing in the Unity, and in the paternal character and merciful government of God; in man's natural capacity of virtue, and liability to sin; in the supernatural authority of Jesus Christ, as a teacher sent from God; in his divine mission as a Redeemer; in his moral perfection as an Example; in the remedial as well as retributive office and intention of the divine punishment in the soul's immediate ascension, on release from the body, to its account and reward; and that salvation rests, not on superficial observance of rites or on intellectual assent to creeds, or on any arbitrary decrees, but, under the grace of God, on the rightness of the ruling affection, on humble faithfulness of life, and integral goodness of character:—

Overlooking all minor differences, sinking all alienating controversies, in the generous and conciliatory spirit that becomes us best, that we may go forth and live the Christian life,—not as a form, but a principle, —with a warmer philanthropy, a holier conservatism, a deeper piety, a more united front, than we have yet shown; in the fear and affection of God, in the faith and love of Christ:—

Do form and organize ourselves, and such persons as may hereafter unite with us, into a church and society, to be known and called the "First Unitarian Society in Marietta."—

The foregoing basis of organization being then signed by a number of persons, Nahum Ward was elected chairman, and John C. McCoy, Jr., secretary.

A code of by-laws was then adopted for the government of the Society, and in pursuance of the provisions of the first by-law, Nahum Ward, William S. Ward and John C. McCoy, Jr., were elected the first Board of Trustees.

The church building was begun on July 2, 1855, when the first corner stone was laid, and from that time until its dedication, June 4, 1857, the work was pushed steadily forward. The entire cost of this splendid structure, with furnishings, including an organ which at the time was the finest in the city, together with the lot upon which the building stands, amounting to about $25,000, was contributed by Mr. Ward.

The dedicatory services were conducted by Rev. S. K. Lothrop, D. D., President of the American Unitarian Association, assisted by Rev. Drs. Miles, of Boston, Ellis, of Charlestown, and Burnap, of Baltimore. At the commencement of these services, Mr. Ward made a formal presentation of a deed of the property to the trustees of the society.

In June, 1856, William S. Ward was elected treasurer of the society, which position he filled until the time of his death. During his life time, Mr. Ward made a gift to the society of the lot adjoining the church, upon which the parsonage now stands, besides providing by his will a fund that went far towards paying for the parsonage itself. He was the first superintendent of the Sunday-school and remained in that position until his death.

Rev. Rushton D. Burr was the first settled minister. He was followed by W. L. Gage, after whom came in course E. C. Guild, I. J. Mumford, J. M. Windsor, F. May Holland, E. W. Hathaway, W. C. Fismey, J. Riley Johnson, C. H. Dutton, F. S. Thatcher, J. T. Lusk and E. A. Coil, the present pastor.

Among those who were active in the early support and management of its affairs were Gen. I. C. H. Smith, Capt. J. F. Huntington, Theodore Scott, William Warren, Dr. Felix Regnier, Judge Davis Green, James M. Booth, Capt. Owen Franks, James Holden, J. W. Baldwin, Capt. Beale Whittlesey, A. S. Curtis, J. J. Brennan and many others.

In May, 1869, a union between the Society and the "First Universalist Church of Marietta," was consummated for the purpose of jointly carrying on the work of the societies. This union has proven a most happy one and today it would be difficult to point out those who belong to the one or the other of these two faiths.

The Society from its organization has been an efficient agent for good in the community, carrying on to the extent of its ability all the departments of religious and charitable work. It has been especially prosperous during the administration of Rev. Mr. Coil, and is at this time stronger in every respect than ever before.

Probably no citizen of Washington County except the late Douglas Putnam, ever contributed so much for religious and charitable purposes as the founder of this church. He deserves especial praise for his large-hearted generosity, but as proper mention is made of him elsewhere in this history nothing further will be said here of him or his work.

The Universalist Society.

A Universalist Society was organized in Marietta in 1817. On the 2nd of February, 1832, the Legislature passed an act to incorporate the "First Universalist Religious Library Association, of Marietta." It was the purpose of the Society to build up a large collection of valuable miscellaneous books, and to this object the property which annually accrued to the Society was appropriated. The more prominent members were Griffin Greene, Jr., James M. Booth, Stephen P. Hildreth, Argalus Pixley, Louis Mixer and Count de Bonny. It is not known just when the Society began to hold religious services. The frame church, on Second street, was built in 1842. It was dedicated by Rev. J. T. Flanders, who was then regular pastor. One room of this building was fitted for the library, and used for that purpose until the books were destroyed during the flood in April, 1860. In March, 1850, the Western Liberal Institute was established and placed under the care of this church.

The ministers prior to the union with the Unitarian Society were: J. T. Flanders, George S. Weaver, T. C. Eaton, Mr. Bartlett, Thomas Barton, Mr. Hicks, J. M. McMaster and J. W. Henley. The church, previous to the destruction of the library, in which the ministerial funds of 30 years had been invested, was in a very flourishing condition. The library contained about 3,000 volumes, and many liberal Christians supported the Society that they might receive in return the benefits of the library.

In the spring of 1869 a successful movement was set on foot for uniting the First Unitarian Society and the First Universalist Church into one society, which since that date has maintained public worship in the church edifice erected by Mr. Ward.

First United Brethren Church.

The United Brethren Church was organized with a membership of about 90 sometime during the winter of 1857. In the early part of the winter a series of protracted meetings were commenced, which resulted in one of the greatest revivals ever known in Marietta. This revival increased the membership to nearly 200. It was deemed advisable by these converts and others who had taken part in the meetings to organize a church independent of the Wesleyan Methodist, whose pastor had conducted the protracted meetings, and a vote taken for the purpose, showed a decided partiality for the United Brethren, and the conference at its next session formally received the new organization as the United Brethren Church of Marietta. A new chapel affords the congregation, now a large one, a comfortable place for services.

CHAPTER XV.

THE PRESS.

Probably the leading factor which makes and signifies a country's development, intellectually, commercially, and politically, is the news paper. It is both the cause and the effect of a permanent and substantial upbuilding of a community, and bears much on its face of the surroundings in which it has its existence. A newspaper may be pretty thoroughly relied upon to express what manner of people compose the moral, social, and business make-up of a settlement, be it large or small.

It seems scarcely within the realm of belief to think that here at the confluence of the Ohio and Muskingum rivers—a locality that in the beginning of the 19th century was considered to be on the frontier, at the very outposts of civilization—there should be erected such an institution as a newspaper, but such is the fact, for the year 1801 was witness to the establishment of a newspaper which exists today, and bears every evidence of permanency.

The white people who first came into this valley were of New England stock—Yankees; and associated with their fortitude and thrift was that desire to keep in the very front line as regards education and the dissemination of intelligence and information. The result of this feeling was the establishing in the "Stockade" on the north side of Washington street, between Front and Second streets, of the Ohio Gazette and Virginia Herald, a name assumed doubtless for the promotion and perpetuation of a friendliness between the people on both sides of the Ohio. Wyllis Silliman and Elijah Backus were the owners and editors—dividing their time between the practice of law and the promulgation of intelligence. The paper was born December 18, 1801, and its size was by no means commensurate with the length of its name; for compared with our papers of the present day, it was a mere leaflet, containing little that would appeal to the tastes of the present day readers. Most of the matter pertained to the doings of the East—particularly Congress, and miscellany of a not particularly attractive kind occupied a portion of the space each week. About all that pertained to local affairs were the meagre advertisements or legal notices. The papers of that time could not strictly be termed newspapers, for the happenings recorded were in most cases weeks old, and were obtainable only through the slow channels operating in that day.

Writing in those days bore a different appearance from that we now are accustomed to follow. It had in it a dignity and grace which would seem to befit the powdered wig, the ruffled shirt, the knee breeches, and the buckled shoes. The editor seemed by his expressions to be in court attire with a lexicon of polished phrases and "Chesterfield's Letters," at his elbow. His position in his community must have given just cause for jealousy on the part of the village blacksmith, whose prestige had heretofore been indisputable.

The outfit on which was printed the Gazette (for short) was purchased by Messrs. Silliman and Backus in Philadelphia, and was very simple and crude as compared with the plants of today. The press was of wood with a flat stone for its bed, and to "pull" a sheet was an involved operation, requiring the undivided attention of a man and boy; the man inserting the same between type and platen, pulling several hundred pounds at a big lever to give the impression, then releasing and returning the frame to a position for taking out the printed sheet and to make room for its successor. The boy spent his time inking the types, either with balls of buckskin or a roller made of a composition of glue and molasses.

The early editor was necessarily not particular as to what he did, for he could not act in any one particular capacity. He was editorial writer, news compositor, "ad"-setter, pressman, roller-maker, machinist, circulation man, and about everything but "devil." This latter, functionary did the coarser work about the place; and no doubt in his thoughtful moments looked upon the editor as a god, occupying an exalted position in whose direction he humbly wished his toes to point.

In 1803 Mr. Backus was elected to the State Senate and later moved to Pittsburgh where in 1807 or 1808 he died. Mr. Silliman, the other member of this firm of publishers, also enjoyed political honors—serving in the State Legislature in 1803, and afterward going to Zanesville where he held the position of registrar in the Land Office, a political place given to him under Jefferson, whom he and his partner supported.

In 1803 Backus purchased Silliman's interest in the newspaper, and enjoyed the distinction of being sole owner of the institution until 1805, when he sold to Samuel Fairlamb, of Philadelphia. This gentleman handled the property until 1810. He seemed not to have made a conspicuous success of his venture, for we hear of him making his home later in the Muskingum County Infirmary, at which place he died. After leaving Marietta, Fairlamb led a life of a varied sort, we presume something like that of the tramp printer of today. (We believe that this cult is at this time growing beautifully less in numbers, for most offices of any proportion employ machine labor, and talent is required that will remain at work after the machine is learned.)

In 1807 the Gazette had the usual thing happen to it. This event was the establishment of an opposition paper, called The Commentator and Marietta Recorder. The institution carried this burden of name until 1809, when because of lack of support it said its valedictory. It was published by Dunham & Gardiner, the latter a printer of prominence, from Xenia and Columbus.

The year 1810 witnessed a shaking up in the affairs of the Gazette, for the income of cash or cordwood was so light that the sheriff of the county, generally considered the printer's greatest friend (if he's on the same side politically), had to sell the institution at public sale. After a few weeks with no local newspaper, the Western Spectator came into the field, employing, we presume, the physical effects of the old Gazette, and doubtless using its very limited subscription list. The Spectator was edited by Caleb Emerson, one of the strongest men of his time, a man whose personality combined many high qualities. He was an attorney of ability and a writer of grace. His paper was Federalist in politics, and bore the legend at its head "Be Just and Fear Not." While Mr. Emerson was editor, Joseph Israel was the publisher of the sheet during its first year, after which he sold his interest to Thomas G. Ransom.

In 1813 the Spectator was merged into the American Friend, which was started as a Republican paper, supporting Madison's administration. Thomas G. Ransom was the printer, and the editorial staff consisted of David Everett, Timothy Buell and Daniel H. Buell. To Everett is credited the authorship of the well-known lines, beginning, "You'd scarce expect one of my age." Everett had been a teacher at Ipswich, New Hampshire, and he wrote the lines for a boy pupil to recite as a public address. Everett was a man of genius and learning, having studied law at Amherst and having afterward served with distinction as an editor of a Boston newspaper. The rigorous climate of the Northern Atlantic Coast States compelled him to seek a more salubrious spot, and he chose young Marietta, but that did not prevent the ensuing of death by consumption in December, 1813, at the age of 44 years.

After the death of Everett, Daniel H. Buell became editor of the American Friend and so continued for a few months, when the Buells took in as a partner, Royal Prentiss, one of the best known and capable of Marietta's early printers and editors. In 1816 Prentiss bought the interest of the Buells and continued as sole owner until 1833 when he sold the property to Delafield & Nye. For a period of time that Mr. Prentiss owned the Friend, it was edited and printed in the house on Fifth street now owned and occupied by Mrs. S. S. Knowles. Mr. Prentiss possibly made too much of a paper for his time, for he gave as his reason for selling that the profits were so light he could no longer in justice to himself continue in that line of business.

John Delafield, one of the new owners of the Friend, was from New York; and his partner, Edward W. Nye, was a Mariettian, of pioneer stock. The new firm edited and printed the paper, which they called simply the Marietta Gazette, until 1837. During a portion of this time there was associated with them a strolling printer named Pazzi Lapham, but he remained but a short time, doubtless moving on to the next experiment looking for a harvest of elusive gold.

Isaac Maxon was the next man to own the Gazette, having bought the property in 1837 from Delafield & Nye. Mr. Maxon conducted the sheet, assisted by William D. and Caleb Emerson, until 1842, when there appeared on the scene Edmund B. Flagg, a young man from Maine, and a graduate of Bowdoin College. Flagg distinguished himself in many literary ways, having run the gamut of letters from news to novels. In 1850 he was consul to Venice; and he wrote an interesting book with that romantic city as its theme.

In 1842 the Gazette lost its name, having been merged into the Intelligencer, a rival that had been started in 1839 by Beman Gates, one of the strongest editors and polished gentlemen who have appeared in Marietta journalism.

Maxon in the Gazette, in 1839, a few days before the appearance of Mr. Gates' Intelligencer, in the field, had the following to say concerning his expected competitor:

We understand the newspaper, the Marietta Intelligencer, is to appear next week. This paper is to eclipse everything, exterminate Democracy, astonish the natives, and swallow the Gazette with all its appendages. It has been argued to some of our subscribers that they might as well discontinue the Gazette and subscribe for the Intelligencer because the Gazette must stop at all events. Had not the gentlemen better stay their judgment for a time, and see if the community will that we shall be crushed in order to rear a favorite upon the ruins?

Maxon and his successor, Flagg, clung to a vain hope for three years, when, as before mentioned, the Gazette and its appendages were swallowed by the Intelligencer.

Beman Gates, then scarcely 21 years of age with no means at hand, was the first editor of the Intelligencer. Associated with him in the paper as partners in the business were George W. and Charles D. Tyler, two brothers, and most excellent printers. Mr. Gates did the literary work, and the Tylers took care of the publication of the paper. The Tylers raised $600 (selling their homes to get the money), and Beman Gates added to this meagre amount the sum of $300, which he had borrowed from a friend. A "Washington" hand press was bought, as was also type of a large face, paper and ink. With this slight equipment was printed what soon became the best newspaper property in Marietta. It was a larger sheet than had appeared as yet—was well edited, and printed in a workmanlike manner. The subscription price of the paper was $2 a year.

In his salutatory Mr. Gates had the following to say concerning the new paper:

The general plan upon which this paper will be conducted has been set forth in the prospectus. The subscriber, in commencing his duties as editor, wishes it to be distinctly understood that he has no prejudices to foster, no partialities to indulge, and no invidious feelings to gratify. He is perfectly willing to be advised in regard to the manner of conducting it, but, after all, his own judgment must decide what course duty requires him to pursue. He will not suffer himself to be influenced by the opinions of others in any way incompatible with perfect freedom of thought and action. He speaks particularly on this point, because he has been charged with being under the control of influential men in this town.

In politics his motto will be, "Willing to Praise, but not afraid to Blame." He will be equally ready to bestow praise upon his political enemies, when merited, or censure upon his friends, when necessary. It will therefore be conducted with impartial liberality, and no effort shall be wanting on the part of the subscriber to render it distinguished by its practical utility.

Temperate and well-written communications upon any subject that shall be deemed of general interest, will be thankfully received and inserted.

With this brief statement, the first number of the Intelligencer is offered to the public, that by it they may judge of its merits and of the claims it has upon their patronage.

One year after starting, the Intelligencer had 300 subscribers, but during 1840, the year of the Harrison campaign, the paper's circulation was more than doubled; and its success was well marked and not less merited.

Mr. Gates had an ambition to supply to the public a real newspaper—one which should cover the doings of the week both at home and abroad. Besides being a chronicle of the events in the town, the young editor received regularly from Pittsburgh, Columbus, and Cincinnati, communications which related to business, society and state. When Taylor was inducted into the White House as President, Mr. Gates received the President's message by wire and printed the same in his paper—a feat that was considered at that time as an astounding piece of newspaper enterprise. So it was, too, for the provincial editor had as high ambition, and served his constituency as well in many respects as did the managers of the newspapers in cities of greater pretensions. It was not long that Mr. Gates kept up the use of wires, for with the advent of the Marietta & Cincinnati Railroad came the great dailies from the latter-named city. The foreign news was read in these, and the Intelligencer became a purely local paper.

Beman Gates was born January 5, 1818, in Montague, Franklin County, Massachusetts. With his father he moved in 1835 to Connecticut, and in 1837, with a brother-in-law, came to what was in those days considered "the West."

Mr. Gates' destination was Knoxville, Tennessee, but he was pleased with Marietta, and illness coming upon his brother-in-law, both were detained here. Mr. Gates found work in the county recorder's office. He also taught music, and for years conducted a singing school which was a popular institution, and is spoken of at this day by the elderly people, who have many fond memories clustering about the school and its master schooled in old-fashioned politeness.

In 1856 Mr. Gates sold the Intelligencer to Dr. T. L. Andrews, who conducted the paper until 1862, when a new Richmond came into the field in the person of Rodney M. Stimson, who came from Ironton, Lawrence County, Ohio, and had been founder and editor of the Ironton Register. Mr. Stimson was a man born to the purpose of editing a newspaper, and he had the information and the style to hold a most exalted position upon a metropolitan paper or periodical. He threw his personality into the paper, and made it shine with the good things from his bright mind. The first thing he did was to change the name of the paper to the Marietta Register, which name it holds to-day.

Rodney Metcalf Stimson was born at Milford, New Hampshire, October 26, 1822, the son of Phineas Stimson and Rhoda Metcalf—both children of soldiers of the Revolution. Mr. Stimson attended school in the East, including Phillips Exeter Academy. In 1845 he came to Marietta College, being graduated in 1847. His first work was teaching country schools, after which he read law and was admitted of the bar of Marietta in 1849; later he went to Ironton, where on August 1, 1850, he started the Ironton Register, which paper he conducted for 12 years.

Mr. Stimson was married July 23, 1851, to Juliette B. Hurd, of Ironton, who died January 19, 1861. The son, Milford, that was born to them, died in Cincinnati in 1890. October 28, 1862, our subject was married to Julia I. Sheppard, of Marietta. One daughter, Elizabeth Gillet Corwin, was born to the union. Mr. and Mrs. Stimson, Mr. and Mrs. Corwin and two children—Julia Stimson and Rodney Stimson form at present the interesting household of Mr. Stimson.

Mr. Stimson was not only a man peculiarly fitted to the business of conducting a newspaper, but he was a politician as well, and the people of his county were not long in recognizing his ability as a public servant. In 1869 he was elected to the Ohio Legislature as Senator from this district and was re-elected to the position in 1871. He served also in the Republican National Conventions, as delegate, which nominated John C. Fremont and James A. Garfield for the Presidency. He was delegate from Washington County to the Ohio State Republican Convention 17 times; and was the author of the Republican State platform in 1873, the same being unanimously adopted without the change of a word. In 1881 Mr. Stimson was tendered the office of Assistant Librarian of Congress, but he declined, as did he also a place in the U. S. Treasury Department which carried with it a salary of $3,000 a year and expenses. Mr. Stimson was librarian of the Ohio State Library for the years 1877-79, and was retired because he was on the wrong side of the fence from the powers that were.

In March, 1881, Mr. Stimson accepted the position of librarian of Marietta College at a salary of $600 per year, a position he held until 1892, when he resigned. In 1900 Mr. Stimson presented to Marietta College his magnificent private library, which contained over 19,000 volumes—over 1,000 of which related directly to the Civil War and slavery—the most complete of its kind in any private collection.

May 20, 1872, the Register changed hands again—Mr. Stimson selling the property to E. R. Alderman & Company. Of this new firm the company was Joseph W. Dumble, who in 1875 withdrew from the firm to become owner of the Middleport Republican.

Mr. Alderman was born August 29, 1839, near Athens, Ohio, and the early years of his life were spent amid the most primitive surroundings. While yet a boy he was thrown upon his own resources, but he had the stuff in him of which men of strong character are made. As a young man he taught school in Washington County; later he kept store at Racine, Meigs County, coming to Marietta in 1867. Here he engaged in the insurance business until 1872, when he with Mr. Dumble bought the Register.

Mr. Alderman's management of the Register was distinguished by particularly good business direction; and the property, already well established, grew harder and more influential with the passage of time. The paper was printed as a weekly until 1883, when it was changed to a semi-weekly, which it continued to be until 1889, when it was issued tri-weekly. In June, 1894, the Register appeared as a daily evening paper, and continues as such at the present time, enjoying an extensive circulation with consequent influence.

E. R. Alderman, from the date of his assuming editorial duties to the time of his death—June 1, 1901—made it his whole duty and his pride to see the Register prosper; and in his editorial work he spared not the person whom he thought at fault. He was a virile writer and phrased his ideas in good, clean English. At the time of the establishment of the daily, the ownership was merged into a stock company, the holders of shares being E. R. Alderman, L. A. Alderman, A. D. Alderman, E. S. Alderman, William Sharp and D. R. Gerken. Since the death of Mr. Alderman, the paper has been managed—ably, too—by his son, A. D. Alderman, who possesses the fearlessness of his father, and in whose ambition to make the Register prosper is fully as great as was that of his father. Mr. Alderman, as editor and manager, is ably assisted in the editorial department by John W. Lansley, who spent his early life in Beverly; and in the business department by D. R. Gerken, who is a native of Marietta.

Alva Dean Alderman, editor-manager of the Register, was born at Racine, Meigs County, Ohio, October 21, 1864. He came, with his parents to Marietta in 1867. He attended both a private school, conducted by the Misses Eells, and the public schools of Marietta, later going to the Academy of Marietta College. After preparing himself for college, Mr. Alderman attended Phillips Academy at Andover, Massachusetts, where he took a literary and scientific course.

In 1884 Mr. Alderman went into the office of the Register, where he began the actual work of reporting. He had at times prior worked about the office, so that he had a comprehensive idea of the mechanical part of the issuing of a newspaper. For years after undertaking the work of reporting, the news portion of the Register was in charge of A. D. Alderman, and for two years prior to his father's death, he was in entire charge of the paper. Much of the modern machinery installed in the past few years is the result of his motion.

Mr. Alderman was married October 7, 1886, to Elizabeth Comly McCoy, eldest daughter of the late William W. and Elizabeth (Davis) McCoy, the latter of whom survives.

Three children were the result of this union: Comly Dean, born July 5, 1887; Gladys Marjorie, born December 13, 1891; and Royal McCoy, born August 16, 1896.

Mr. Alderman is with his wife a member of the First Congregational Church of Marietta. Mr. Alderman is an Elk and a member of the Royal Arcanum. He was the first chief of Marietta's paid fire department, serving from 1894 to 1898, and having served for years prior as a volunteer fireman. As chief, he quite distinguished himself by his arduous conduct, and in one fire he met with an accident which nearly cost him his life, after which, because of injuries and press of business, he tendered his resignation.

Mr. Alderman is quite a factor in politics, both local and State. He was a member of the Republican State Central Committee, in 1898; and in 1899 he was a member of the State Executive Committee, and in 1902 he was chosen to act in a similar capacity. He is a member of the Board of Trade, and in his capacity as member and newspaper man he has done much to secure industries for Marietta.

Thus runs the story of the Register to date. It is a particularly interesting one, having covered next to the longest period of any paper in Ohio—the Scioto Gazette, of Chillicothe, being the only paper that antedates it.

The next oldest newspaper now published in Marietta is the Times, a Democratic paper—the only one of that political tendency (printed in the English language) in Washington County.

The Times made its first appearance September 24, 1864, with Walter C. Hood as owner and editor. Mr. Hood was born in Demorest, Perry County, Ohio, and was a man peculiarly adapted to the editorial work of a newspaper. He was an odd man, who had his own ideas of the world and society; and who combated that which he thought wrong with an ardor and vigor that marked the real genius. As a business man his career was not distinguished by particular success; but he was a man of the utmost probity—and with his intelligence he commanded the largest respect. Mr. Hood was a true type of the old-fashioned man. He had a rather plain face, was deaf, and had a peculiarly rasping voice. When he spoke, however, the people listened, and it was generally to their advantage so to do. He was critical of the lighter affairs of life, and was constantly, in his talk with friends, saying sarcastic things about society and other things artificial. He detested pride, and for that which was not genuine he had the utmost abhorrence. The writer once heard him say that if he was to have his portrait painted he would want every "crow's-foot" to be put in about his eyes, so that the likeness might be true, and show him exactly as he was. This remark but showed how he felt on all things, and he was thoroughly consistent. Mr. Hood went from here to Jackson County, where he died; and the people there thought so well of him that over his burial place in Oak Grove Cemetery, Marietta, they caused to be erected a handsome granite monument.

After Mr. Hood left Marietta, which was in 1871, he held the office of State Librarian, under Gov. William Allen. He died while in office in 1875.

In the year 1871 Mr. Hood sold the Times to S. M. McMillen, a native of Pennsylvania, having been born there August 19, 1840. With only a short experience in the business of issuing a newspaper, Mr. McMillen entered upon the duties as editor. He brought a rugged nature to bear upon the paper and the party, exercising more policy than did his predecessor, Mr. Hood, with the result that he built up a good paying property. His was the only paper of its complexion in Washington County, and with his fine sense of policy—knowing what to do at the proper time, and how to do it—what "Mac" said generally followed, to such effect that during his regime members of his party were elevated to office in many instances.

In 1890 Mr. McMillen sold the Times to Benjamin J. McKinney, a citizen of this county.

Mr. McMillen went from Marietta to Springfield, Ohio, where he owned and operated the Springfield Democrat, a daily of consequence in the party both in Clark County and in the State. Mr. McMillen later sold this paper and went to Mansfield, where he bought a paper and again sold, in order that he and his family might go to Europe, there to live and educate the youngest son, Francis, who at the age of five years showed great aptitude for the violin, and who now at the age of 17 bids fair to rival the world's greatest performers on that most difficult instrument. At this writing Mr. McMillen is still abroad.

Benjamin J. McKinney, the present owner of the Times, and its editor as well, was born in Virginia in 1850, the son of William P. and Indiana (Jackson) McKinney, both of whom were Virginians by birth. The subject of our sketch spent his days in Virginia until the age of 15, when he came to Belpre, this county, where he completed the course offered by the common schools. Later he enjoyed a course of business training at a prominent commercial college of Pittsburgh. With these qualifications, supported by an unusually bright mind, young McKinney entered the business world by securing a position as book-keeper in the Parkersburg National Bank, and he filled the place satisfactorily for a period of about six years. At the age of 26 Mr. McKinney was elected, on the Democratic ticket, to the office of auditor of Washington County, and succeeded himself at the close of his first term by an increased majority—a fact which spoke well of his proficiency and satisfactory conduct of the office. After serving as auditor of Washington County two terms, Mr. McKinney was appointed chief clerk in the Auditor of State's office at Columbus, and remained there for a period of four years. He returned to Marietta at the time he gave up the chief clerkship with the expectation of entering the work of newspaper-making, and overtures were made between himself and Mr. McMillen to such effect that August 1, 1890, saw Mr. McKinney the owner and editor of the Times. Into the Times, which had but a short time before been completely overhauled as to machinery and equipment, Mr. McKinney put his time and his talents. He is a writer of particular force, his editorial work showing a sarcastic quality that to the operator of a newspaper is a possession carrying no inconsiderable effect to the reader. In 1898 Mr. McKinney was a member of the Ohio Centennial Commission appointed by Bushnell, but later dissolved by act of Legislature.

The Times up to October 20, 1898, was a weekly, at which time it was issued as a daily and weekly. The daily is printed in the evening, and enjoys good support among the people, especially within the party.

In 1871 Mr. McKinney was married to Florence Browning, daughter of A. H. and Augusta S. Browning, of Belpre. Together they lived devotedly until the summer of 1902, when Mrs. McKinney died.

To Mr. and Mrs. McKinney was born an interesting family of eleven children, as follows: Helen, born January 18, 1872 (deceased 1901); Grace, born November 14, 1873 (deceased 1882); Stella, born February 14, 1875 (deceased 1898); Frank B., born November 4, 1876; Florence, born April 11, 1878; May, born April 13, 1880; William P., born April 24, 1882; Louise, born February 4, 1884;

B. Jackson, born September 20, 1886; Frances, born September 17, 1888; and Harriet, born November 30, 1892.

The next paper in point of age is the Marietta Zeitung, a paper printed in the German language, and published by Jacob Mueller. The Zeitung was first issued in 1868 with E. Winchester as its projector and manager. The editor of the paper at the time of starting was F. Neuberger, a German of education and ability. The paper had a clientele from the start, there being many German-Americans in Washington County; but Mr. Winchester had not the best ideas of direction, and no knowledge of German, so the paper led only a partially successful career until March, 1869, when the property was purchased by Jacob Mueller. Mr. Mueller, together with his son, Louis, gave personal attention to the business, and it was not long till the Zeitung was looked upon as indeed an institution in Washington County journalism. The father and son continued to publish the paper until 1895, when the son withdrew and went to Anniston, Alabama. Later the son died in Newport, Kentucky, a young man whose value would stand high in any community.

Jacob Mueller, the father, still prints the Zeitung, and is the dean of all the publishers in Marietta today. He is a man of intelligence, with a conscience that looks toward the upright in all things. His paper bears the impress of carefulness in editing, it being looked upon as a first-class news bearer and mentor to the Germans of the county. It is well composed in good German, its editor having a good education in both German and English.

Jacob Mueller was born at Haschbach, Rhenish Bavaria, July 29, 1833, the son of Nicholas and Caroline (Kreuz) Mueller. Mr. Mueller's parents were well-to-do, and after he had received a common school education at his native place, he was sent to the Latin School at Kusel, where he studied for four years and was graduated with honor, showing excellency in all branches, particularly in modern languages, in which he stood second.

In 1849 Mr. Mueller came to America by himself, arriving in New York. After spending a few months in that city he went to Albany, where he accepted his first money-earning position as an expert violinist in a theatre orchestra of that city. He became a member of Captain Cooke's Band, one of the foremost musical organizations at that time in this country. Mr. Mueller remained in Albany several months, going from that city to Cincinnati, where, besides following his taste for music, he obtained a position as book-keeper for a brewing company. Here he remained for a period of six years, when at the death of his wife, in 1866, he came to Marietta, where he has since resided. After coming to Marietta, Mr. Mueller engaged with his brother-in-law, F. C. Miller, in the cigar business, and so remained until 1868. March 1, 1869, he took hold of the Zeitung, and first appeared as its owner and editor.

Mr. Mueller is a member of American Union Lodge No. 1, F. & A. M., and Gutterburg Lodge, I. O. O. F. He is identified with no church as a member, though his wife is a member of the Congregational Church at Cornersville. Mr. Mueller never held office, except that of city teacher examiner for a few years. During his life he has exhibited a fondness and great talent for the violin and could play almost any instrument. For many years he was conspicuous as an instructor, both here and in Cincinnati. While he made that city his home, he was connected with John Robinson's circus as leader of its orchestra, receiving the highest salary ever paid to its leaders up to that time. He was the organizer and leader of Mueller's Orchestra, the first pretentious musical organization of this city, and the first to interpret music of a classical order.

Mr. Mueller was first married, in 1853, to Margaret Miller, of Cincinnati, to whom were born three children, Caroline (Mrs. John Lehnhard, deceased 1894); Louis (deceased 1899); and Louise E. (Mrs. Charles Buck, still living, of Fernbank, a suburb of Cincinnati). The first wife died at Cincinnati in April, 1866, and her remains lie buried in Mound Cemetery, this city.

Mr. Mueller was again married, in 1869, to Elizabeth Buck, born December 27, 1849, eldest daughter of the late Col. William C. Buck, a distinguished soldier of the Civil War. By this union were born: Emma Philipena (Mrs. C. H. Smith) December 25, 1869; Ella Elizabeth, born February 1, 1871; Katharine Caroline, born October 15, 1872; Carl Hugo, born June 30, 1874; Florence Clara, born April 28, 1876; Frederick Jacob, born July 15, 1878; Stella Amelia, born March 16, 1880; Albert Leo, born May 29, 1882; Gertrude Edith, born October 21, 1884; William Junius, born December 5, 1886; and Theodore, born April 10, 1890.

For a time prior to 1881 there was a rumbling heard in the ranks of the Republican party to the effect that it should have another newspaper—one which should share in the honors of the community and the party; and February 23, 1881, the movement became vital in the form of the Marietta Leader.

The Leader was first published in a little frame building where now stands the City Electric building; and its editors and proprietors were Frank A. Crippen and Will S. Knox. These two gentlemen, with rather meager means, but many friends, at once installed the paper into the families of Washington County, making a particular hit with local news from country districts, and by giving great attention to the doings of the townspeople. It was not long until a list of large proportions was the happy possession of the new paper. In 1883 Dr. J. F. Ullmann, of Lower Salem, bought into the firm, he buying Mr. Knox's interest. Later, in the year 1883, Crippen & Ullmann sold out to Hon. Theodore F. Davis, who was the owner until 1890, when the former ownership was changed to that of a stock company. During Mr. Davis's incumbency he held political offices of honor, being appointed as a trustee of the Athens State Hospital, and being elected to the State Senate from this district. Mr. Davis, who still resides in Marietta, is an ardent Republican, and a worker within the party whose counselings are always listened to with respect.

November 17, 1890, the stock of the Marietta Leader was purchased by George M. Cooke, a native of Marietta and a young man who had had several years' experience in the printing business, and who had been associated with Mr. Davis and the Leader since March, 1885. Possessing a knowledge of the modus operandi of a newspaper, the plant was managed in such a way that every year saw it bring forth fruit.

In 1890 the Leader became a semi-weekly; in August, 1894, it was printed "every-other-day," and April 1, 1895, it made its appearance as a morning daily, since which time it has acceptably occupied the field as such.

August 1, 1900, Mr. Cooke sold his stock in the Leader to a syndicate of men, comprising C. C. Middleswart, John Kaiser, H. V. Speelman, John Crooks and T. J. Mercer. Since then, others have bought stock, and the personnel has changed to some extent. H. V. Speelman was editor and manager for several months, when he was succeeded by J. M. Williams, who still directs operations.

In 1901 the Leader was moved to its present location, across from the Court House, where most comfortably quartered is as fine a country newspaper office as graces the land. June 11, 1898, a linotype machine was installed in the Leader office—the first in southeastern Ohio.

J. M. Williams, the present manager of the Leader, was born near Gallipolis, August 14, 1869, the son of James Williams, who followed farming, and who died when the subject of our sketch was still a child. Mr. Williams's mother also died while he was of tender age. Mr. Williams received his education in the district schools of Gallia County, the time spent in gaining his education being very limited. His first business experience was that of messenger boy for the Western Union Telegraph Company, at a salary of $10 a month.

In less than a year, by his brightness and general ability young Williams was holding down a telegraph key at Hurricane, West Virginia. From there he went to Huntington, West Virginia, as assistant to the train-dispatcher. From Huntington Mr. Williams went to Charleston, where he was engaged with the Chesapeake & Ohio Railway for a year, when he went with the Western Union Telegraph Company as assistant manager. He remained in this position three years, when he came to Marietta to become manager of the Western Union office in this city, a position which he held with ability, and to the satisfaction of both company and patrons until the fall of 1900.

In November, 1900, Mr. Williams assumed the entire management of the Daily Leader and has conducted its affairs with the same care and ability that distinguished his services in earlier work and other fields. Mr. Williams is identified with other concerns in Marietta, and devotes himself to the general good of the community. He is at present with the Pioneer Building & Loan Association as a director; also is a stockholder in the Ohio Valley Wagon Company. He is a holder of oil interests in the American Oil Company, the Dual State Oil Company, the Delta Oil Company, and the Alta Oil Company. He is a stockholder in the Union Investment Company. He is a member of Harmar Lodge No. 390, F. & A. M. and American Union Chapter, R. A. M. With his wife he is a member of the First Methodist Episcopal Church.

Mr. Williams was married September 22, 1896, to Miss Minnie R. McMillin, daughter of Mr. and Mrs. Murray McMillin. Mr. and Mrs. Williams have one son—Emerson Marion, born December 17, 1897. They have a beautiful home on Fairview Heights, built in 1897, where they reside.

The youngest candidate for favors from the reading and advertising public is the Labor Journal, a paper which was established July 4, 1901, as a weekly newspaper, but which January 13, 1902, appeared as an evening daily. The daily was the outgrowth of a disagreement between employers and printers on the other daily newspapers of Marietta. In December, 1901, the printers declared a strike to be on, and according to agreement ceased work. The establishment is popularly financed in small holdings owned by members of the trades and labor organizations of Marietta. It has been a success from the start, finding general favor among the people who have a friendliness toward organized labor; and its columns are well filled with advertisements of the substantial concerns of the city.

The original stockholders forming the incorporation were S. E. Blair, Louis Sharp, M. L. Purkey, Joseph Jones, Harry Hill, A. E. Stewart and Frank Ackerman. This company took charge of affairs March 17, 1901. Since starting the company has become much scattered, but it is owned entirely by men who are members of labor societies.

The officers of the company are,—Arthur Metcalf, president; O. P. Hyde, secretary and treasurer; S. E. Blair, general manager.

Mr. Blair, upon whom falls the details of management, was born in Pomeroy, Meigs County, August 29, 1868, the fourth child of Joel M. and Mary Sharp Blair. The subject of our sketch was educated in the public schools of Harmar (now West Marietta), quitting at the close of the grammar school grades, under the late John D. Phillips. His first work as an earner of money was in the office of the Marietta Leader. This began January 17, 1886; and he was connected with the paper, as job printer, until August 1, 1900. March 17, 1901, Mr. Blair, with James I. Goldsmith, bought a job printing office of Messrs. Arbour and Brennan, and they conducted affairs until the inauguration of the incorporated company referred to above.

The College Ohio is published by the students of Marietta College, and appears monthly during the college year. Its editors are appointed by the literary societies of the College, and it bears in its columns the news of college matters, local and general.

Such is the life of the papers that now exist in Marietta. In Beverly there is a weekly newspaper—Beverly Dispatch—published by H. O. Goodrich, and established by Hon. John C. Preston, an attorney of that place. The paper meets with good patronage, and is an institution of the town in which it is located.

In New Matamoras is published the Mail, a weekly newspaper, owned and edited by Ed. B. Hutchinson, who gives it such impulse as the community justifies, and that is considerable for a place of its size. J. M. Miller, a young man of Little Hocking, prints the Buckeye, a sheet which finds popularity in its neighborhood.

With the rise and fall of the journalistic tide in Washington County, there have been many barques to appear and disappear, and their voyages bore greater or less interest to the public, in the main a losing venture to the projectors and owners of the crafts. A list of them would appear like this:

The Commentator and Marietta Recorder, a Federalist newspaper, opposing the Gazette, and first issued September 16, 1807, by Dunham & Gardiner. In two years the paper was discontinued, dying for lack of patronage.

The Marietta and Washington County Pilot, the first Democratic paper in Washington County, and the institution which the Times of today may call its ancestor—although the chain was several times broken—was started April 7, 1826, with George Dunlevy and A. V. D. Joline publishers. At first the Pilot was neutral, but later it stood for the cause of Andrew Jackson. During this campaign a printer in the Friend office got at the forms of the Pilot and transposed its head to read "Li-pot." The Friend, in referring to the change, suggested that at last the opposition sheet had come out with its true heading, and complimented it on its display of candor. The Pilot lived until 1830, when in May it was discontinued.

John Brough, afterward Governor of Ohio, and his brother, Charles H. Brough, had both worked on the Pilot as printers and they bought the material of that defunct paper, with the result that on January 8, 1831, they issued the Western Republican and Marietta Adver- tiser. The Broughs, with John as its editor, made a strong paper of the Republican, and they supported the Jackson administration. Later, in the split between Jackson and Calhoun, the Republican supported the latter, and lost prestige to such an extent that it was compelled to suspend, and the plant was taken to Parkersburg. It had an existence of about two years. Later the Broughs started the Cincinnati Enquirer, one of the great newspaper gold mines today.

In 1834 John S. McCracken started a Democratic newspaper to succeed the Republican, and it lived only about eight weeks when a note was found in the office which read, "I'm off, as the fly said when it lit on the mustard pot."

In August, 1835, Charles B. Flood started the Marietta Democrat, and he published the same until 1838, when the ownership was transferred to Jacob Baughey, who soon failed, and the property became Daniel Radenbaugh's. He issued the Washington County Democrat in April, 1840, but the paper only existed a short time. It was revived in 1844 by J. C. C. Carroll, and passed out of existence within a year.

Washington County had no Democratic paper until 1849, when Amos Layman, a young man just graduated from Marietta College, and reading law at the time, was prevailed upon to undertake the editorship of a new Democratic organ. This he did, and a new outfit was purchased, with which to print the Marietta Republican. This paper was an immediate success, and was conducted by Mr. Layman for over five years, when it was transferred to A. W. McCormick, who later became a Republican, and who still lives in Cincinnati. The Republican lived until 1863, when it ceased to be, and there was no Democratic paper in Marietta until the establishment of the Times in 1864 by Walter C. Hood.

The Home News, a small quarto, was started January 1, 1859, by E. Winchester, but in 1862 it was purchased by Mr. Stimson, who merged it, with the Intelligencer, into the Register.

The Marietta Collegiate Magazine, edited by students of Marietta College, was published for three years, beginning in June, 1854.

The Marietta Collegiate Quarterly was edited by students of the College and appeared for one year—1865.

About 1884 F. A. Crippen and his brother, John Crippen, started a daily evening newspaper, calling it the Daily News. It lived but a few weeks, when it was discontinued, and the proprietors satisfied themselves with printing a weekly which ran for a few months, when its publication was discontinued. The latter was called the Dollar Weekly News, and it was the first weekly to be issued at that price in this locality. The plant of the News was bought by Hon. Theodore F. Davis after the death of the News.

In the spring of 1894, John H. Snodgrass conceived the idea of starting a daily morning paper in Marietta. This conception took form in the Marietta Daily Dispatch. It found a field immediately, but in a few weeks the Register became a daily, and in less than a year the Leader also issued a daily, making an opposition tide which the Dispatch could not stem. In June, 1895, the Daily Dispatch ceased to be, and its editor issued a few numbers of a semi-weekly, then quit, and the outfit was returned to the type foundry whence it came.

Along in the latter "nineties," Prof. J. L. Mills started a paper which was to appear weekly, and which he called the Iterator. Professor Mills had an idea that he could print and circulate a paper without subscribers. He figured that his advertising would pay for issuing a paper weekly, so, printing 5,000 copies each week, he caused them to be passed around—attending to much of the circulating personally. This work Mr. Mills did for several months, when he concluded that the game was not worth the candle, and he discontinued the Iterator.

In 1899, Dr. John McBurney, of Cambridge, desired, on account of failing health, to dispose of a county educational paper called the Ohio Teacher, which he had published at his home for 19 years. It was purchased by Prof. Martin R. Andrews and Supt. H. G. Williams, and the office was moved to Marietta. At the time of this transfer the Ohio Teacher had a large subscription list from the counties near to Guernsey. The new owners immediately established agencies and pushed the paper to all parts of the State, at the same time changing from the newspaper to the magazine form and materially increasing its size. It now has a circulation of about 6,000 pretty well distributed over the State. In 1902, Superintendent Williams accepted a call to take charge of the new Normal School at Athens, Ohio. Professor Andrews therefore sold out his share in the Ohio Teacher and Superintendent Williams removed the office of publication to his new home.

BANKS AND BANKING.

We are indebted for the greater portion of the descriptive and statistical matter contained in this chapter to the Centennial number of the Marietta Register.

THE FIRST NATIONAL BANK.

The articles of association of the First National Bank bear the date November 14, 1863, and the signatures of Beman Gates, William F. Curtis, John Newton, J. B. Hovey, M. P. Wells, D. P. Bosworth and A. B. Battelle. These seven gentlemen were prominent Marietta business men, and between them held all of the original stock of the bank, and constituted the first Board of Directors. On December 4, 1863, the Comptroller of the Currency, Hon. Hugh McCulloch, authorized the new institution to commence business. The "National Banking Act" had become a law on February 25th of the same year, and this bank was one of the first to organize under it. Its number is 142. Since that date nearly 6,000 national banks have been organized. Beman Gates was elected president, William F. Curtis, cashier, and Dr. H. B. Shipman, teller. The new bank opened its doors early in 1864 in a small room in a building then standing on the site of the Colonial Block. In January, 1865, the building at the corner of Front and Greene streets was purchased of D. C. Skinner, and after a complete remodeling was occupied in November. Here the bank remained until May of the present year, when, the business having been transferred to temporary quarters in the Bellevue Hotel Block, the building was torn down to give place to the magnificent structure which has been erected on that corner, and which the bank hopes to occupy early in 1902.

The capital of the bank was increased from $50,000 to $100,000 in May, 1864, and to $150,000 in July, 1872. Here it has remained since. The surplus for many years after the last increase of capital stood at $30,000, but on November 1, 1900, it was increased to $150,000, and the undivided profits now amount to nearly $75,000 more. The policy of the present management is to build up a large surplus and undivided profit account, rather than to pay large dividends to its stockholders. During the nearly 40 years of its existence, the First National Bank has been a tower of strength in this community, and during the more recent years has been recognized not only as the leading financial institution in Southeastern Ohio, but as one of the strongest, most progressive, and at the same time, one of the most conservative banks in the entire Ohio Valley. Its business has grown immensely, until its individual deposits average more than $1,000,000, and its volume of business aggregates about $60,000,000 per year. The following is a condensed statement of the condition of the bank at the close of business December 10, 1901:

ASSETS

Loans and discounts	$1,001,526 94
Overdrafts	3,006 57

The officials of the bank have been connected with it for many years. William W. Mills is the president, succeeding Beman Gates in June, 1887. Col. T. W. Moore has held the position of vice-president since January, 1895, succeeding M. P. Wells, who died in September, 1894. Joseph S. Goebel is cashier, and George C. Best is assistant cashier. The latter has been connected with the bank since 1869, while Mr. Goebel has served it continually for nearly 29 years. The Board of directors consists of the president, the vice-president and Charles Penrose, W. D. Devol and John Mills.

The other employees are as follows: Robert N. Payne and John C. Otto, tellers; Harry M. Hart and George M. Knox, individual book-keepers; John L. Lehnhard, general book-keeper; Harry Wendelken, clerk; Fred M. Reed, messenger; Miss Laura Best, stenographer.

The new building is a modern structure in every respect, and in its interior appointments will be superb and probably unexcelled by any like edifice in the Ohio Valley. The banking room proper is a very large, well-lighted room, and when completed with marble floors, mahogany counters and furniture, will be beautiful. A massive chromé steel-lined vault for money and securities, with 221 safe deposit boxes for the use of customers, has been erected by the Diebold Safe & Lock Company of Canton. The metal alone in this impregnable vault weighs 25 tons. Two other fire-proof vaults for books and storage purposes are on the banking floor, while on other floors fire-proof vaults have been constructed for the use of the River Gas Company, the Buckeye & Eureka Pipe Line Company, the Ohio River Bridge & Ferry Company, who are to occupy offices in the building.

In immediate connection with the banking office is a reception room for ladies, a customers' room, president's room, directors' room, coupon rooms, and a multitude of conveniences to facilitate business and make it attractive.

The new home of the First National Bank will be in keeping with the solid, substantial character of the institution.

THE CITIZENS NATIONAL BANK

Opened December 9, 1889, in their building, at No. 123 Putnam street, with $50,000 capital. Harlow Chapin, president; Theodore F. Davis, vice-president; E. M. Booth, cashier. Mr. Chapin died in September, 1891, and was succeeded January, 1892, by A. T. Nye, president, and D. B. Torpy was elected vice-president. In February, 1893, the bank removed to the corner of Putnam and Second streets, the building now occupied; the capital was increased to $100,000, June 1, 1895. Mr. Nye died in January, 1899, and E. M. Booth, the present president, was chosen, and Thomas M. Sheets was elected cashier and Charles T. Booth, assistant cashier. Present officers and employees: E. M. Booth, president; D. B. Torpy, vice-president; T. M. Sheets, cashier; C. L. Booth, assistant cashier; C. A. Steadman, H. L. Limshall and C. E. Oesterle, bookkeepers; J. E. Brigham, messenger. Directors: D. B. Torpy, B. F. Strecker, Jacob Wittig, Frank Weber and E. M. Booth.

THE DIME SAVINGS SOCIETY

Of Marietta was incorporated in 1871. J. L. Mills served as president until 1884, when he was succeeded by Jewett Palmer, who served until 1890, when Thomas Ewart was chosen; and in 1893 W. G. Way was elected, who is still the president. E. G. Brigham is vice-president. Charles H. Newton, a native of Marietta, has been treasurer since 1877, except from February, 1879, to March 1881. At the latter date the deposits of the Society were $39,000. At the present time they are over $690,000.

THE GERMAN SAVINGS, BUILDING &amp; LOAN COMPANY.

(The German Bau Verein No. 1.)

The first building and loan company in this city was started at a called meeting, held at the Court House, on September 14, 1870, and was organized September 19, 1870, by selecting Henry Bohl, president; Fred Blume, secretary; William Lorey, assistant secretary; and Martin Schmidt, treasurer.

The directors were: Jacob Mueller, Gottlieb Meister, Philip Schranim, George Bachmann, Henry Bahlman, Theobald Triem, Daniel Otterbein and B. E. Stoehr.

The first payments of dues were received October 3rd of the same year, at Otterbein's Hall on Ohio street; the business was conducted on the terminating plan, of which the fourth serial terminated was on October 19, 1896, and was succeeded by the present company.

The German Savings, Building & Loan Company, which is conducted on the perpetual plan, with a capital stock of $1,000,000, divided in 10,000 shares of $100, has assets of $305,000; loans on first mortgage of $300,000, and a surplus fund of $4,500, with 1,075 shareholders.

This company receives weekly payments and also issues paid-up stock certificates, which are in good demand.

The management is conservative, and the business comes unsolicited.

It is a source of congratulation to the officers having charge of the business that during the 31 years since the time the company was organized, not a mortgage has been foreclosed and not a dollar has been lost to the stockholders. The present officers of the company are: Jacob Rech, president; John Lenz, vice-president; John Bickert, treasurer; and Fred Blume, Sr., secretary (who was also the first secretary in 1870).

Directors: Jacob Rech, John Lenz, Henry Blume, Jacob Gephart, Peter Grub, Charles Rech, John Oesterle, William Geyer.

THE WASHINGTON COUNTY SAVINGS, LOAN &amp; BUILDING COMPANY.

Was organized April 10, 1890, with an authorized capital of $100,000. The capital has since been increased to $1,000,000. The assets of the company are about $465,000, which consist of first mortgages on real estate in Washington County, Ohio, and on the company's own stock. The company does not own any real estate. It loans money on first mortgage on real estate in Washington County only, loaning from one-half to two-thirds the value of the property securing said loans.

Since the company was organized it has taken in from members over $1,300,000.

During the same time it has loaned over $850,000, and has never lost a dollar, and never foreclosed a mortgage. Furthermore, it has not a mortgage on its books that a careful investor would not be willing to take off its hands.

From January 1, 1891, to July 1, 1901, the company paid its members $106,616.47 in dividends. The office of the company is in the Law Building on Putnam street.

OFFICERS.

THE PIONEER CITY BUILDING &amp; LOAN COMPANY.

Was organized July 31, 1893. Thomas Ewart, A. L. Gracey, George Howell, Willis

Morris and John Kaiser were the incorporators. The company commenced with a capital stock of $100,000, which has been increased from time to time to $2,000,000. The directors and officers, except the secretary and treasurer, have served without pay over eight years, and during all that time have not failed to have a quorum of the directors present for the transaction of business every Saturday night except one—during the 1898 flood. The company has not foreclosed a mortgage nor lost a dollar in any way. It is purely mutual and co-operative, all depositors being members and sharing in the profits pro rata, according to the amounts to their credit. It pays dividends on paid-up stock for the time the money remains with the company, irrespective of the time of year it is placed with, or withdrawn from, it. The company now, for the first time, owns its own home, having recently purchased the building on Second street in which its office has been located during the past five years.

The present officers are: J. S. Simpson, president; J. S. H. Torner, vice-president; O. P. Hyde, secretary; O. P. Hyde, treasurer; J. C. Brenan, attorney. J. S. Simpson, N. Moore, A. L. Gracey, D. S. Boyle, W. H. H. Jett, J. M. Williams, S. J. Hathaway, J. S. H. Torner, and H. E. Smith, directors. The company's office is open for business on all business days, from 8 A. M. to 12 M., and from 1 P. M. to 5 P. M., and also Saturday evenings from 6 to 9 o'clock.

EXECUTIVE COMMITTEE.

D. A. BARTLETT,	W. J. CRAM,
	H. C. LORD.

This company began business in the St. Clair Building on Putnam street, next to the Post Office, opposite the Washington County Court House, May 26, 1902.

Money is received on deposit, subject to check. Interest is paid on time deposits at the rate of three per cent per annum, if left six months; and four per cent. if left 12 months.

Loans are made on good personal, collateral or real estate security at current rates. The feature that has, perhaps, proved most beneficial to the community is the loaning of money on real estate security.

In addition to the banking department, there are trust, safe-deposit and savings departments.

Besides these, there are in the county the Citizen's Bank of Beverly, organized in March, 1875, with E. S. McIntosh as president, and C. W. Reynolds, as cashier, and the more recently organized national banks of New Matamoras and Lowell, all of which are elsewhere mentioned.

CHAPTER XVII.

THE OIL INDUSTRY.

THE HISTORY SINCE COW RUN—OPERATIONS IN EACH TOWNSHIP—DRILLING—SHOOTING—PUMPING—ACCIDENTS—OPERATION—LEASING—CAPITAL INVESTED IN WASHINGTON COUNTY—THE FUTURE PROSPECTS.

THE HISTORY SINCE COW RUN.

Less than a half century ago, the oil territory of Washington County comprised but a few farms, situated in the valley of a small stream, known to all oil men as Cow Run. The wells were drilled in the crudest manner, many of them by the old spring-pole method. The tools in use were so light that the "toolie" could easily carry them to a blacksmith shop half a mile away to have them repaired. And when oil was found it was barreled at the well and carted for miles over the roughest country roads to the Ohio River, where it was shipped to some Eastern market. The following, taken from an old notebook, will give some idea of the cost of marketing a barrel of crude oil:

it brought in the field men of the very highest order of business ability; men whose motto was to act, and no matter what the difficulties were, no sooner were they discovered than they were mastered. And by their efforts they have brought the crudest industry to the most systematic and important in our county.

OPERATIONS IN EACH TOWNSHIP.

The producing territory has gradually extended from Old Cow Run until it has reached almost every part of our county; at least it is necessary to study it by townships to realize the extent of the developments.

By beginning at the northeast corner of the county we estimate the following producing leases:

Durham	0	producing leases
Belpre	0	"
Plum	30	"
Parfield	0	"
Decatur	2	"
Wesley	30	"
Total	500

Thus, it can be seen that from a half-dozen farms with a very small area of production the industry has now extended to over 500 farms, with thousands of acres of developed territory. But this could never have been done without vast improvements in drilling, shooting and pumping the wells, as well as transporting the oil to market.

DRILLING.

The first improvement was the introduction of steam power for drilling; then, as oil was found to exist at greater depth, we see the stately 80-foot derrick in the place of the pole derrick, and the small drilling tools have changed until now we find on the end of a 2,000-foot cable a 60-foot stem of two tons weight, with long stroke jars and heavy bit of 400 pounds weight, so that four good men can send the bit into the Berea sand at a depth of 2,000 feet in a month of 30 days or even less.

SHOOTING.

Invention and skill in drilling has made it possible to find the oil-bearing rock, no matter at what depth Nature may have hidden it. But many places where oil was found in the right formation, the pump failed to take it out in paying quantities, and some ingenious operator suggested "blast it with rock powder;" no sooner said than done, and the results more than paid for the expense. If powder is good, nitro-glycerine will be better, until the shooting of a well is the rule, unless it should flow or show by some signs that it will pump 40 or 50 barrels per day, naturally.

Many wells that are now producing in paying quantities would have been abandoned as dry holes 20 years ago, because when they were first drilled in, they showed so little oil that they would not pay for the pumping. In some fields, wells are found that will not pump five barrels per day, naturally; but after they are shot they will pump 50 barrels per day for months, and when they decrease again in their production a second shot will sometimes bring them back almost to their first production.

The glycerine is lowered into the well in long cans or "shells" as they are called, mostly about eight feet long and containing about 20 quarts to the shell. Sometimes the shell is not filled full, but when the sandrock is very hard two or three shells are put in, and in extreme cases as much as 200 quarts have been used. Upon the last shell is placed a cap, and when everything is ready a piece of iron called the "go-devil" is dropped in the well; this explodes the cap, which in turn explodes the glycerine.

Sometimes the glycerine is exploded by a jack-squib, which is a small shell filled with about a half a pint of glycerine and a time fuse attached; this fuse is lighted and the shell dropped in the well. When the fuse burns to the glycerine the explosion will follow. The last few years the electric shot has helped in the fact that in exploding the glycerine the casing was often so torn that it took many days to get the well in shape again, and sometimes it was destroyed entirely; but when an insulated wire is attached to the last shell, all the casing can be drawn from the well and the shot exploded by the electric spark, and then the casing can be put back again.

The force of the explosion seems to rend the rock for many feet around, and make crevices, all of which terminate in the shot hole; then when the well is pumped the oil from quite a distance around will continually fill up the shot hole and in this way keep a supply on hand all the time for the pump. Otherwise there would be so little in the shot hole that the pump could scarcely work.

PUMPING.

Next in importance to shooting wells is the modern method of rigging up and pumping with the gas engine. In early times a boiler and engine were required at every well; a little later a boiler was placed in some convenient location and steam lines run to the engines that were left at each well, thus requiring an immense amount of fuel and labor to keep the wells pumping. And when a well got below five or six barrels per day the income would scarcely justify the expense.

Now, when a new lease is developed, a suitable location is selected for a gas engine and power house. A good 25-horsepower gas engine can be bought for less than $500, a double eccentric power engine for as much more, both of which should be placed upon as solid a foundation as possible. The work of placing the timbers, building the power-house and engine-house will be about $500 more, making the little plant cost about $1,500.

By means of swings, rod-lines can be run out from the power in every direction to wells on any ordinary lease of two or three hundred acres, so that as many as 75 wells have been pumped from one power. The fuel for the engine, of course, is gas taken direct from the casing head and conducted to the engine, and is exploded in the cylinder on opposite sides of the piston alternately.

The actual cost of the pumping expenses is reduced to a mere nominal sum; the gas otherwise would be a waste product. The amount required to run a 25-horsepower gas engine is scarcely more than that required to run an ordinary cooking stove, and the attention required is so little that the lesesman can give his time to other work, as it is customary everywhere to go to the engine in the morning and oil and start it, and it very seldom requires any further attention until time to shut it down in the evening; its mechanism is so simple that any ordinary person can learn its requirements in one week's time.

If a lease is already equipped and adjacent territory is found on which the wells are not over 600 feet deep and will produce one barrel a day of white sand oil, it will be a profitable investment to drill for the same at the present price of oil, $1.30 per barrel. Or if a lease of 50 wells has produced sufficient oil to pay for itself and then is making but one-half barrel per day, or even one-fourth of a barrel per day, it is good property so long as the price of oil is above $1 per barrel.

So it is certain that the little gas engine has brought into active and profitable operation territory that only a few years ago was of no value whatever.

ACCIDENTS.

Shooting wells is, of course, a very hazardous business; the shooter is in danger all the time; but probably the most accidents occur at the time the shells are lowered in the well; if the well should flow while the shells are being lowered into it they will, of course, be thrown out quickly, and in falling to the derrick floor will explode, and very often before the shooter can get far enough away to save his life. I was an eye-witness once when the shooter dropped a 20-quart shell into a well in which he had already lowered 20 quarts, and 20 more quarts were in cans on the derrick floor. The explosion followed very quickly and blew the casing out of the well, also the top of the derrick off, but did not explode the glycerine that was on the derrick floor. As for the crew and shooter, how they ran 200 feet, while that shell was falling 600 feet, was a mystery, but they did, and no one was injured.

The most disastrous accident in our county was at Whipple, when a jack-squib was dropped in the well, and by some unexplained cause was thrown out upon the derrick floor; when a number of bystanders went up to see the result of the shot, the squib exploded and killed seven of the party.

OPERATION.

As soon as a tank is filled with oil a division order is signed and sent to the Pittsburg office and is as follows:

Macketta, O., 12-1-1904.
To the Buckeye Pipe Line Company—MACKSBURG Division.

The undersigned certify and guarantee that they

OIL WELLS AT MOORE'S JUNCTION

The same day the gauger telegraphs his runs to the Pittsburg office, where by reference to the division order and chart, credit is given in barrels to the land owner, and also to all who have any interest in the property. The lease owner's interests are referred to as W. I. (working interest) and the land owners R. I. (royalty interest).

The next day after the oil is run into the pipe line, any one of the owners can sell his interest in the same by calling at the nearest home office. He will receive the price at which oil is selling the day he asks to sell. If he thinks oil will advance he can leave his oil in the line and sell at his pleasure.

The Standard Oil Company attempts to lay all lines that lead from a particular field, so that the oil from the many tanks will flow by the force of gravity to some central location. This place is selected after a careful study of the streams of the region, and here they erect a station, which, consists of thousands of barrels of tankage, and a large boiler house and pumps with power and capacity sufficient to send all oil collected one relay toward the seaboard.

Many stations must be passed before the oil reaches the large refineries of the East; but the oil that leaves Washington County, Ohio, on Monday can be delivered in Philadelphia on the following Monday. But I would not have you believe that any such time is required for the delivery of an order for oil. As the lines are kept full all the time, a delivery can be begun almost before the click of the instrument that orders it dies away.

The amount of oil sent out of our county varies considerably from month to month, owing to new wells that are liable to come in and increase the production for a few weeks at a time. But the yearly production for the last five years does not fluctuate so much.

For the year ending October 31, 1901, Washington County, Ohio, sent to market 1,394,794 barrels of white sand oil, or a daily average of 3,874 barrels.

If this had been sold on October 31st, it would have brought into the county $1,813,- 225. Or if it was sold daily as it was produced, it gave to our people $5,036 every time old "Sol" made his circle.

LEASING.

Oil properties are bought and sold on their daily productions. Usually a 10-day option is taken at an agreed price per barrel. The property is carefully gauged for the 10 days, and should it make 180 barrels in the 10 days, the daily gauge would be 18 barrels, and if the option was at $1,000 per barrel, the price is then fixed at $18,000. This, of course, includes all machinery, tankage and everything pertaining to the operating of the lease.

The price of production varies as everything else. But it is perhaps a little higher now than it has been for the last 10 years.

It is almost impossible to find a good property, where all equipments are first-class, that the owners do not ask $1,000 per barrel for the same. In fact there are many properties in our county that could not be bought for $1,000 per barrel. With this as a basis, the producing properties of Washington County would sell for $1,000 times 3,874, or $3,874,000.

CAPITAL INVESTED IN WASHINGTON COUNTY.

To find the amount of money represented by the oil industry in Washington County it is necessary to add to the sum that represents the lease values the amount the Standard Oil Company has invested in pipe lines and Stations, which is as follows:

293 miles of 2-inch line pipe at 11½ cents per foot	$177,000 00
70 miles of 3-inch line pipe at 24½ cents per foot	102,104 40
40 miles of 4-inch line pipe at 35 cents per foot	73,020 00
4 miles of 5-inch line pipe at 47½ cents per foot	10,032 00
37 miles of 6-inch line pipe at 60 cents per foot	110,160 00
	$483,225 00

The principal Pumping Stations are situated at Elba, Payne, Wolf Creek and Lowell, and represent $50,000 at least.

The representation of the oil industry of Washington County, Ohio, would be, in money as follows:

Value of leases .....	$3,874,000 00
Value of pipe lines .....	483,225 00
Stations .....	50,000 00

Total .....

$4,407,225 00

This investment is larger than the appraised value of all the real estate in the city of Marietta, which in the last appraisement was $4,113,360.

The Standard Oil Company paid for labor, in caring for their interests during the last year, $150,000. This, added to the sale of oil, $1,813,225.00, will give the annual income direct from the oil industry, $1,963,225. The total value of all horses, cattle, mules, sheep and hogs that was reported by the assessors of the county for the last year, was $803,343, or less than one-half the annual income from the oil industry.

THE FUTURE PROSPECTS.

In the list of townships, it will be noticed that all east of the Muskingum River are producers, and the four non-producing townships are well to the west, where they have not been thoroughly tested as yet. But the wild-catter is at work out in the west end as never before, and as he has been very successful, so we think his success will continue, and it will not be long until every township in the county will be a producer.

On the east side of the Muskingum, the following sands are productive: first Cow Run; second Cow Run, Salt, Maxon, Keener, Injun and Berea. On the west side the first Cow Run is practically the only one as yet tested. So with these facts before us, we do not fear any permanent decrease in production for years to come, but, in fact, we can safely believe that Washington County, Ohio, will receive an annual income of $2,000,000 from the oil industry for the next 10 years at least.

ESTABLISHMENT.

Washington County, originally embracing about half the territory now included in the State of Ohio, was established by proclamation of Governor Arthur St. Clair on the 26th of July, 1788. Following is the law, which contains a full description of boundaries:

By the President, Arthur St. Clair, Governor and Commander-in-Chief of the Territory of all the United States Northwest of the river Ohio,

A. D. 1788. A. S. C. 1788.

To all persons to whom these presents shall come, Greeting,

WHEREAS, By the ordinance of Congress of the thirteenth of July, 1787, in the organization of the territory of the United States northwest of the river Ohio, it is directed that for the due execution of process, civil and criminal, the governor shall make proper divisions of the said territory, and proceed from time to time, as circumstances may require, to lay out the part of the same where the Indian title has been extinguished, into counties and townships, subject to future alterations as therein specified. Now, know ye, that it appearing to me to be necessary, for the purposes above mentioned, that the said territory be immediately laid out, I have ordained and ordered, and by these presents do ordain and order, that all and singular the lands lying and being within the following boundaries, to-wit: Beginning on the north of the Ohio river where the western boundary line of Pennsylvania crosses it, and running with that line to Lake Erie; thence along the southern shore of said lake to the mouth of the Cuyahoga; thence up said river to the portage between that and the Tuscarawas branch of the Muskingum; thence down the branch to the mouth of the Scioto; thence down the Scioto; thence with a line to be drawn westerly to the portage of that branch of the Big Miami on which the fort stood that was taken by the French in 1742, until it meets the road from the lower Shawneestown to the Sandusky; thence south to the Scioto River; thence with that river to its mouth, and thence up the Ohio to the place of beginning; shall be a county, and the same is hereby erected into a county named and to be called hereafter the county of Washington; and the said county of Washington shall have and enjoy all and singular the jurisdiction, rights, liberties, privileges and immunities whatever, to a county belonging and appertaining, and which any other county that may hereafter be erected and laid out, shall or ought to enjoy, conformably to the ordinance of Congress before mentioned. In witness whereof I have hereunto set my hand and caused the seal of the Territory to be affixed this twenty-sixth day of July, in the thirteenth year of Independence of the United States, and in the year of our Lord one thousand seven hundred and eighty-eight.

(Signed) A. ST. CLAIR.

STATISTICS OF THE POPULATION.

The population of Washington County in 1820 was 10,425; in 1830, 11,731; 1840, 20,664; 1850, 36,268; 1860, 43,244; 1870, 42,380; 1880, 48,245.

It will be observed that in many of these townships the population is less than it was 20 years ago, but this by no means indicates decadence, on the contrary, the productive powers of each township were never greater than at the present time. The census figures simply indicate that a part of the farming population no longer needed in cultivating the soil has gone to the towns to manufacture the agricultural implements, which now make the labors of one farmer as productive as that of two or three in former times.

CHANGES IN EXTENT.

In 1797 the formation of Jefferson County with its southern boundary corresponding with the present boundary between Belmont and Monroe and thence across nearly to the Tuscarawas cut off about one half of the territory included in Washington County, as first organized. The organization of Gallia County, in 1803, took off a large territory from the south. Muskingum still further reduced it on the north in 1804; and Athens County was taken from the western boundary in 1805. The organization of Monroe County, in 1813, brought its eastern boundary still further down the Ohio; and Morgan County was carved from its northern border in 1818. A small strip of territory was taken in 1851 to contribute to the forming of the last of the 88 counties in Ohio, and thus Washington County assumed its present form.

COUNTY SEAT.

In the civil history of the county, there is little that is exciting or curious. Many of our Western counties, and some in Ohio, have had their county seat disputes, intense in their bitterness, but the first settlement having been made at Marietta, that became the seat of justice as a matter of course and there has been very little disposition to remove it. About 1815 there was some effort made to remove the county seat to Waterford, which at that time would have been not far from the center of the county, and a petition a little later was to be sent to the Legislature asking for such removal. But this proposal was promptly check-mated by the erection of Morgan County which left Waterford out of the question.

COURT HOUSE.

The corner-stone of the new Court House, which looks in its grandeur as if it were built for the centuries, was laid with Masonic ceremony, April 9, 1901, and the building was ready for use in the summer of 1902. A description of the courts held in this county is given by the official reporter, Mrs. Lillian T. Wood.

INFIRMARY.

In 1838, a farm was bought about two miles east of Marietta for a "Poorhouse," or as it has been called since 1851, "County Infirmary." Various additions and improvements have been made at different times. Of the origin of the Children's Home, which is situated on the Muskingum about a mile above Marietta, the reader will find a full description in chapter VII.

OUR EARLY JUDICIARY.

October 16, 1787—six months before the pioneers landed at Marietta—Congress had appointed James Varnum, S. H. Parsons, and John Armstrong to the judicial bench of the territory; but Armstrong resigning, John Cleves Symes was appointed in his place.

Until the arrival of Governor St. Clair—which occurred July 9, 1788—the judicial authority was represented by a code of laws nailed to an oak tree at "the Point." Upon the Governor's arrival, a form of government was organized in which the whole power was in the hands of the Governor and three judges.

The first laws entered upon the old "Book of Record" (a priceless volume which is still in existence in the office of the clerk of the court) was "For regulating and establishing a Militia," and was enacted July 25, 1788. Under date of the next day appears the Proclamation of Governor St. Clair, "Erecting all the country that had been ceded by the Indians, East of the Scioto River, into the County of Washington."

On August 23rd following, a law was enacted for establishing General Courts of Quarter Sessions of the Peace (and therein the power of single justices) and for establishing General Courts of Common Pleas (and therein the power of single judges to hear and determine upon small debts and contracts); and also a law for establishing the office of sheriff, and for the appointment of sheriffs. This is recorded as "Published in the City of Marietta, County of Washington, Territory of the United States, N. W. of the River Ohio, and upon the 23d day of August, in the Thirteenth year of the sovereignty and independence of the United States, and of Our LORD One thousand, seven hundred and eighty-eight."

Some of the provisions for holding said courts were that there should be "a Court in each County, styled the General Quarter Sessions of the Peace, holden and kept." That for the county of Washington should be "holden and kept in the City of Marietta on the Second Tuesday of March, June, September, and December." Full and elaborate provisions were made, regulating the exact power of these justices of the peace—one clause reading,—"The Court of Quarter Sessions of the Peace may hear and determine a sentence according to the course of Common Law, the punishment whereof doth not extend to life or limb, imprisonment for more than one year, or forfeiture of goods, chattels, lands, or tenements, to the government of the Territory." Jurisdiction in one extended to all the counties, and all writs signed by the clerks, respectively, of one county were subject to service by any sheriff of the Territory; subpoenas, likewise, were issued into any county or place in the Territory. In this connection, it is history to relate that Joseph Gilman and Gen. Benjamin Tupper were appointed, by the Governor, magistrates for Marietta—Griffin Greene for Belpre—Robert Oliver for Waterford. Col. Ebenezer Sproat was appointed high sheriff, and Benjamin Ives Gilman, clerk of the Court of Quarter Sessions of the Peace, and of the Court of Common Pleas. Return Jonathan Meigs was the first prosecuting attorney.

The Court of Common Pleas was provided for in the appointment and commission by the Governor of a "number of suitable persons, not exceeding five, and not less than three" who should hold a court of record at fixed periods in every year, in each county, at the place where the General Court of Quarter Sessions should be kept. That for the county of Washington should be held on the Third Tuesday of March, and First Tuesday of September. The Judges so appointed should hold pleas of assize; and should hear and determine all manner of pleas, actions, suits, or causes of civil nature, real, personal, or mixed, according to the Constitution and laws of the Territory.

The sheriff was required to take the oath of allegiance to the United States, and of office, and to give bonds in the sum of $4,000; his duties, as set forth, do not differ greatly from those of the sheriff of today.

A Court of Probate was also established, with its jurisdiction, largely the same as that of today. The judge of Probate, however, was required to hold four sessions in each and every year, and "he may adjourn from time to time, or appoint a special session. The sessions for Washington County were to be held in the city of Marietta, upon the first Mondays of January, April, August, and October.

Then there was a still higher court, called the General Court which should "hold Pleas, Civil and Criminal, at some certain period or terms in each year, in such counties as the judges shall, from time to time, deem most conducive to the general good—timely notice of their sitting being duly given;" to the regular time should be the first Mondays of February, October, and December "provided, however, that but one term of Court be holden in each county in a year." "It is further provided in case neither of the Judges shall attend at the time and place aforesaid, and no writ be received by the Sheriff, it shall be his duty to adjourn the Court from day to day, during the first six days of the term to which the processes shall be continued." The laws for establishing General and Probate Courts are dated August 13th, although not recorded until after the establishing of the Courts of Quarter Sessions of the Peace and that of Common Pleas.

On the 2d of September a law was passed relating to oaths of office—providing even then for those who would "affirm" instead of "solemnly swearing" he would faithfully perform the duties of office. On the 16th of September laws were adopted for crime and its punishment. Treason heads the list—a crime which then meant almost more than now. Then four lines and a half of terse and unflinching sentence for the crime of murder. Manslaughter had almost as wide latitude as it has now (although no record of any loop-hole of escape by way of the Insane Asylum appears).

Robbery, burglary, riots, unlawful assemblies, perjury, larceny, forgery, usurpation, assault and battery, fraudulent deeds, disobedience of servants and children (wherein the offender shall be sent to jail or to the House of Correction until ready to sufficiently humble himself to the offended parent or master's satisfaction), drunkenness,—“where convicted before two justices, the person shall be fined Five dimes for first offense and One dollar for each one succeeding.” Then comes improper or “prophane” language, with a “whereas” and a “wherefore” couched in language so dignified and profound, with such sonorous sentences, as to strike terror to the very soul of any offender who had indulged in improper swear-words, no matter what his provocation. It might be wished that offenders of today might be similarly dealt with.

The law for the keeping of the Sabbath had no uncertain sound, and also that for regulating marriages with its many curious phrases. The code is finished with the law of limitation, that for governing the militia, and for providing coroners.

But there was added a general law with the now familiar heading “An act for” &c.; this prohibits the sale of liquors to Indians, or soldiers, the trading of foreigners with Indians, and gaming of any kind.

September 2, 1788, was the real beginning of our judiciary. The scene of that pageant has been often painted for the present generation. The assembling at “the Point”—the dignified procession, headed by Col. Ebenezer Sproat, with his drawn sword—its flashing blade, and his superb height and martial air inspiring the beholder with respect for his newly inducted office. Following came (1) the citizens, (2) officers of the garrison at Fort Harnar, (3) members of the bar, (4) Supreme Judges, (5) the Governor and clergyman, (6) the newly appointed Judges of the Court of Common Pleas. It has often been told how this august procession wended its way through a path that had been cleared from “the Point” to the Campus Martius, to the house of Col. Ebenezer Battelle, in the northwest corner of the fort, and after the judges had taken their seats, and that sturdy pioneer leader of their souls—Rev. Manasseh Cutler—invoked the divine blessing upon this, the foundation of all good government for the Northwest Territory; then Colonel Sproat, in mighty voice, proclaimed with solemn "Oyez, Oyez," that "a court is opened for the administration of even-handed justice, to the poor as well as the rich, to the guilty and the innocent, without respect of persons, none to be punished without a trial by their peers, and then only in pursuance of law."

Passing from this impressive ceremonial, we look at the record of that first court, as found in the old book, and dated September 9, 1788:

The Court of General Quarter Sessions of the Peace of the County of Washington, convened at the house of Col. Ebenezer Battelle, in Campus Martius, Proclamation being made by the Sheriff, and the Clerk's commission read, the Clerk then read the General Commission. The Court was then, by proclamation, opened for Business.

Paul Fearing was appointed as an attorney in all courts of record, and further was appointed as counsel for the United States in the county of Washington. The grand jurors were called, and William Stacy appointed foreman and first sworn; the rest were sworn by fours until all had taken the oath, Judge Putnam then gave the charge to the grand jurors "with great propriety."

At one o'clock the court was adjourned while the grand jury were out; convening again at half past one, the grand jury returned and presented an address to the court, to which Judge Putnam replied, after which court adjourned "without day."

December 9, 1788.—Court again convened, and two offenders were brought before Justice R. J. Meigs, charged with theft; the grand jury found an indictment against them, and they entered the plea of guilty and asked for time in which to endeavor to settle with the owner of the stolen goods. This was effected by the payment of $20, after which the court assessed a fine of $2 and costs to each offender. The bill of costs is unique.

March 10, 1789.—Court again convened at Colonel Battelle's house in the Campus Martius, and the grand jury were called, sworn, charged by the court and sent out, but soon returned, reporting no business to be done, so court adjourned.

The writer can find no record of a petit jury sitting on the trial of cases before the court; mention is made of a "Traverse Jury" but no one seems to know what that was. Judge Barker, however, speaks of the difficulty of getting together enough men for either a grand or petit jury, so it must be that trials were had by a petit jury the same as now.

In January, 1790, Charles Greene was ordered by the court to repair at once to Philadelphia with dispatches for the Governor of the territory or the President of the United States, informing them of the dangers and perils which threatened the little colony.

During this year court held regular sessions and several minor causes were tried, but, as has been written by Judge Barker, "these people had other things to engross them, and with all interested in the same object—the advancement and prosperity of the colony, and the great importance of setting well the foundation of their new home—there was no time nor disposition to go to law." From time to time the court made provisions for the comfort and safety of the people in various ways.

In January, 1791, the court convened on the 3rd but adjourned until the 10th "on account of an attack from the Indians on the Blockhouse at Big Bottom." Judge Barker says he has no recollection of any court being held during the four years of the Indian war, but there are brief records at irregular intervals seeming to indicate that court was assembled from time to time as special occasions warranted.

One incident is worthy of note, mentioned by Judge Barker. To collect a sufficient number to form a jury Colonel Sproat had summoned most of the "Revolutioners" from Belpre and Waterford, so that by what were legally required to attend, and those who attended through curiosity a larger number of Revolutionary officers met together at court than assembled before or afterwards at any place; there was no public occasion which called the settlers together during the war, and after that the influx of settlers made it unnecessary to call many to any one point. It was the topic of general conversation that it was probable that never again would there be assembled so large a proportion of those who had been associated together in securing American independence.

During the war, the United States troops were detailed to assist the colonists in the erection of a suitable block-house at "the Point;" it was made with great care; "with strong puncheon floors, bullet proof doors" &c. It was used as a fortress until the close of the war, and was then taken for a Court House, and presumably used for that until the completion of the "First Court House," which we will touch upon later.

As near as can be ascertained, the location of this building which was first a fort and then used for a Court House was a little above where the First National Bank now stands, on Front street.

"Return J. Meigs, Sr., and Paul Fearing were the only professional lawyers at the beginning of court proceedings, and indeed until after the war. Colonel Sproat, as sheriff, and Benjamni Ives Gilman, as clerk of courts, held their offices until the reformation from Federalism to Democracy." After the close of the war, court was held regularly, and the record is complete.

From a sketch by Hon. Rufus E. Harte, we learn that in 1799 the first Court House was begun under the superintendence of Dudley Woodbridge and Griffin Greene. The main building was 45 by 39 feet, two stories; the walls were three feet thick and of 18-inch square, yellow poplar logs, neatly hewed, and held together by heavy iron bolts. The front room up stairs was the court room; it was lighted by seven windows, and warmed by two huge fire-places. "Here"—says Hildreth—"Paul Fearing, Return Jonathan Meigs, and Jacob Burnet, the earliest attorneys of the Northwest displayed their youthful powers, and unfolded talents that few in this day can excel." And here a host of others have begun what proved to be a career of fame.

The Jail was in the back of this structure and "no malefactor ever broke jail here." This building stood on the site of our present "Old Jail."

In 1819 the necessity of a new Court House was apparent, and in 1823 the second Court House was finished—that is, the middle part of the structure which was so long familiar to the present generation. A hot controversy preceded the selection of a site ("History repeated itself" when the present building site was finally selected). Several locations were petitioned for, and at one time it was decided to put it on Fifth street. Governor Meigs' influence secured the present site, and through his influence, also, it was set far enough back as not to impede the fine view down Putnam street, which his friend, Dr. Hildreth, so enjoyed. The part first built contained four offices; later, the back part was added, to accommodate the rest of the county offices, and in 1876 the front of the conglomerate piece of architecture was added, which for more than 75 years served us as our "Hall of Justice."

"A new Court House" had been the cry for so many years, at regular intervals, that there were those who had despaired of ever seeing the ugly old building, with its totally inadequate accommodations (?) replaced with a modern, well-fitted Court House. But it has come; and even the doubter and scorner believed when, two years ago, the old building came down. Hot was the war which had waged, as to the site to be used; many were the places suggested, ranging all the way from the Campus Martius to "the Point," and from "Ice-Harbor" to the Elevated Square; but all that is now lost sight of, in the universal satisfaction and admiration which all her citizens feel in Washington County's new Court House.

The same old bell, which swung in the funny little cupola of the Court House built in 1799, still "calls the people to come into Court." For over a century of time that bell has summoned the citizens of the county to come and adjust their differences, answer to their crimes and misdemeanors, prove themselves innocent or be found guilty, plead the cause of the accused or his accuser. To many, its voice is as familiar as that of friend or kindred, and long years of habit have made its tones the signal for the day's work to begin.

Within the recollection of these readers, the steps to what we call the "Old Court House" were worn into hollows by the passing tread of myriad feet. How many burdens of want, and care, and wrong, and black crime have been carried over those steps—records which do not appear on any journal, of proceedings within the walls of these old buildings, the full history of which will never be known.

In his address at Marietta's brilliant Centennial celebration in 1888, Judge Cox eloquently said "That Court of Justice of this State so solemnly opened, on the 2nd day of September, 1788, has, in all these hundred years, never been closed; it is still open to all classes who seek redress for wrongs." In our beautiful new building, the "Scales of Justice" hang over the judge's desk, an ever present reminder that to us all shall be weighed out that measure of justice which is ours by right.

To the early judiciary we owe the spirit of law and order which has prevailed in our midst; to those who established it, the example of great things accomplished with very limited resources.

CHAPTER XIX.

BENCH AND BAR.

Personal Sketches.

MAJ.-GEN. SAMUEL HOLDEN PARSONS was born at Lyme, Connecticut, in 1737. He graduated at Harvard College in 1756; studied law in the office of his uncle, George Matthew Griswold, and was admitted to the bar in 1759, and settled at Lyme in the practice of his profession. In 1761 he married the daughter of Richard Mathew of Lyme, and in 1762 was elected member of the General Assembly of the Colony of Connecticut, and by successive re-elections held that position until 1774, when he removed from Lyme to New London.

In the stirring times preceding the Declaration of Independence by the Colonies, Mr. Parsons was an ardent patriot, and to him has been attributed the first suggestion of a meeting of commissioners from the Colonies to consult as to their general welfare. Mr. Parsons was one of the bold men who in conjunction with Col. Etham Allen conceived and carried out the project of capturing the forts of Ticonderoga and Crown Point, whereby the command of Lake Champlain was obtained for the Americans. This was the first offensive blow struck by the Colonies in their war for independence.

In 1775 Mr. Parsons was commissioned by the Colony of Connecticut as colonel of a regiment raised for the defense of the Colony, and was actively engaged in the battle of Long Island.

In 1776 he was appointed by Congress, brigadier-general and was with the army at the battle of White Plains. The most important operation of the campaign of 1777, to wit, the capture of the prisoners and the destruction of the enemy's ships and supplies at Sag Harbor, was designed by General Parsons and executed under his directions, and received from Congress a complimentary notice. During most of the years of 1778 and 1779 he was stationed at West Point and the Highlands and rendered valuable service. In 1780 he was commissioned by Congress as major-general. For his bold and successful enterprise for the relief and protection of the inhabitants between New York and Greenwich, he received the thanks of Congress. At the close of the war he resumed the practice of law at Middletown, Connecticut.

In 1786 General Parsons, with General Butler, of Pittsburgh, and George Rogers Clark, by appointment of Congress, held an important treaty with the Indians at the mouth of the Great Miami.

In 1789 he was appointed by Congress one of the judges of the Supreme Court for the "Territory Northwest of the river Ohio," and in May, 1788, removed to Marietta and entered upon the discharge of his duties.

In 1789 he was appointed by the State of Connecticut a commissioner to hold a treaty with the Wyandot Indians of the Western Reserve, and visited that country to make preparations for holding the treaty. In descending the rapids of the Big Beaver River, on his return he was drowned, November 17, 1789, aged 52 years.

GEN. JAMES MITCHELL VARNUM was a descendant of Samuel Varnum, who emigrated from Wales to this country in 1649, and settled at Dracut, Massachusetts. He was born at Dracut in 1749, graduated at Providence College (now Brown University) in the first class in 1769, studied law in the office of Oliver Arnold, Providence, Rhode Island, was admitted to the bar in 1771, and settled at East Greenwich in the practice of his profession. He took an active part in the controversy between the Colonies and Great Britain, had a taste for military life, and shortly after the battle of Lexington, was appointed colonel of one of the three regiments raised by Rhode Island in 1775. During 1776 he served as colonel in the Colonial Army, and in 1777 was promoted by Congress to the rank of brigadier-general. During 1777 and 1778 he was with the army and commanded at Red Bank and Mud Island. In 1780 he was elected a delegate to Congress from Rhode Island, and was an active and influential member of that body. After the war he resumed his practice of law at East Greenwich, and was engaged in most of the important cases in the State. As an advocate and orator, he was considered the equal of Patrick Henry. In 1786 General Varnum was again elected Representative to Congress and was noted for his brilliant eloquence. In 1787, upon the organization of the Ohio Company of Associates at Boston, he was elected a director of the company, and soon after the passage of the ordinance of that year establishing the Northwest Territory, he was elected by Congress one of the judges of the Territory; in the spring of 1788 he left his home in Rhode Island for Marietta and arrived here in June, and entered upon the discharge of his duties of his office. He was the orator of the day at the celebration of American Independence held at "the Point" in Marietta, July 4, 1788, and his address was noted for its many beauties of sentiment and language. He was in poor health when he arrived at Marietta, but was able to attend the meetings of the directors of the Ohio Company, and assisted the Governor and other judges in forming a code of laws for the government of the Northwest Territory. He died at Marietta, January 10, 1789, at the early age of 40, and his funeral was attended with great ceremony.

GEN. RUFUS PUTNAM was appointed by the President, 1790, one of the judges of the Supreme Court for the "Territory northwest of the river Ohio," and served until 1796. An account of the events of his life is contained in a succeeding chapter, on "Sketches of Pioneers."

JOSEPH GILMAN was born in Exeter, New Hampshire, in 1736. In the struggle of the colonists for liberty and independence, he took a decided part for the Whigs, and had their entire confidence. He was chairman of the Committee of Safety for New Hampshire, and, as such, made large advances from his own personal resources for the purchase of supplies for the State troops. Upon the formation of the Ohio Company, he became an associate, and, with his wife, Rebecca Ives Gilman, and his son, Benjamin Ives Gilman, removed to Marietta in 1789.

By Governor St. Clair, he was appointed to and held the offices of Probate judge, judge of the Court of Quarter Sessions, and judge of the Court of Common Pleas.

In 1796 he was appointed by the President of the United States one of the judges of the General Court for the Northwest Territory, and attended the sittings of that court at Marietta, Cincinnati, Detroit, and other places at which the court was held.

Judge Gilman was highly respected and esteemed for his learning and abilities as a jurist and scientist, and for his pleasing qualities. He died in 1806, aged 70 years.

RETURN JONATHAN MEIGS, JR., served by appointment of the President of the United States, as one of the judges of the Supreme Court of the Northwest Territory from 1798 until 1803. A sketch of Colonel Meigs appears in a succeeding chapter of this work.

PAUL FEARING was born in Wareham, Plymouth County, Massachusetts, February 28, 1762, and was the son of Noah and Mary Fearing. Of his early childhood, but little is known; but as the boy is said to be the father of the man, he was doubtless an upright, open-hearted youth. The minister of the parish prepared him for college, as was common in that day, and he was graduated at Harvard in 1785. Having decided on law for a profession, he studied in the office of Esquire Swift, of Windham, Connecticut, and was admitted as attorney in the courts of law of that State in September, 1787. During this year the Ohio Company was matured, for establishing a colony in the Northwest Territory, and was a general topic of conversation in New England. The glowing descriptions of the country and climate in the valley of the Ohio caught the fancy of many young men, as well as older persons, and he decided on visiting that region. On the 1st of May, 1788, he embarked at Boston for Baltimore, where he arrived on the 16th of that month. There he put his trunk into a wagon, and commenced the journey across the mountains on foot. He reached Pittsburgh on the 10th of June, and embarked the same day in a boat for Marietta, where he arrived on the 16th. On the Fourth of July he participated in the first proceedings had on the banks of the Muskingum in honor of the day, and on the 20th listened to the first sermon ever preached in the English tongue northwest of the Ohio River. On the 2nd of September, 1788, he attended the first Common Pleas Court held in the county, and was admitted an attorney-at-law of the courts of the Territory. On the 9th of this month, the county Court of Quarter Sessions of the Peace sat for the first time, and he was appointed counsel in behalf of the United States for Washington County.

The last of January, 1789, he set out on a journey to New England, in company with several persons, among whom was General Parsons. They went up the Ohio in a boat, but when about half way to Wheeling, the floating ice became so troublesome that they left the river and went by land. The travel over the mountains was accomplished on horseback in 26 days, from Wheeling to Middleborough, Massachusetts. He returned in August, by way of Alexandria, and, being a fine pedestrian, again crossed the mountains on foot. He reached Red Stone, a famous port for boats on the Monongahela, on the 14th of the month. While waiting here for a rise in the river, Commodore Whipple came on with his family and that of his son-in-law, Colonel Sproat. With them he embarked in a small boat on the 26th of November, and reached Marietta on the 30th.

The following year was passed in attending to his law business, which began to increase some, as the emigration this season was very great. In November, 1790, he was appointed deputy contractor for supplying the troops at Fort Harmar with fresh meat at the low rate of $13.33 a month and rations. Labor of all kinds was at a depressed state, a common hand on a farm getting only $4, and a private soldier, $3.

Mr. Fearing's first attempt as an advocate before the Court of Quarter Sessions was rather discouraging; but the embarrassment he first experienced vanished in his next trial, and he was able to deliver himself fluently and with fine effect. His frank, manly civility and sound, discriminating mind made him a favorite with the people, as well as the courts, and he had at his command much of the law business of the country.

Hon. Return Jonathan Meigs was his first competitor at the bar, and for the favor of the public. Mr. Meigs was the more prompt and witty, with a ready flow of language, and Mr. Fearing was the more industrious and patient in investigation, so that in final results they were very well matched.

When the troops left Fort Harmar, Mr. Fearing's intimate friend, Major Doughty, made him a present of his dwelling house, a well-finished log building, standing in the southwest angle of the fort. During the war,

Mr. Fearing and his father occupied the house, which afforded a safe retreat from the attacks of the Indians.

In the month of November, 1795, Mr. Fearing was married to Cynthia Rowe, at his own home at Fort Harmar.

In 1797 he was appointed judge of Probate for Washington County.

After the close of the war, the county filled up rapidly, and in 1799 the first Legislature held its session in Cincinnati. In 1800 the second session was held, and in this he was a member. During this period he was chosen a delegate to represent the Territory in Congress, which post he filled for 1801 and 1802, with credit to himself and to the entire satisfaction of the people.

After his return to private life, he resumed the practice of law with increased reputation. On his farm, a little below the mouth of the Muskingum, he erected a neat dwelling house, and planted an extensive orchard of the choicest fruits, of which he was an intelligent and successful cultivator. He was one of the first in Ohio who paid attention to the raising of Merino sheep. His flocks embraced several hundred of these valuable animals, propagated from a few individuals bought at enormous prices.

In 1810 he was appointed associate judge of the Court of Common Pleas. In this office he served seven years with much credit as a sound, just, and impartial judge.

In 1814 he was appointed master commissioner in chancery.

From the first entering of the lands of the Ohio Company for taxation by the State, he acted very extensively as an agent for the shareholders in the Eastern States. In this way a large portion of his time was occupied.

In his disposition, Mr. Fearing was remarkably cheerful and pleasant, much attached to children, and never happier than when in their company. He had great sympathy for the poor and the oppressed, and he was ever ready to stretch forth his hand and open his purse for their relief.

He died on the 21st of August, 1822, after a few days illness, a victim to the fatal epidemic of fever which ravaged the country for two or three years, aged 60 years. His wife died the same day, a few hours after, in the 46th year of her age.

ELIJAH BACKUS was born at Norwich, Connecticut; he was a graduate of Yale College, and was admitted to the bar in Connecticut in the year 1800. Shortly thereafter he came to Marietta and engaged in the practice of law. Wyllys Silliman, of Zanesville, was associated with him as a partner.

Mr. Backus held the office of receiver of public moneys of the United States. In 1801 he established the Gazette newspaper, of which he was editor. In 1803 he was a member of the Ohio Senate. He was owner of the island in the Ohio River, now called Blennerhassett's Island, and sold it to Mr. Blennerhassett.

In 1808 Mr. Backus removed to Ruskin, Illinois, and died there in 1812.

LEWIS CASS was born at Exeter, New Hampshire, October 9, 1782. In 1799 he was employed as a teacher at Wilmington, Delaware, where his father, Maj. Jonathan Cass of the army, was stationed. In 1800 he removed with his father's family to Marietta, studied law there, and in 1802 was admitted to the bar and removed to Zanesville and commenced practice.

In 1806 he married Elizabeth Spencer, of Wood County, Virginia, and the same year was elected a member of the Ohio Legislature. From 1807 to 1813 he was State marshal. In the War of 1812 he was colonel of a regiment of Ohio volunteers, under General Hull, and was soon promoted to the rank of brigadier-general.

In 1813 he was appointed Governor of the Territory of Michigan, and held that office for 18 years. In 1831 he was appointed by President Johnson, Secretary of War, and was at the head of the War Department at the commencement of the Florida War. In 1836 he was appointed minister to France, and served in that capacity until 1842 when he resigned. In 1845 he was elected United States Senator from the State of Michigan. In 1848 he was the Democratic candidate for President of the United States, but failed of election on account of a division of his party in the State of New York. In 1849 he was re-elected to the Senate for the remainder of his original term. As Senator he opposed the "Wilmot Proviso," although instructed by the Legislature of his State to vote for it. He did not vote for the "Fugitive Slave" bill. In 1851 he was again elected Senator from Michigan. In 1852 he was a candidate before the Democratic convention at Baltimore for the nomination for the Presidency, but was not successful. In 1857 he was appointed Secretary of State by President Buchanan. In December, 1860, disapproving of the action of the President in refusing to reinforce Major Anderson and provision Fort Sumter, he promptly resigned his office as member of the cabinet. Through the War of the Rebellion his sympathies were with the national cause.

General Cass died at Detroit June 17, 1866.

He was a man of integrity, of great ability as scholar, jurist, and statesman, and his public career of more than half a century was honorable to himself and the nation.

BENJAMIN RUGGLES was born at Woodstock, Connecticut, February 21, 1783. He attended the Brooklyn Academy, and graduated from that institution. He studied law with Judge Peters, at Hartford, and was there admitted to the bar.

In 1807 he moved to Marietta, Ohio, and here pursued with success the practice of his profession. His profound learning, skill and care as a counsellor won for him public commendation.

In 1810 he was elected by the Legislature of the State to succeed Calvin Pease as president judge of the Third Circuit. Shortly after his election to the judgeship, he moved from Marietta to St. Clairsville.

In 1815 he was elected by the Legislature to the United States Senate, and resigned the office of judge after having ably filled it for five years.

In 1821, and again in 1827, he was re-elected to the Senate of the United States, and during his career of 18 years in Congress as Senator from Ohio, he rendered valuable services to his State and the nation. For many years he was chairman of the Senate committee on claims.

He was president of the caucus, held at Washington in 1824, which nominated William H. Crawford, of Georgia, for the Presidency.

In 1833, at the expiration of his third term as Senator, he retired from public life and gave his attention to agricultural pursuits, especially the cultivation of fruits and the introduction of choice varieties.

In 1840 he was favorably spoken of, in various parts of the country, for the office of Vice-President of the United States.

He died at his residence in St. Clairsville, September 2, 1857. As a statesman Judge Ruggles had the confidence of the Senate and of the people. As a jurist, his great ability was not as conspicuous in open court as in chambers. Though lacking, in some measure, the gifts of an orator, as a consulting attorney he had few superiors. As a private citizen he was highly respected. He was generous in his impulses, liberal in his views, and exerted an excellent moral influence wherever he was known.

THOMAS BACKUS was born at Norwich, Connecticut, in 1785; graduated at Yale College; studied law in the office of his father, Elijah Backus, at Marietta, and was there admitted to the bar in 1808. He was married to Temperance Lord in 1810, and in 1811 removed to Franklin, Franklin County, Ohio, and engaged in the practice of law, and in 1820 was appointed prosecuting attorney.

In 1823 he removed to Union County, Ohio, and was there appointed prosecuting attorney, and during his term of office died October 25, 1825.

WILLIAM WOODEBRIDGE was born in Norwich, Connecticut, August 30, 1780. He received his early education in his native State.

studied law in Litchfield, Connecticut, and, with his father, emigrated to the Northwest Territory in 1791, settling in Marietta.

In 1806 he was admitted to the bar in Ohio, and in the following year was elected to the General Assembly of the State.

From 1808 until 1814 he was prosecuting attorney for his county, and also a member of the Ohio State Senate.

During the latter year, without solicitation, he received the appointment of Secretary of the Territory of Michigan, from President Madison, and removed to Detroit and entered upon the performance of the duties of his new office.

He was elected the first delegate to Congress from Michigan, in 1819, and forwarded the interests of his constituents in a manner to elicit the warmest approbation.

He was appointed judge of the Supreme Court of the Territory in 1828, and performed the duties of that office four years.

He was one of the members of the convention which framed the State Constitution, in 1835, and was elected a State Senator under it in 1837.

He was chosen to succeed Stevens T. Mason as Governor of the State, in 1839, and served during one term. At the expiration of his term of office as Governor, he was elected a United States Senator, and served in that capacity from 1841 until 1847.

While in the Senate, he took a leading part in much of the important legislation of that body, both as a member of a number of the principal committees and also as a debater upon the floor of the Senate.

His last days were spent in retirement in Detroit, where he died October 20, 1861.

Governor Woodbridge was an eminent jurist and constitutional lawyer, and at the time of his death was the oldest and most distinguished member of the Detroit bar. He was a man of true principles and honor, who had served the public for many years with fidelity and integrity, and who died leaving to his children an unblemished name.

DAVID PUTNAM became a member of the Washington County bar about 1808. A sketch of his life will be found in the biography of Samuel H. Putnam, in another chapter of this volume, devoted to "Sketches of Pioneers."

GUSTAV SWAN was born at Peterborough, New Hampshire, in 1787. By his own exertions he obtained a good clerical and scientific education. He studied law at Concord, New Hampshire, and was admitted to the bar of that State. In 1810 he came to Marietta, and was admitted to the bar of Ohio. From Marietta he moved to Franklin County, and engaged in the practice of law. In 1812 and again in 1817 he was a representative in the Ohio Legislature. In 1823 he was elected judge of the Common Pleas Court, and at the expiration of his term of office resumed the practice of law in Columbus, and continued there until 1843.

Judge Swan was an eloquent and able advocate, and his practice in Franklin and neighboring counties was large. After 1843 he devoted himself more exclusively to his duties as president of the State Bank of Ohio. He died at Columbus, February 6, 1860.

CALEB EMERSON was born August 21, 1779, at Ashby, Massachusetts. It appears from some fragmentary memoranda among the papers he left, written in the last years of his life, that he lost both his parents early; that his mother died when he was six weeks old; that his father lost his health in the Revolutionary War, and his property by Continental money; that he was brought up by persons who were not of his kin; and that he was a student at law and assistant editor for some time before he left New England for Ohio, in the fall of 1808.

There remain to his descendants very few of the letters he received previous to 1820. Of the documents connected with his New England life, the most important is a file of letters from James Elliott, Esq., a lawyer of Brattleborough, Vermont. Mr. Elliott appears to have been his early friend and counsellor, and showed much interest in his future advancement. In the earliest of these letters, dated January 3, 1801, he speaks of the young man's correct and friendly letter (addressed to him from Mason, postmarked Amherst, New Hampshire), and says it bears the marks of an honest mind, and the promise of future excellence. He desires to know his age, profession and prospects, his place of residence, amusements of infancy and course of study, and wishes to correspond with him occasionally.

In a subsequent letter Mr. Elliott speaks approvingly of his purpose to go west, but advises him first to spend a year or two in a law office, as in a new country the farmer, merchant and lawyer might all be combined in one person. He recommends that he cultivate his literary tastes, and promises to aid him.

In February, 1806, then at Washington City, Mr. Elliott addresses him as a student at law at Amherst, New Hampshire, having ascertained his then residence from the publisher of the Farmers' Cabinet at that place, whom he was probably assisting in the editorship of that journal.

Mr. Elliott frequently posted him up in the proceedings of Congress for the subsequent two years, and was one of several well known persons in that part of New England to give him recommendations as to general good character and proficiency in law studies, when he left for Marietta, Ohio.

Governor Tiffin, of Ohio, had advised a friend of Mr. Emerson's, at Washington, that it was not necessary for an applicant for admission to the Ohio bar to appear before the judges in session, but he could apply to any judge separately, who, if satisfied of his competency, could give him his certificate, and then he would apply to another judge, and the several certificates he received would entitle him to admission.

One of his remaining letters is one of recommendation from Hon. Paul Fearing, then a judge, dated September 13, 1809 (to Gen. Philemon Beecher, of Lancaster, Ohio), of Mr. Emerson, as a suitable candidate for admission to the Ohio bar, and doubtless he was admitted about that time. He opened a law office at Marietta, visiting some of the neighboring County Courts.

He married, July 29, 1810, Mary Dana, daughter of Capt. William Dana, of Belpre, Ohio, one of the early emigrants from New England.

In the same year began his connection with the Western Spectator, a weekly journal of Marietta, to which was annexed a small bookstore. The first number seems to have been issued about the 23rd of October, 1810. He gave it up July 31, 1813, but continued the practice of law, and was appointed prosecuting attorney of Washington County in February, 1815, and was continued in that office until April, 1821. In October, 1820, while residing on Front, between Scammel and Worcester streets, the dwelling house he occupied was consumed by fire, and most of the furniture and clothing of the family, and nearly all his valuable papers were destroyed. He and his family experienced great kindness and hospitality from the citizens of Marietta. His law business was continued.

In 1822 a fever, supposed to result from the miasmatic influences of the Ohio shore, prevailed extensively in Marietta township and elsewhere. Mr. Emerson's family was down with it for a considerable time, usually leaving only one or two to wait on the rest. He was afterwards prostrated with a sickness which brought him very near the gates of death. After his recovery, he had an abiding conviction that close application to a law office was ruinous to his health; and though his connection with legal matters was more or less maintained to the last years of his life, his time was largely given to horticultural and other industrial pursuits, mingled with literary, political, and social activities, and efforts in behalf of religious, moral, and educational institutions in Marietta.

He and his wife joined the Marietta Baptist Church, which then worshiped four miles above the village, about the year 1822, and remained in its communion to the last.

Being one of the earliest trustees of Marietta College, and remaining such during his life, he displayed an abiding interest in its growth.

In the year 1836 he was editor of the Mari- etta Gazette, a firm advocate for the right of free discussion. Certain lecturers about that time, in behalf of negro emancipation, were in danger of being mobbed, but the energetic philanthropists of Washington County secured for them fair treatment. In December, 1837, the Marietta Gazette passed into the hands of Isaac Maxon.

Several years later an advantageous sale of Mr. Emerson's three-acre lots near Marietta, gave him leisure for literary effort. He wrote much in favor of emancipation, for journals both at home and abroad.

During the last 10 or 12 years of his life, he took great interest in the early history of Ohio, and especially of Washington County, and made extensive collections of old newspapers and other documents calculated to preserve a knowledge of the past, and to some extent lectured on these subjects. His duties as master commissioner in chancery, and as administrator for several estates, gave him opportunities for travel, where he could gather up such material. Probably the most complete of his essays on these subjects was an article in the North American Review, which includes the details of Mr. Manasseh Cutler's mission to Congress in behalf of the Ohio Company, for the purchase of the well known tract which bears its name.

In 1845 he took an active part in bringing the celebrated case of the captured Ohioans, which involved, in part, the question of boundary between Ohio and Virginia, to the notice of the State authorities. His sympathies were strongly enlisted for the oppressed and down-trodden.

He died March 14, 1853, at his homestead in Marietta, aged 73½ years.

JOHN PENNYBACKER MAYBERRY was born March 1, 1790, at Pine Forge, near the village of New Market, Virginia. His home was located in the loveliest portion of the beautiful valley of the Shenandoah. This is now a historic location from the fact that during the late Civil War this homestead was the scene of many of the severest struggles for the possession of the valley.

His father was an Irish gentleman, having emigrated to America in early life. His mother was descended from German ancestors. Her maiden name was Rebekah Pennybacker. She was one of the large family of Pennybackers so well known throughout Pennsylvania.

John P. Mayberry, while in the valley of the Shenandoah, studied law under the eminent Judge Allen, of New Market, Virginia. Before completing his studies, however, in the year 1810, his father determined to seek a new home in the rich lands beyond the mountains, and his son, John, accompanied him, purchasing plantations near Belleville, Wood County, Virginia. They there settled. After a brief sojourn upon the plantations, he became deputy sheriff of Wood County. In 1812 he visited Richmond, and made application for admission to practice in the State courts, and was given a certificate.

After his return, however, wishing to pursue his studies and perfect himself in other branches of the law, he went to Ohio, attracted by the reputation of Judge Fearing, of Harmar, Ohio, who was the first lawyer admitted to the bar in this State, the attorney of the Ohio Company and the leading legal mind in the Northwest Territory. Here he had the advantage of an extensive library, and finished his studies with Judge Fearing in 1815. On the 15th of August, 1816, he married the only daughter of his preceptor, Lucy Willis Fearing, with whom he lived over 50 years. In 1817 he removed with his family to Parkersburg, Virginia, and soon after was elected as a Representative of the Whig party to the House of Delegates at Richmond and served during the term of 1817 and 1818. In 1818 he left Richmond to accept the position of receiver of public moneys, tendered him by the United States government. This necessitated his return to Marietta, Ohio, where he succeeded Col. Levi Barber, who was elected to Congress. The business of this office was very extensive, as the Territory was fast filling up, and the government lands selling rapidly. His experience while in office illustrates the purity and honesty of the pioneer settlers of the Northwest. The law existing at that time required the receiver to deposit all moneys received in the United States repositories situated at Cincinnati and Chillicothe, and the payments were to be made in the same coin as was paid to the receiver. The gold and silver received during the quarter had to be transported from Marietta to the points above-named. At that time the woods were unfrequented and obscure, and the country sparsely settled, making it a perilous journey to transport $6,000 or $8,000 in gold and silver on horseback. Yet these trips were made at the expiration of each quarter by Mr. Mayberry, accompanied by his father, or Henry or Silas Fearing, and Col. David Barker, and during his term of office of over 10 years, neither he himself nor his messengers were disturbed in their journeys to and fro. Mr. Mayberry was receiver until the year 1829. During this period he was also elected prosecuting attorney of Washington County, faithfully performing his duties and giving entire satisfaction to the public.

Retiring from these two important offices, and after settling his affairs relative thereto, he left Ohio and returned to his old home at Parkersburgh, and engaged in mercantile business. As was the custom in those days, he made frequent journeys over the mountains to Philadelphia on horseback for the purpose of purchasing his stock in trade. While still engaged in merchandising, he was elected prosecuting attorney for the county of Wood. In 1832 he was again called from private life, being elected to the House of Delegates. At the expiration of this term, he was re-elected by his well-satisfied constituents, and although not seeking or having any desire of office, he was again returned in 1837 and 1838, to the House of Delegates; his ripe experience and sound judgment making him a great power, giving him the foremost position among the legislators.

The first recognition of any material importance which Parkersburgh or Wood County received from the State Legislature of old Virginia in the way of improvement and bringing them into public notice, was the establishment of the Northwestern Virginia turnpike road leading from Winchester in the valley of Virginia over the Alleghanies to Parkersburgh, a distance of 250 miles. This great work was completed while Mr. Mayberry was in the House of Delegates, and to his exertions, no doubt, is West Virginia indebted for this great benefit.

He acquired wealth by prudent investments in real estate, together with the inheritance which his wife received from her father's estate.

Mr. Mayberry, in his long public life at Marietta, Parkersburgh, and Richmond, made friends with all whom he came in contact, and such was his even temperament that even in sharp political contests his urbanity of manner and kindness for all humanity left his career destitute of enemies. He was a ripe scholar and a trained thinker, commanding in stature, with a pleasing address. He was a perfect type of a Virginia gentleman, of Washington's time, his manner and mien occasioning many of his friends to believe his resemblance to Washington very marked. Had his ambition led him to continue his public career, his political associates were confident he would have taken a ranking position in national affairs among the great statesmen of that day, but turning aside from the allurements of public life, he returned to the quiet old home he loved so well, in Parkersburgh. His house and grounds soon became shaded with the fine old trees he planted. His office door under the shade of the catalpas was a charmed spot to all who came under the restful influence of the peaceful atmosphere. Happiness and contentment followed him like a shadow. The old men loved to linger with him, and the young men to listen to the fine talk of the grand old gentleman. He devoted much of his time in later years to the rearing of blooded horses and to the improvement of the plantations he owned in the State. In his stables were some of the finest imported stock in the South and West, many of the descendants of the stables being favorite horses of the present time. He died while his favorite horse, Lath, was running; he expired sitting in his carriage, November 15, 1866, closing a life of nearly 77 years, leaving his wife and son as the only immediate relatives to deplore his loss, as he was himself the last member of his father's family. When the news came that the pure and noble John P. Mayberry was no more, a multitude mourned over the loss of a great and good man.

ARIUS NYE was the son of Col. Ichabod Nye, and grandson of Gen. Benjamin Tupper, two of the pioneers who, with their families, made at the mouth of the Muskingum in 1788 the first settlement in the "Territory Northwest of the river Ohio." He was born in the Campus Martius—"the stockade"—at Marietta, December 27, 1792. During his boyhood days, educational facilities at the new settlements were quite limited, yet mainly by his own exertions he obtained what is now called a good common school education. In 1807 he went to Springfield, afterward to Putnam in Muskingum County, and engaged in merchandising.

In 1815 he married Rowena Spencer, daughter of Dr. Joseph Spencer, of Vienna, Virginia, and sister of Mrs. General Cass. He was director in the Bank of Zanesville before he was 21 years of age. During 1817-18 he studied law, was admitted to the bar, and began to make his mark in Muskingum County. In the autumn of 1822, or spring of 1823, he moved to Gallipolis, at the beginning of the "sickly season," when he was taken sick with the prevailing epidemic, or malarial fever. In 1824-25 he moved to Marietta and there acquired a large and lucrative practice. For several years after removing to Marietta, he served as cashier of the Bank of Marietta. In 1827 he was elected Representative in the State Legislature, and re-elected in 1828. In 1831 he was elected State Senator and served two years. At the time of the great flood in 1832, he removed his office from Putnam street to the old Ohio Company's office on Washington street, where he kept his office until he was elected judge. He early acquired a large law library, and by 1837 probably had accumulated the largest library of any lawyer in Southeastern Ohio. In 1840 he was again elected Representative in the State Legislature.

Judge Arius Nye was a devoted member of the Protestant Episcopal Church; and regarded his duties as a church man equally as important with his duties as a lawyer. It was mainly through his efforts that an Episcopal Church was organized at Marietta; and when organized it was supported and maintained largely by his contributions and labors. He was lay reader and senior warden of St. Luke's Church for a great many years; and for the first seven years, after its organization in 1826, he conducted nearly all the services. He was usually a delegate to diocesan conventions; and took a prominent part in the management of the affairs of the diocese. The Protestant Episcopal Church in Marietta owes him a great debt of gratitude.

His son, A. Spencer Nye, became associated with him in practice as A. Nye & Son, continuing as a firm until 1846. In 1847, Arius Nye was elected president judge of the district composed of the counties of Washington, Morgan, Athens, Meigs, Gallia, and Lawrence. The district was large and difficult of access during portions of the year, there being no railroads, and especially during the spring and autumn were county seats difficult to reach. His health broke down under his labors on the bench, and he resigned in 1850. After his health improved, he associated with him David Alban, and practiced as Nye & Alban until the commencement of the Civil War, when Mr. Alban enlisted in the army. Thereafter as lawyer, generally associated in business with some younger member of the bar, Judge Nye gave his attention to cases which were brought under his notice. His last illness was protracted and painful, but borne with fortitude. He died at his home in Marietta, July 27, 1865, in the 73rd year of his age.

Judge Nye was an original, self-reliant, self-made man—a man of feeling, thought, and conviction. He will long survive in the memory of his friends, in the impressions which he made on the community where he lived and in the legislation of his native State. At the time of his death, he had obtained a wider celebrity than any other Marietta man. This was due to his strong character, to his industry, to his devotion to every accepted trust, to his public spirit, and above all to his inflexible integrity of mind and heart. As a jurist he ranked among the first chancery and criminal lawyers in the West. He was deeply read in the learning of the profession and thoroughly imbued with the lofty spirit of its great masters.

WILLIAM A. WHITTLESEY was born at Danbury, Connecticut, in 1796. In 1816 he was graduated at Yale College, and for some time thereafter was employed as teacher. In 1818 he came to Canfield, Ohio, entered the office of his uncle, Hon. Elisha Whittlesey, as student at law, being fellow-student there with J. M. Giddings, and in 1820 was admitted to the bar. In 1821 he came to Marietta, and entered upon the practice of his profession. In 1825 he was elected auditor of the county, and for two successive years held that office, and received the public commendation for the faithfulness, care and ability with which he discharged his duties.

In 1839 he was the candidate of the Democratic party for Representative in the Ohio Legislature, and was elected.

In 1841 and for several years following, he was associated with Gen. Charles B. Goddard, of Zanesville, in the practice of law in Washington County. In 1848 he was elected member of Congress from the district comprising the counties of Washington, Morgan and Perry. He declined being a candidate for re-election.

In 1856 and again in 1860, and again in 1862, he was elected mayor of the city of Marietta, and for six years discharged the duties of that office in an approved and satisfactory manner.

Mr. Whittlesey was an inveterate and inimitable story-teller; and it was not unusual to find half the lawyers of the city, with many of their friends, gathered about Mr. Whittle-sey's office to listen to his stories; and no one went away dissatisfied.

For some time previous to his death, Mr. Whittlesey suffered from painful disease, but bore his affliction with fortitude and resignation. He died November 6, 1866, at Brooklyn, New York, where he had gone for medical treatment, leaving one surviving child, a daughter, now the wife of W. B. Mitchell, of St. Cloud, Minnesota. His remains were brought back to Marietta, and buried in the Mount Cemetery by the side of his deceased son, the lamented Capt. W. B. Whittlesey, a brave and noble officer, who was killed at the battle of Missionary Ridge in November, 1863.

The following is an extract from the report of a committee, appointed by the bar of Washington County to give expression of the sentiments of the profession, in relation to Mr. Whittlesey's death:

"With feelings of the deepest sorrow and regret we, the members of the Washington County Bar, have heard of the death of our late associate, the Hon. William A. Whittlesey. During the whole period of our connection with the profession in this county, we have been witnesses of the estimable qualities of the deceased.

"As a lawyer, his discriminating mind, his legal acquirements, the friendliness and honesty of his counsels, his urbanity in the court room, and his uniform courtesy and kindness toward the junior members of the profession have elicited our esteem, and endeared him in our recollections.

"As a citizen and neighbor, the kindness of his disposition, his liberality, his cheerfulness and his remarkable freedom from all feelings of envy, resentment and ill-will won for him the respect and friendship of all who knew him."

DAVID BARBER, son of Levi Barber, was born at Harmar, Washington County, Ohio, August 14, 1804. He was educated at Washington College, Pennsylvania, and graduated from that institution in 1825. He studied law with the Hon. John P. Mayberry, of Marietta; was admitted to the bar in 1829, and engaged in the practice of his profession at Harmar.

In 1840 he was elected prosecuting attorney of the county. In 1845 he was again elected prosecuting attorney.

About 1876 he moved to the State of Illinois, and located near Quincy, where he extensively engaged in agricultural pursuits. He died there in 1886.

LEVI HART GODDARD, son of Hon. Calvin Goddard, was born at Norwich, Connecticut, in 1810. He studied law and was admitted to the bar in his native State. In 1835 he removed to Marietta, Ohio, and then engaged in the practice of his profession. After a short residence in Marietta, he returned to Norwich and there resumed the practice of law and continued the same until the time of his death. He died of pneumonia, in 1862.

Mr. Goddard was a lawyer of learning and ability, as counsellor and consulting attorney, and his amiable and cheery social qualities made for him hosts of friends. He was married, in 1835, to Mary Woodbridge Perkins, of Norwich.

RUFUS E. HARTE was born in Middlebury, now embraced in the corporation limits of Akron, Ohio. He attended the academy at Tallmadge and the preparatory department of the Western Reserve College at Hudson. In 1833 he was graduated at Yale College, Connecticut. He studied law with Hon. Gregory Powers, of Akron. In 1835, at the session of the Supreme Court at Medina, he was admitted to the bar. In 1837 he located at Marietta and engaged in the practice of his profession, associated with William A. Whittlesey, as Whittlesey & Harte.

In 1839 he was married to Julia Holden, daughter of Joseph Holden, of Marietta.

In 1845 he was elected Senator in the Ohio Legislature from the district composed of the counties of Washington, Morgan and Perry. In 1851 he was elected prosecuting attorney for the county of Washington. In 1852 he was elected, by the trustees of the benevolent institutions of Ohio, superintendent of the institution for the blind, and resided at Columbus four years, discharging the duties of that office.

In 1856 he returned to Marietta and resumed the practice of law, associated therein with Melvin Clarke.

In 1861 he was elected treasurer of Washington County, and held that office for a period of four years. In 1880 he was elected mayor of the city of Marietta, and discharged the duties of that office efficiently.

He died in the year 1891.

CHARLES F. BUELL, son of Daniel H. Buell, of Marietta, was born in Washington County, Ohio, March 12, 1814. He was a student in Marietta College and Kenyon College; studied law with Hon. Samuel F. Vinton, of Gallipolis, and was admitted to the bar in 1837. He practiced law a short time at Gallipolis, and about a year at Georgetown, Brown County, Ohio. In 1839 he returned to Marietta and engaged in the practice of his profession.

In 1860 he was elected probate judge of Washington County. After serving three years in that office he resumed the practice of law at Marietta. He died here in 1881.

WILLIAM D. EMERSON, eldest son of Caleb and Mary (Dana) Emerson, was born at Marietta, July 9, 1813. He was prepared for college by Rev. Luther G. Bingham, then pastor of the Congregational Church at Marietta. At the age of 16 he entered the Ohio University at Athens, from which he graduated in 1833, with the highest honors of the class. He was one of the teachers in the High School which opened up in Library Hall, on Front street, which afterwards unfolded into Marietta College. In 1836 he was assistant editor with his father on the Marietta Gazette. His health failing in this department, he went west and spent two years as a common school teacher. The scenery of the wide West seems to have inspired his poetic fancy, and some of his finest poems, which afterward came into print, were produced at this time.

He returned to Marietta in 1839, studied law, was admitted to the bar in 1841, and for several years kept a law office with his father.

In 1845 he prepared and published the first map of Washington County. He was prosecuting attorney of that county for one year, ending March, 1848, filling the unexpired term of Arius Nye, Esq., who was appointed presiding judge. He was assistant clerk in the Commercial Court of Cincinnati from 1848 to 1852, and for four years after made up records in the clerk's office of the Cincinnati and Hamilton county courts. He kept a law office in Cincinnati until 1860. Since that time he devoted himself mainly to literary pursuits. The bent of his mind was more for literature than jurisprudence. In 1851 he issued "Occasional Thoughts in Verse," for private distribution. In 1874 he issued a second volume of verse.

Mr. Emerson was much interested in poetry; and established in Marietta College a prize to encourage students and graduates to write poems of merit. He died in 1891.

ARIUS SPENCER NYE, son of Arius Nye, was admitted to the bar about 1840, and in company with his father practiced law at Marietta as Nye & Son.

In 1846 he was elected cashier of the Ross County Bank, branch of the State Bank of Ohio, and removed to Chillicothe, where he died in 1884.

DARWIN E. GARDNER, son of William and Sarah B. (Earl) Gardner, was born at Norwalk, Ohio, January 25, 1820.

Pursuant to his father's wishes, and to some extent under his supervision, he pursued a thorough course of preparatory studies and about 1839 was graduated at the Western Reserve College. He studied law with Judge Crowell, of Warren, Ohio, and was admitted to the bar at Newark in 1841.

The same year he located at Marietta and commenced the practice of his profession and successfully prosecuted the same at Marietta until 1851, when he removed to Cleveland, and soon thereafter to Toledo, where, until the time of his death, he was extensively and prosperously engaged in the purchase and sale of real estate. He died at Toledo August 5, 1867, at the age of 47. Mr. Gardner was an able lawyer, and an enterprising and successful man of business, and in the several places of his residence had the confidence and esteem of his fellow citizens. He was married, in 1842, to Elizabeth P. Putnam, of Hudson, Ohio, who died in 1846, and in 1859 he married Sarah Williams, of Norwalk.

WYLIE H. OLDHAM, son of Samuel and Rebecca Oldham, was born November 21, 1819, at the old homestead in Ohio County, (West) Virginia, where his grandfather and father lived and died. When about one year old he was taken to the State of New York, where his father was employed as a missionary, teaching the Seneca Indians, lived in Cornplanter's town, remembered well the wild scenes in which his early boyhood was spent. Leaving there at five and a half years of age, he acquired such an education as the primitive schools of Virginia then afforded. In 1832 he entered the private academy at West Alexander, Washington County, Pennsylvania, under the charge of Rev. John McCluskey, pastor of the Presbyterian Church of that place and pursued his academic studies under Rev. Mr. McCluskey's care until September, 1836, when he entered the junior class in Washington College. He was a member of the Washington Literary Society, graduated in June, 1838, and took the first honor of his society and second of his class (the first honor of the class being by rule of the faculty due that year to the Union Society which alone prevented his obtaining the first honor of his class). In the fall of 1838 he went to Mount Vernon, Ohio, and spent one year in teaching. In the fall of 1839 he went to Lexington, Kentucky, and taught one year, near the home of Henry Clay, visiting him frequently in 1840. He studied law with Isaac Hoge, at Moundsville, (West) Virginia, and was admitted to the bar in 1842. Shortly after, he was elected prosecuting attorney. He represented Marshall County in the Virginia Legislature in 1846-47 and '48. He practiced law at Moundsville from the time he was admitted to the bar until May, 1865. May 23, 1844, he married Mary Curtis, daughter of R. C. Curtis, of Moundsville.

In May, 1865, he moved to Marietta, Ohio, where he resided until the time of his death, engaged extensively and successfully in the practice of his profession. He died July 22, 1875.

Mr. Oldham was probably the greatest jury lawyer that ever belonged to the Washington County Bar. He was a polished orator, with a large vocabulary; but he never talked over the heads of his jury. His evident candor and sincerity inclined jurors to sympathize with his views of the case; and his knowledge of human nature enabled him to lay the stress of his speech where it was most needed.

He was for many years a railroad attorney; and in that early day made a practice (much more general now than then) of settling every case or claim that could be settled on reasonable terms. Indeed, he was inclined to favor the settlement of controversies generally.

The social qualities of Mr. Oldham were of a very high order. He was kind and cordial with every one. He enjoyed social gatherings, and showed it by his manner. He was a good talker, but at the same time a willing listener. His conversation was always entertaining, and usually instructive. He was quick at repartee; but there was nothing bitter about his wit. Socially he was a universal favorite with old and young, with rich and poor.

Mr. Oldham was an orator, and as statesman and lawyer his speeches and arguments were models of beauty and eloquence. He was a good citizen, an earnest churchman, a liberal contributor to benevolent enterprises, a man of principle, honor and fidelity, whose death was deeply lamented by all who knew him.

JOHN M. GUITTEAU, son of Benjamin Guiteau, was born in Fearing township, Washington County, Ohio, in 1821.

He was educated at Marietta College; studied law with Hon. Arius Nye, of Marietta, and was admitted to the bar in 1842. He commenced practice at Urbana, Ohio, associated with Hon. Thomas Corwin, and about 1843 moved to Cincinnati. After a residence of three or four years at Cincinnati he removed to New York City, where he engaged in the practice of law. He died there in 1898.

CHARLES R. RHODES was born at Zanesville, Ohio, November 5, 1819, the third child of Dr. Dndley Woodbridge Rhodes. He went to school in the preparatory department of Kenyon College in 1835, entered the freshman class in 1836, and graduated in course in 1840, taking the second honor of his class.

He entered his name as a student of law in the office of Messrs. Goddard & Converse, Zanesville, and was admitted to the bar at Newark, Ohio, in 1843. The same year he removed to St. Louis, Missouri, to establish himself as a lawyer, where he remained until the fall of 1836. The same year, having married Mary E. Ward, the third child of Hon. Nahum Ward, of Marietta, he returned to Ohio, and made his residence in Marietta, where he still resides.

In January, 1855, he was elected prosecuting attorney, and continued in that office until January, 1857. In February, 1858, he was elected Probate Judge of Washington County, and continued in office until February, 1861.

During the War of the Rebellion the people living in the little townships along the Ohio River, were kept in a constant state of alarm, apprehending incursions from the lawless bands of rebels roving through West Virginia. Mr. Rhodes organized a company of from 40 to 60 men, which, through the friendly assistance of Col. William Craig, quartermaster of the United States Army, stationed at Marietta, he was able to arm and equip, and which he, as captain, kept in thorough drill and discipline, prepared for the emergencies of the times.

He was appointed by the Governor of the State (Hon. Rutherford B. Hayes) delegate to the National Commercial Convention, which met at Cincinnati; the following year he was again appointed by the Governor delegate for Southeastern Ohio to the same convention, which met at Baltimore.

Mr. Rhodes' whole life in Marietta was closely identified with the manufacturing and commercial enterprises of the town, and especially with the history and prosperity of St. Luke's Protestant Episcopal Church and Sunday-school—for more than 30 years a member and secretary of the vestry, many times their delegate to the diocesan convention, and for more than 20 years superintendent of the Sunday-school. He died in 1887.

MELVIN CLARKE was born at Ashfield, Massachusetts, November 15, 1818, and was the oldest of a family of eight children. He was the son of Stephen and Roxy Alden Clarke, and of the seventh generation in a direct line from John Alden, of "Mayflower" fame. His early education was derived from the common schools of Whately, Franklin County, Massachusetts, a few terms spent in a select school, and a few months at the academy at Conway, Massachusetts. He came west in the fall of 1838, and taught school in Kentucky, at Parkersburgh, (West) Virginia, and in this county for a series of years. Meanwhile he was studying law and was admitted to the bar in 1843, and settled in law practice at McConnelsville, Morgan County, Ohio, and continued in the practice there for 10 years.

In 1853 he removed to Marietta, and continued to practice his profession until the beginning of the war. He became a leading member of the bar, and an influential citizen.

Of his mind, the distinguishing features were clearness and strength of comprehension. He had the ability to analyze, arrange and present, in a forcible manner, the evidence in a case, and conducted, with marked talent, the important causes committed to him.

Impelled by motives of patriotism, he, with others, was actively instrumental, at the breaking out of the war, in raising and organizing the Thirty-sixth Ohio Volunteer Infantry, and was appointed its lieutenant-colonel, and served in that capacity as a brave and gallant officer until killed by a shot from a 10-pound shell at the battle of Antietam, September 17, 1862.

He was buried with military honors in Mound Cemetery, at Marietta, and a monument erected to his memory by his army comrades and associates of the bar.

He married Dorcas Dana, daughter of William Dana, of Newport, Ohio, for his first wife, who died about 1850, and left one son, Joseph D. Clarke, who was killed in the war at City Point, Maryland, in 1864. He married, as his second wife, Sophia Browning, of Belpre, Ohio. He was, at the time of his death, a member of the Congregational Church of Marietta.

SAMUEL B. ROBINSON was born at Washington, Pennsylvania, February 15, 1814, and was educated at Washington, now Washington and Jefferson, College of that State. In 1835 he was editor of the Washington Reporter. In 1836, with his widowed mother and her family, he moved to Lake Chute, and shortly thereafter to Beverly, Ohio. In 1837, at Beverly, in partnership with John Dodge, he engaged in mercantile business and continued therein for seven years. He studied law, Hon. Isaac Paine being his preceptor, and was admitted to the bar in 1844, and entered upon the practice of his profession in Beverly. In 1846 he married Colina N. Dodge, youngest daughter of John Dodge, of Beverly.

In 1846 he was elected prosecuting attorney of the county. In 1873 he was again elected prosecuting attorney, and the duties of this office he ably and faithfully discharged. Mr. Robinson was never of robust frame and during the latter period of his life was in very poor health. On the night of January 2, 1878, while traveling by steamer from Beverly to Marietta, he fell overboard and was drowned. His body was recovered and buried by the side of his deceased wife in Beverly Cemetery. During his career in life as editor, merchant, and lawyer, Mr. Robinson deserved and received the confidence and esteem of his fellow-citizens.

DAVIS GREEN, son of Rev. Allen Green, was born in Tyler County, Virginia, February 11, 1822. In 1823 his parents came to Ohio and settled on a farm in Belmont County.

Davis attended, in the winter season, the schools of his neighborhood, and at the age of 21 years completed his education at Madison College, Guernsey County. In 1842 and the two following years he was partially engaged in teaching, and in the meantime studied law in the office of Judge Evans of Cambridge. For nearly a year after the fall of 1845 he was editor and part owner of the Guernsey Times.

In 1846 he was admitted to the bar at Mount Vernon and in the fall of the same year located at Marietta and commenced the practice of law. By close application and diligence he soon became prominent in his profession. In 1849 he was elected prosecuting attorney for the county, and for two years ably discharged the duties of that office. In 1854 he was elected Probate judge, and served his three years' term to the entire satisfaction of the public. In 1856 he was chosen one of the electors for Ohio of President and Vice-President of the United States, and voted for Fremont and Dayton.

In 1858 he was elected Senator in the Ohio Legislature from the district composed of Washington and Morgan counties, and was an eloquent, influential and highly esteemed member of that body.

In 1861, at the breaking out of the Rebellion, he took a decided and prominent part in defense of the government, and labored unremittingly to encourage and promote the cause of the Union.

Judge Green was a man of great energy and industry; and his natural abilities were of a high order. Those who knew him best estimated his mental capacity the highest. At the time of his death he ranked as one of the best and most successful lawyers in Washington County. In the prime of his life and the midst of his influence, he died at Marietta, August 22, 1862. He was married in 1851 to Columbia Ferguson, who is now the wife of Dr. D. Walter. Mrs. Dr. Curtis is a daughter.

WILLIAM SPENCER NYE, SON OF ARIUS NYE, was graduated from Marietta College in 1843. He studied law with his father, and was admitted to the bar in 1845. He commenced practice in Marietta, associated with his brother, Dudley Selden Nye, as D. S. & W. S. Nye.

He was elected and served as prosecuting attorney of the county from March, 1848, to March, 1850. About 1854 he was appointed attorney for the Marietta & Cincinnati Railroad Company. In 1861 he was again prosecuting attorney of the county. Shortly thereafter he removed to Chillicothe, Ohio, where he died of typhoid fever in 1862.

Mr. Nye was an accomplished gentleman, and a lawyer of fine abilities and attainments. A rather sensitive and retiring disposition inclined him to shrink somewhat from the more rugged conflict of the court room practice and to thus take a less conspicuous position as a trial lawyer than his legal learning and acumen entitled him to occupy. It was for his breadth, soundness and candor of view, as a counselor, that he was best known in the profession.

His disposition was peculiarly amiable, and in his domestic and social life he was a most genial companion, and warmly attached to himself all who knew him intimately.

DUDLEY SELDEN NYE, son of Arius Nye, was admitted to the bar at the November term, 1843, of the supreme court, sitting in Morgan County. In 1847 he and his brother, William S. Nye, associated themselves in the practice of law at Marietta, succeeding to the business of Arius Nye & Son, as D. S. & W. S. Nye, and continued in practice until the autumn of 1852.

In 1852 he removed to Tennessee, and in the spring of 1855 removed to Council Bluffs, Iowa, and in 1857 was elected county judge of Pottawattamie County, in that State. In November, 1862, he returned to Marietta, where he engaged in the practice of law.

Dudley S. Nye was a good office lawyer, and a safe counsellor. He served four years as postmaster of Marietta under appointment of President Cleveland. He died at his home in Marietta in 1901.

HENRY A. TOWNE was born January 5, 1826, at Litchfield, Herkimer County, State of New York. Upon the death of his father, Rev. Abner Towne, pastor of the Presbyterian Church at Litchfield, his mother returned with her son, then five months old, to her parents at Amherst, Massachusetts, and coming afterward to Gallipolis, Ohio, the residence of her brother, Hon. S. F. Vinton, married May 28, 1831, Dr. Robert Safford, of Putnam, Ohio, now the Ninth Ward of Zanesville, at which time the subject of this sketch became a resident of Ohio. He entered Marietta College when 15 years of age, and graduated in 1845; was admitted to the bar at Cincinnati, Ohio, in 1840, and practiced law at Marietta, Ohio, in partnership with Hon. William A. Whittlesey, from 1840 to 1851, and afterward with Davis Green, Esq., now deceased, until his removal to Portsmouth, Ohio, December 1, 1855, where he entered upon the practice of law. He married, December 18, 1856, Harriet Nye, daughter of Arius Nye, now deceased.

In 1858 he was elected one of the judges of the Court of Common Pleas of the Seventh Judicial District of Ohio, and held that position until July, 1870, when he resigned and resumed the practice of law at Portsmouth.

He has been connected with several of the furnaces of the Hanging Rock iron region, and is now a stockholder and director in the Globe Iron Company, of Jackson, Ohio; and is also a stockholder and director in the Scioto Star Fire-brick Works, at East Portsmouth, Ohio.

In April, 1879, he was elected mayor of the city of Portsmouth. In 1880 he was appointed supervisor of census of the Fourth District of Ohio, and superintended the taking of the census in the eleven counties comprising the district. He died in 1888, in California, where he had gone on account of ill health.

RODNEY M. STIMSON was born in Milford, New Hampshire, October 26, 1824. He attended Phillips Exeter Academy, New Hampshire, during three years preceding 1845, when he entered Marietta College and graduated from that institution in 1847. He studied law, and in 1849 was admitted to the bar at Marietta. Soon thereafter he removed to Ironton, Lawrence County, Ohio, and there established the Register, a newspaper which, as editor and proprietor, he successfully conducted for 12 years. In 1862 he removed to Marietta, and there edited and published the Marietta Register during the 10 years following. In 1869 he was elected Senator in the Ohio Legislature, and was re-elected in 1871, serving four years. In 1877 he was appointed State Librarian, and for two years acceptably discharged the duties of that office. His residence is at Marietta. He is a trustee of Marietta College, to which he gave a very valuable selection of books for its library. He devotes his time to literary pursuits. He has been twice married, first in 1851, and again in 1862.

SAMUEL S. KNOWLES, son of Samuel and Clarissa (Curtis) Knowles, was born in Athens, Ohio, August 25, 1825. In 1846 and the three years following he was a student in the academy and the Ohio University, at Athens. After finishing his course of studies at the University he read law with Lot L. Smith and L. Jewett, at Athens, and was admitted to the bar in 1851. During the same year he was elected prosecuting attorney of Athens County, was re-elected in 1853, and held that office for four years. In 1861 he removed from Athens to Marietta, engaging in the latter place in the practice of his profession. In 1864 he was commissioned captain of a company in the 148th Regiment, Ohio National Guard, and served with his company, stationed at Bermuda Hundred until September of that year, when the regiment was mustered out of service. In 1864 he was elected mayor of the city of Marietta, and re-elected in 1866, serving four years. In 1865 he was elected Senator in the Ohio Legislature from the counties of Washington, Morgan, and Noble, serving two years. In 1875 he was elected judge of the Court of Common Pleas, of the Third Sub-division, of the Seventh Judicial District of Ohio, to fill a vacancy caused by the resignation of Judge Plants, and in 1878 he was re-elected for the full term of five years. He was married January 23, 1852, to Henrietta Devol, youngest daughter of Capt. Charles Devol, of Hockingport, Athens County. He died in Marietta in 1895.

THOMAS W. EWART, LL. D., was born February 27, 1816, at Grandview, Washington County, Ohio. His mother, Mary Cochran, was a native of (West) Virginia, of Scotch descent; and his father, Robert K. Ewart, a Pennsylvanian, of Irish parentage. Thomas received such early education as he could obtain in the common schools of that date, in which he was a diligent and ambitious student.

September 30, 1831, he left school and farm, and became an assistant in the office of clerk of the courts of Washington County, where he improved his time not demanded in the office in studies under private instructors. He was appointed clerk of the court of this county in December, 1836, and continued in office until October, 1851. While still clerk of the court, he was elected to represent Washington County and Morgan County in the Constitutional Convention of 1850, which formed the present constitution of Ohio, and was one of its youngest members. On the expiration of his term as clerk of the court, he was elected Probate judge of Washington County, the first under the new Constitution.

In the meantime, while in the prosecution of official duties as clerk of the court, he had pursued a rigid course of legal study under Judge Nye, and when he attended the Constitutional Convention at Cincinnati, in 1851, was admitted to practice in the courts of Ohio.

He held the office of Probate judge one year, and resigned to practice his profession, in which he had a great degree of success, and attained a prominent position as a lawyer of recognized ability.

Thomas W. Ewart was an active partner in the following law firms, and was the leading member of all except the first,—to-wit—Clarke & Ewart; Ewart & Shaw; Ewart, Shaw & Sibley; Ewart, Gear & Ewart; Ewart, Sibley & Ewart; and Ewart & Ewart. These were the leading law firms of Marietta for about 25 years.

Mr. Ewart was a man of indefatigable industry; and spared no labor to make himself master of his cases. He was not a genius; but he had made hard work do the part of genius.

In politics he was a Whig, serving as chairman of the central committee of the county for many years. At the organization of the Republican party, he identified himself with that party.

As a citizen he was active, enterprising, seeking the welfare of the community; especially so in connection with the temperance and Sunday-school movements.

A member of, and liberal contributor to, the Baptist Church, he was superintendent of the Marietta Baptist Sunday-school 40 years, and deacon of that church 30 years.

In 1838 he married Grace Dana, of Newport, who died in 1854; and in 1855 he married Jerusha Gear, daughter of Rev. H. Gear, late of Marietta, deceased. He moved from Marietta to Granville, Ohio, where he died in 1881.

WILLIAM R. RICHARDSON was born in Washington County, Pennsylvania, May 25, 1824. In 1841 he entered Washington College, and there pursued a three years' course of study. In 1846 he enlisted as a volunteer in the "Steubenville Grays," a company raised for the Mexican War, and assigned to the Third Ohio Regiment. After his return from Mexico, he was engaged for several years teaching in Brooke County, (West) Virginia, and Harrison County, Ohio, and in the meantime studied law with Allen C. Turner, of Cadiz, and was there admitted to the bar in 1852. In 1853 he moved from Harrison County to Woodsfield, in Monroe County, Ohio, and after a year's employment as principal of the Monroe Academy, commenced there the practice of law in partnership with L. C. Wise, and afterward associated himself with Edward Nechold.

In 1855 he was elected prosecuting attorney for Monroe County, and was re-elected in 1857, and again in 1859. In 1861, soon after the attack on Fort Sumter, he raised two companies of volunteers, which were assigned to the Twenty-fifth Ohio Infantry, three years' service, of which regiment he was appointed major, and soon after lieutenant-colonel, and with that rank proceeded to the field. In 1862 he was promoted to the colonelcy of his regiment. In 1863, at the battle of Chancellorsville, he was wounded in the right shoulder, and on account of the severity of the wound was an invalid for eight months. In January, 1864, he was detailed as president of a general court-martial at Camp Chase, near Columbus, Ohio, and in February following was placed in command of that post. In October, 1864, he was elected attorney general of the State of Ohio, and it was his intention to retire from the army, but upon the urgent solicitation of Governor Brough, he resigned the attorney generalship and remained in the service. The same year he was breveted brigadier-general. In 1865 he was ordered to Charleston, from thence to Columbia, and finally to Darlington, in command of the district of East South Carolina. In June, 1866, he resigned his position in the army. In July, 1866, he was appointed collector of internal revenue for the Fifteenth District of Ohio, and in November moved from Woodsfield to Marietta. In May, 1869, he resigned his office of collector, and then engaged at Marietta in the successful practice of his profession as a lawyer. As a commanding officer General Richardson possessed the confidence and esteem of his men. His services in detached positions were frequently commended. He was connected professionally with various enterprises, and was a director of the Cleveland & Marietta Railroad. He was married in 1848 to Sarah E. Smith, of Brooke County, (West) Virginia, who died at Marietta, May 11, 1879. He died at New-castle, Indiana, in 1886.

DAVID ALBAN studied law in the office of Hon. Samuel F. Vinton, of Gallipolis, Ohio. In the spring of 1855 he was admitted to the bar by the District Court sitting in Gallia County. In the summer of 1855 he removed to Marietta and commenced practice in partnership with Hon. Arius Nye.

In 1862 he volunteered as a private soldier in the United States service, and served with his regiment, until he was taken prisoner at Harper's Ferry, September 13, 1862, and paroled.

In 1864 he was elected prosecuting attorney of the county, and was re-elected in 1863, and in 1865, serving for six consecutive years. For several years he was associated with Hon. W. B. Loomis, in the law firm of Loomis & Alban, which was recognized as one of the leading law firms in the city. In 1879 he was again elected prosecuting attorney of the county. He died in Marietta in 1882.

WILLIAM B. LOOMIS was born in New

London, Connecticut, February 1, 1837. In the spring of 1840 he came with the family of his father, Christopher C. Loomis, to Marietta, Ohio, where his father engaged in the mercantile business. He attended the Marietta Academy, and completed his early education at the Marietta High School, having in 1853, graduated with the first class of graduates from that school. After leaving school, he was engaged for a few months as merchant's clerk, after which he was employed as deputy clerk of the Court of Common Pleas and clerk of the Probate Court of Washington County, Ohio. During his clerkship in these courts, he studied law with Messrs. Clarke & Ewart, and in April, 1857, was admitted to the bar by the District Court of Washington County. He then engaged in the practice of his profession at Marietta, in partnership with Thomas W. Ewart, Esq., which relation continued until the fall of 1859. In the spring of 1860 he became the law partner of Melvin Clarke, and so continued until Colonel Clarke was killed in the battle at Antietam, in 1862. He was married October 1, 1860, to Harriet Frances Wheeler, daughter of F. J. Wheeler, Esq., of Marietta. In 1862 he was elected city solicitor of the city of Marietta, which office he held for four years. From the spring of 1863 to May, 1865, he was associated with the late Judge Simeon Nash, of Gallipolis, as partner in the practice of law at Marietta, when he became the law partner of Samuel S. Knowles, and so remained until June, 1868, at which time he was elected judge of the Court of Common Pleas of the Third Subdivision of the Seventh Judicial District of Ohio, and held that position for five years.

In March, 1879, his wife died, and in June, 1880, he was married to Mrs. C. N. Hodkinson, of Marietta.

After his retirement from the bench, Judge Loomis resumed the practice of the law in Marietta, first as the senior member of the firms of Loomis, Alban & Oldham, and Loomis & Alban; and afterward alone. He built up a large business in both the State and Federal courts.

Judge Loomis had what is properly called a fine legal mind—a mind acute, discerning, penetrating, and analytical. He was a wide and intelligent reader, and not only absorbed but assimilated knowledge. He had a wonderful power of clear statement, which left no misty points. Taken all in all, he is believed to have been the most profound lawyer that Washington County has ever produced. He died suddenly, in January, 1898.

HENRY MANASSEH DAWES was born at Malta, Morgan County, Ohio, March 11, 1832. He was the eldest son of the late Henry Dawes, a prominent and active citizen of that county, and a grandson of Rev. Manasseh Cutler. His boyhood was spent at Malta, whence he came to Marietta about the year 1850, and pursued a regular course at Marietta College, graduating in 1855, after which he studied law in the office of the late Hon. Davis Green, and was admitted to the bar at the April term of the District Court of Washington County, 1858. He at once became a partner of Judge Green, and continued in the practice at Marietta until his death, which occurred August 13, 1860.

Mr. Dawes was endowed with a mind of unusual strength, quick perception, and fine reasoning powers, and his talents and acquirements gave promise of great professional success and distinction.

Decended from a line of ancestors who participated in the stormy events of the Revolution, he seemed to have inherited the patriotic spirit of that period, and developed an early fondness for the study of the political history of the county, and for active participation in political discussion. When yet a student, he delivered a course of lectures upon the life and times of Henry Clay, the "Great American Commoner," in which he gave evidence that he comprehended the spirit of our institutions. He was also a frequent contributor to the local press on these subjects.

A man of decision and firmness, unyielding where principle was involved, he was at the same time genial, generous, and courteous to all, and having a face full of tenderness and indicating a frank and kindly nature, he was one whom to know well was both to respect and love. His untimely death was the cause of general sorrow and regret, and deprived the bar of a member who would have honored the calling.

FRANK BUELL was born at Lowell, Washington County, Ohio, April 24, 1837. He studied law with Hon. W. A. Whittlesey, of Marietta, and in January, 1859, was admitted to the bar. In 1859 he was elected prosecuting attorney of the county. In 1861, at the breaking out of the War of the Rebellion, he resigned his office as prosecuting attorney and was commissioned as a captain of Company B, 18th Regiment Ohio Volunteer Infantry, in the three months' service. Afterward, in the fall of the same year, from recruits residing on the borders of Ohio and West Virginia, he raised an artillery company, the "Pierpont Battery," and by the Governor of West Virginia was appointed and commissioned captain of the same. With his command he was in the campaigns in West Virginia, under Generals Fremont, Schenck, and Sigel, was engaged in several severe artillery duels, and in the battles of Cross Keys, Port Republic and Cedar Mountain.

On the 22nd of August, 1862, at Freeman's Ford, in Fauquier County, Virginia, whilst engaged in an artillery skirmish, a shell from the enemy's battery struck the ground beneath his horse, and, bursting, a piece passed through the horse and broke the Captain's thigh. The horse fell dead across the Captain's body, inflicting internal injuries from which he died in a few hours.

Captain Buell, during his short career as a soldier, was the favorite with his command, and his services were highly commended by his superior officers. His speedy promotion to a colonelcy of artillery was contemplated by the government.

WALTER BRAHAM was born in Loudoun County, Virginia, September 29, 1812. He obtained his early education at the common schools of that county, and commenced the study of law with William Benton, Esq.

In 1835 he moved from Virginia to Ohio, and in Morgan County, and afterward in Washington County, was engaged for several years in the business of teaching, merchandising, and farming.

In 1859, having completed a course of law studies, under the preceptorship of Hon. Davis Green, of Marietta, he was admitted to the bar and commenced the practice of law.

In 1867 he was elected prosecuting attorney of Washington County, and was again elected to the same office in 1871, and acceptably discharged the duties thereof until 1873. He continued the practice of law here until his death in 1882.

HERMAN L. GEAR, SON OF REV. H. GEAR, was born at Marietta, Ohio, December 1, 1842, prepared for college in the High School of Marietta, and entered Marietta College in 1858, and graduated therefrom in 1862.

After acting as tutor in Marietta College for one year, he read law with Thomas W. Ewart, and then removed to California, where he was admitted to practice by the Supreme Court of that State. He was an energetic young man, of a logical turn of mind, and entered heartily into the active business life of the community; and, while at Quincy, Plumas County, California, was elected prosecuting attorney. Subsequently he became editor of the Plumas County Herald, at Quincy, California, which position he held until his return to Marietta in the fall of 1870. Here he again engaged in the practice of law, as a partner in the firm of Ewart, Gear & Ewart, and continued in that business until the fall of 1872, when, impelled by the impression that he ought to preach the Gospel, as his father had done, he left the law and became a minister, preaching at Newport, Ohio, Norwalk, Ohio, and finally he was called to the position of superintendent of State missions of the Baptist denomination.

Mr. Gear afterward returned to the practice of law; and is now a successful practitioner and law writer in San Francisco, California.

FRANCIS F. OLDHAM, son of Wylie H. Oldham, was born at Moundsville, (West)

Virginia, March 3, 1849. He attended the Morgantown (West Virginia) Academy during the four years preceding 1865, when he moved with his father to Marietta, Ohio, and in 1866 entered Marietta College, and graduated therefrom in 1870 with the highest honors of the class. He studied law with his father at Marietta, attended law lectures at Cincinnati, and was admitted to the bar in 1872. Immediately after his admission to the bar, he entered at Marietta upon the practice of his profession, the first year in partnership with his father and W. G. Way, as Oldham, Way & Oldham; for the next four years in partnership with W. B. Loomis, as Loomis & Oldham, and since 1876 in partnership with R. L. Nye as Nye & Oldham.

In 1875 he was the nominee of the Democratic party for the office of prosecuting attorney of the county, and was elected, and re-elected in 1877.

In January, 1876, he was married to Betty W. Lovell, granddaughter of A. T. Nye, of Marietta.

Francis F. Oldham removed from Marietta to Cincinnati in 1888; and has since practiced law there with success. For several years past he has given much of his time to legal work for the United States government, as special agent for the Comptroller of the Currency.

ANDREW W. McCORMICK was born in Greene County, Pennsylvania. He came to Marietta and published the Marietta Republican for some years preceding the fall of 1861, when he entered the military service, became captain in the 77th Reg., Ohio Vol. Inf., was wounded and twice taken prisoner during the war.

In 1867 he was admitted to the bar in Washington County. In 1869 he was elected Probate judge of the county, and was re-elected in 1872. He practiced law in Marietta from 1876 until 1878, when he removed to Cincinnati.

JOHN W. McCORMICK was born at Brownsville, Monroe County, Ohio, December 25, 1850. In 1869 he came with his parents to Washington County, and at Marietta pursued a course of preparatory studies. In 1875 he was graduated at Marietta College.

He commenced the study of law with Messrs. Loomis & Alban, and completed the same with M. D. Follett, and in 1878 was admitted to the bar. In the spring of 1879 he commenced the practice of law at Marietta.

He was prosecuting attorney of this county from 1884 to 1892. He died at Marietta, June 18, 1895.

Sketches of other prominent members of the bench and bar may be found in another part of this volume devoted to biographies.

CHAPTER XX.

PHYSICIANS OF WASHINGTON COUNTY.

ATTEMPTS TO CONTROL THE PRACTICE OF MEDICINE—THE TWELFTH MEDICAL SOCIETY— PERSONAL SKETCHES.

ATTEMPTS TO CONTROL THE PRACTICE OF MEDICINE.

For a time the Legislature of Ohio, largely through the influence of Dr. S. P. Hildreth, attempted to control the practice of medicine and to prescribe definite rules which should prevent unqualified persons from professing to be physicians. The following notices of different dates will show the workings of this law. After a time the Legislature found that in the warring schools of medicine it was as difficult to establish a school of one particular kind and exclude all others as it has already been found to establish a church of one particular faith and exclude all other sects, hence the well-meant laws for regulating the practice of medicine were repealed.

MEDICAL NOTICE.

Candidates for the practice of medicine and surgery are to be examined in Marietta, Nov. 5th, by the following Censors: Drs. C. F. Perkins, J. B. Regnier, S. P. Hildreth, J. Safford, J. Cotton, and C. Bierce.

A few weeks later it was announced that licenses had been granted to Giles B. Hempstead, Ebenezer Bowen, Charles Ulmer, and Alexander McMillan.

THE TWELFTH MEDICAL SOCIETY.

1824.—

A law was passed at the last session of the General Assembly (1823-4) to incorpoate medical societies. The members from Washington County to the Twelfth Medical District (Washington, Athens, Gallia, and Meigs counties) were Drs. John Cotton and S. P. Hildreth.

The Twelfth Medical Society of Ohio, which included Washington, Athens, Gallia, and Meigs counties, of which Dr. John Cotton was president, imposed these conditions upon the candidates in medicine, who were to present themselves at Reno's Tavern, November 30, 1824.

1st. The Candidate shall have such an acquaintance with the Latin and Greek languages as is necessary for a Medical or Surgical education.

2d. He shall have studied three full years under the direction, and have attended the practice of some respectable Physician or Physicians, Surgeon or Surgeons, as the case may be, during which time he shall have studied attentively the most approved authors in Anatomy, Chemistry, Materia Medica, Surgery, Obstetrics, and the Theory & Practice of Medicine, provided, however, that if such Candidate shall have received a degree from any regular Collegiate Institution, within the United States, or elsewhere, he shall be required to study only two years.

3d. He shall, previous to his examination, produce to the Censors of the said society a satisfactory certificate of his being duly qualified in the manner before mentioned, as also of his moral character.

After examination, a Dissertation or Thesis on some medical subject will be required of the Candidate to be read before the society.

COLUMBUS BIERCE, Sec'y.

Personal Sketches.

JABEZ TRUE, son of Rev. Henry True, was born in Hampstead, New Hampshire, in 1796. It was the practice of the time for clergymen to instruct the youth and prepare young men for college. Rev. Mr. True had a class of this kind under his instruction. His son, Jabez, acquired sufficient knowledge of the languages to enable him to pursue a course of medicine with advantage. He read medicine in his native town, and completed his course near the close of the Revolution. He volunteered his services as surgeon of a privateer and sailed for Europe. Soon after commencing the cruise, the vessel was wrecked on the coast of Holland, and the marines thrown on the mercy of the Hollanders. Dr. True remained in Europe until the cessation of hostilities, when he returned to America and began to practice his profession in New Hampshire.

Dr. True became a member of the Ohio Company in 1787, and came to Marietta in the spring of 1788. He built a small log office on Muskingum street. The new country did not afford a lucrative practice, but it was a fortunate circumstance that skilled physicians were present. He was employed at the opening of the Indian war as surgeon's mate for the troops and rangers, at a salary of $22 per month. During this time he also taught school a part of the time in one of the block-houses of the garrison at "the Point."

Smallpox and scarlet fever broke out in 1790 and made it necessary for the doctors to visit the settlements, which, during the Indian war, could only be done by water, as none but trained rangers trusted themselves to enter the roadless forest; visits at that time even by water were extremely hazardous, but the sick required attention and Dr. True frequently risked his life to respond to the calls of duty.

Dr. True was celebrated for his kindness and sympathy. So far as it was possible he patronized the prejudices of his patient and never resorted to radical remedies, except in cases of absolute necessity. "The result of his calm, deliberative judgment was generally correct, and his treatment of diseases remarkably successful, which was doubtless owing to its simplicity, for it is a lamentable fact that too many die from too many and improper remedies as well as from disease itself."

After the close of the Indian war, he improved a farm on the Ohio about a mile from Marietta, and took an interest in agricultural pursuits. His practice extended over a large area of territory, sometimes requiring him to ride 20 miles through forests and over bridgeless streams.

The practice of medicine at that time was by no means lucrative. The general poverty of the people necessitated low charges and in many cases no charges at all, neither for medicines nor professional services.

Dr. True's devotion to the church cannot be omitted from any sketch of his life, however brief. He joined the Congregational Church at an early period of its organization and was for many years a deacon. His house was a home for itinerant preachers, and his purse always open to needy charities. Dr. True, for several of the last years of his life, served as county treasurer, a position which afforded him ease and a moderate income.

In 1806 Dr. True married Mrs. Mills, the widow of Capt. Charles Mills, an amiable and excellent woman. He had no children, but the children of his wife were treated with all the love and affection of a real father. He died during the epidemic of 1823.

DR. SOLOMON DROWN is known rather as a scholar and a man of letters than as a physician. He came to Marietta in the summer of 1788, and attended on General Varnum as counsel during his sickness. He was selected to pronounce the eulogy at his funeral, which was published at the time in New England. He also delivered the address at the first "Seventh of April" celebration. About 1791 he was elected professor of botany and natural history in Brown University, of which he was a graduate. He filled the position for many years.

DR. THOMAS FARLEY came to Marietta in the summer of 1788 as the attending physician of General Varnum, who died of consumption in January, 1789. He was a son of General Farley, of Ipswich, Massachusetts, and studied medicine at Salem, under Dr. Holyoke, in 1782. Colonel Barker says of him: "He was a modest, amiable young man, always ready to obey the calls of humanity, and had the good will and confidence of all who knew him." He soon became discouraged with the new country and returned in the fall of 1790 to Massachusetts.

DR. WILLIAM PITT PUTNAM, fourth son of Col. William Pitt Putnam, and grandson of Gen. Israel Putnam, was born in Brooklyn, Connecticut, in 1770. He attended the schools of the neighborhood in the winter and worked on a farm in the summer. He was placed under the tuition of Rev. Dr. Whitney at the age of 16, and pursued a course in Latin and other studies preliminary to reading medicine. At the age of 18 he entered the office of Dr. Waldo, of Pomfret, the distinguished surgeon of the Revolution. He attended a course of lectures at Cambridge in 1791, and in 1792 came to Marietta. He spent a portion of his time at Belpre, where his brother lived, but the Indian war made general practice dangerous and unprofitable. In 1794 Dr. Putnam returned to Connecticut, when he married Berthia G. Glysson, and in company with his father's family, came to Marietta in 1795. In 1797 he purchased the lot on the corner of Fifth and Putnam streets, on which his brother David afterward built the Mansion house, now occupied by W. W. Mills.

Dr. Putnam in 1799, having become discouraged, although he was highly esteemed and had a fair share of patronage, determined to give up practice and turn his attention to farming. He purchased 200 acres on the Ohio River, eight miles above Marietta, and with characteristic energy, plied his hand in the clearing. The fatigue and exposure of forest life brought on bilious fever, of which he died, October 8, 1800, leaving no children to inherit his name or his fortune. His widow subsequently married Gen. Edward Tupper.

DR. JOSIAH HART.—A venerable physician during the early period of Marietta's existence was Josiah Hart, who was born in Berlin, Connecticut, in 1738. He attended Yale College for the purpose of preparing for the ministry, but after graduating in 1762 changed his intention and entered on a course of medicine. His first wife died in 1777, leaving seven children, two of whom settled in Ohio. He married, for his second wife, Mrs. Abigail Harris, a blood relative of the celebrated Miles Standish, whom Longfellow has immortalized.

Dr. Hart came to Marietta in 1796, and was in active practice until 1811, when he removed to his farm, where he died from spotted fever in 1812. His wife died a few hours after and both were buried the same day.

Dr. Hart was one of the first deacons of the Congregational Church and was a consistent, pious Christian. He had a strong love for science and was a regular attendant at the meetings of a chemical society, composed of physicians and others. This society met two or three evenings in a week, where experiments were exhibited and lectures given. The seal of this society has been preserved by Dr. George O. Hildreth.

DR. WILLIAM B. LEONARD was born in England, in 1737, and was bred a surgeon. He was an associate of Apothecaries' Hall, London, and in the prime of life served as a surgeon in the British Army. In 1794 he determined to engage in woolen manufacture in America, and as machinery was at that time prohibited from being transported out of England, Dr. Leonard determined to clandestinely bring it on the vessel on which he had engaged passage, but was detected and imprisoned. Having been discharged, he came to America in 1797, and engaged in medical practice in Massachusetts until 1801, when he came to Marietta. Here he married Lydia Moulton, daughter of William Moulton, a highly respectable pioneer.

DR. JOHN BAPTISTE REGNIER.—All the old citizens of the Duck Creek and Muskingum valleys and of Marietta remember John Baptiste Regnier, and most of them cherish his memory as a personal friend. Medicine exerts a greater personal influence over its patients than any other profession. The patient who recovers from a serious malady is likely to retain feelings of the profoundest gratitude toward the man who has rescued him from pain or death.

Dr. Regnier was born in Paris in 1769. His mother kept a small store for fancy goods and is said to have been a very handsome and stylish woman.

The family was loyal to the government and to the king, and as a consequence were sufferers from the convulsions which revolutionized France. John had acquired a good education and special attainments in architecture and drawing, which he intended to follow as a profession. Like all the better class of French students, he had also attended scientific lectures, and had paid particular attention to the department of medicine. In 1790, when the young men were all called upon to enter the ranks of the revolutionists, the Regnier brothers, who were loyalists, decided upon leaving the county. John B., who was 20 years old, and M<sup>d</sup>este, who was 14, joined the company of emigrants who had purchased land from Joel Barlow, and came to the United States. They reached Marietta October 16, 1790. After a few days they embarked on boats, and proceeded to lands purchased from the Scioto Land Company, and were among the founders of Gallipolis. Having lost their fortune, and dreading the Indians, to whom they were unaccustomed, the two brothers left their forest home and went to New York. On their way up the Ohio their boat was upset and all their effects thrown out. Among them was a curiously wrought octagonal cylinder, which was afterward found in a sand-bar below, and exhibited in an Eastern museum as a legacy of prehistoric art.

For the next eight or ten years Dr. Regnier suffered varying but cruel fortune. But those years of uncertainty and hardship threw him into the profession for which nature had intended him. In the year 1802 he entered the office of Dr. Lemoine, his French medical friend at Washington, Pennsylvania, and in 1803 came to Marietta for the purpose of entering the practice. Monsieur Thiery, a French baker, sold him a lot in Fearing township, onto which he moved and made improvements. It soon became known that he was a "French doctor," and from that time on his practice grew, and his purse was filled. There was an unusual amount of bilious fever, in the treatment of which he was remarkably successful. He also proved himself a skilled surgeon. One case particularly extended his reputation. A man had become caught in the branches of a falling tree and was bruised from head to foot. The pulsations of his heart had ceased and the body was already cold when the doctor arrived. He ordered the attendants to kill a sheep and bring him the warm pelt as quickly as possible. The steaming skin was wrapped around the bruised and naked body, and a cure, which seemed almost miraculous, was accomplished.

In 1808, Dr. Regnier removed to Marietta, where he had frequently been called as counsel, and attending physician. His practice was extended over a wide range of territory, and drew heavily on his physical powers. In Marietta he became a great social as well as professional favorite. He was a cheerful and interesting talker, was full of sympathy and always ready to give assistance.

He purchased a six-acre lot and laid out the finest garden in the city. "It was a model from which divers individuals improved their own and ultimately implanted a permanent taste for this refining art to the citizens of Marietta."

He was one of the original members of the State Medical Society, organized in 1812. In 1818 he was elected County Commissioner. In 1819 he sold his property in Marietta, to Dr. John Cotton, and purchased 320 acres of land on Duck Creek. He built a flouring and saw-mill and a brick dwelling house. Up to that time the country was unimproved, but in a few years a prosperous settlement had grown up. He left Marietta with the intention of freeing himself of his laborious practice, but found it impossible. He was still called upon by his old patrons, in serious cases, and his strong humanity did not permit him to refuse. Broken down by overwork, he died of bilious remittent fever in August, 1821. Dr. Hildreth, his contemporary and friend, has said of him:

"Close discrimination and accurate observation of all phases and shades of disease gave him wonderful tact in prognosis, the base of all successful practice, while his knowledge of the proper remedies rendered him very successful in their application. His colloquial powers were unrivaled, and at the bedside his cheerful conversation, aided by the deep interest he actually felt in the sick, with his kind, delicate manner of imparting his instructions, always left his patients better than he found them, and formed a lasting attachment to his person in all who fell under his care. His death was lamented as a serious calamity, and no physician in this region of the country has since fully filled the place he occupied in the public estimation."

DR. NATHAN MCINTOSH.—The subject of this sketch possessed the characteristic energy of his family. He was the son of Col. William McIntosh, of Needham, Massachusetts, and born in 1762. His father was a man of considerable local note, having commanded a company in the Continental Army, and subsequently served as colonel of militia. He was one of the delegates in the convention in Boston, in 1788, on the adoption of the Constitution of the United States.

Nathan McIntosh, after receiving a suitable education, studied medicine in Boston, and was admitted to practice in 1786. In 1788 he decided on going west, and started for Marietta on horseback. When he reached Meadville, Pennsylvania, he was attacked with smallpox, and suffered severely from that loathsome disease. He practiced for a short time at Hagerstown, Pennsylvania, and Clarksburgh, (West) Virginia, and then came to Marietta in 1790. He received the appointment of surgeon's mate at the Waterford garrison at the salary of $22 a month. He married, in 1792, Rhoda Shepard, daughter of Col. Enoch Shepard, of Marietta, and granddaughter of General Shepard, of Massachusetts.

In 1793 Dr. McIntosh decided to accept an invitation extended by leading citizens of Clarksburgh to locate at that place, and removed his family there in July, under escort of 15 soldiers. He was soon in possession of a large practice, but being full of adventure suffered a serious financial misfortune. He contracted to build a bridge across the Monongahela River at Clarksburgh, and warranted it to stand a certain length of time. But soon after its completion, the whole structure was swept away during a freshet.

Dr. McIntosh returned to Marietta in 1795 and resumed practice. His courteous and obliging manner and skill as a surgeon won him a large practice.

Jacob Young, the great itinerant Methodist, in his autobiography, commends the kindness of Dr. McIntosh in the most feeling terms. In 1805 the pioneer Methodist was stricken down by an attack of fever at a house where the surroundings were by no means pleasant. Dr. McIntosh took him to his house and not only doctored but nursed him during a long term of sickness.

In religion Dr. McIntosh was a Halcyon, a sect embracing nearly the same doctrines propounded by the Second Adventists. He had previously been a Methodist. He wrote and lectured on religious and moral topics, being particularly severe on the secret societies. He published a volume on the subject of "Scripture Correspondences."

Dr. McIntosh, about 1806, turned his attention to the manufacture of bricks and building brick houses, working diligently in the brickyard and on walls. He died of fever September 5, 1823, during the prevailing epidemic. His family consisted of four sons, and two daughters. The children were: Enoch S.; Rhoda, wife of J. M. Chamberlain; William Whiting; Nathan Henry; Samuel Doocy; and Lucy Hulda, wife of Samuel Maxon, of Gallia County.

DR. ROBERT WALLACE came from Pennsylvania to Marietta probably soon after the Indian war. He was here in 1801. Dr. Regnier speaks of him as "a very intelligent druggist." A society of physicians and young men of scientific tastes was formed in the early part of the century. Experiments were performed under Dr. Wallace's direction, and he also occasionally delivered scientific lectures. His oldest son, Matthew Wallace, was a Presbyterian clergyman. His second son, David, was a physician. The family removed to Cincinnati probably about 1809. Dr. David Wallace was one of the parties to the first and perhaps only duel in the history of the county. In the spring of 1801, a difficulty arose which resulted in Dr. Wallace challenging John Woodbridge to a duel. The island opposite Marietta was the place selected, and pistols were the weapons chosen. The parties accordingly met, but Wallace's courage failed and he was willing to ask pardon. Woodbridge was not thus easily satisfied. He cut a stick and gave Wallace a good dressing. They were both present at the "Seventh of April" celebration, which occurred soon after. The song composed for and sung upon that occasion closed with the stanza:

Here population lifts her hand
And scatters round her jewels.
And must honor take its island,
Producing bloodless duels?

DR. SAMUEL P. HILDRETH. No preface is necessary in an outline of the life of Dr. Samuel P. Hildreth. The reader already knows him, but an index to the labors of his busy and youthful life will be of interest and value.

He was born in Methuen, Essex County, Massachusetts, September 30, 1783. He was a son of Dr. Samuel Hildreth, and a descendant of Richard Hildreth, whose name is found amongst a company of 20 from the towns of Woburn and Concord, who, in 1652, petitioned the General Court of Massachusetts Bay for a tract of land on the west side of Concord, or Masketaquid River, where they say "they do find a very comfortable place to accommodate a company of God's people upon." Samuel Prescott Hildreth was of the sixth generation from Richard. Until he was 15 years old he labored upon the farm, there acquiring industrious habits and the power of physical endurance. A social library in the town afforded access to books, and a taste for reading was acquired at an early age, and until his death he was a devourer of books. After finishing the course of the common schools, he spent four seasons in the Phillips Academy in Andover, and at Franklin Academy, which prepared him for entering college. In place, however, of completing a college course, he entered the office of Dr. Kittridge at Andover, and began the study of medicine. He received a diploma in 1805, from the Medical Society of Massachusetts, having attended lectures at Cambridge University.

Dr. Hildreth began practice at Hampstead, New Hampshire, the native home of Dr. Jabez True. He boarded in the family of John True, Esq., through whom he learned of the professional success of Dr. True and the prospects for a young man at Marietta. From his boyhood he had entertained a desire to see the far West, and in September, 1806, left his New England home in the hope of realizing his ambition. The journey to Marietta was performed on horseback and consumed about a month. He says in his autobiography, "It was a land of strangers, but he was young and his heart buoyant with hope and expectation of good fortune. He soon obtained a share of the practice, the only physicians then being Dr. True and Dr. Hart. Dr. Leonard had recently died and Dr. McIntosh had abandoned medicine. His rides sometimes extended over 30 miles through the wilderness, the settlements being few and far between."

Belpre was at that time without a physician, and at the solicitation of leading citizens Dr. Hildreth decided to locate there. He arrived at Belpre on the evening of December 10th, just in time to see the deluded Blennerhassett leave his island paradise to embark in Aaron Burr's perilous expedition.

The summer of 1807 was a busy one for physicians. The epidemic which raged all along the Ohio was particularly severe in the neighborhood of Marietta. Few families at Belpre escaped. Dr. Hildreth was particularly fortunate in his treatment of these cases. Practice at Belpre was excessively laborious on account of the amount of riding necessary. Overexertion during the summer brought on an attack of inflammation of the hip, which continued for several months. In the spring of 1808 he returned to Marietta, where the practice required less riding. The epidemic of 1807 furnished him the subject for a paper in the 10th volume of the New York Medical Repository. From this time he became known as an acute, discerning investigator and faithful writer on scientific and historical subjects. He, however, continued his large and laborious practice until a few months before his death, in 1863. He said his profession, during earlier years, kept him busily engaged and his scientific and historical labor could be pursued only by saving the "odds and ends of time."

Dr. Hildreth was a man of decided political opinions. In 1810 he was elected to represent Washington County in the Legislature, and again re-elected in 1811, when he defeated Judge Cutler, the Federalist candidate, by 20 votes. Hildreth was a supporter of Jefferson and Madison, whose political teachings at this time had displaced the doctrines of Washington and Hamilton. In the same campaign Hon. William Woodbridge defeated Hon. William R. Putnam for the State Senate, Woodbridge being a Democrat and Putnam a Federalist. They were four able men, and after the administration of Monroe had broken party lines, all found a home in the political camp of the Whigs. Dr. Hildreth, however, was never again a candidate for office, but never neglected to vote. While in the Legislature, he drafted and succeeded in having passed the first law regulating the practice of medicine and establishing medical societies, which remained in force until the rivalry of different medical schools caused all laws on the subject to be repealed.

He held the office of collector of non-resident taxes for the Third Ohio District from 1811 until the office was abolished in 1819.

He became clerk of the trustees of the ministerial lands in 1819, and discharged the duties of the office until his death in 1863.

He was a Republican from the formation of the party in 1854.

Dr. Hildreth carried his research into almost every department of science, but natural history was particularly fascinating. In 1812 he published a paper in the Medical Repository on the American Colombo, with a drawing of the plant. It is proper to state in this connection that he had a remarkable genius in drawing. Insects and plants were represented with scrupulous accuracy, and engravings made from them have a permanent value. The illustrations in his geological and botanical reports were prepared by his own hand. They show artistic ability, as well as accurate observation and close discrimination.

In 1822 he published in the New York Medical Repository two articles, one on hydrophobia, and one on a curious case of Siamese twins, found in his obstetric practice. A full history of the epidemic of 1822-23 was published in the Journal of Medical Science, Philadelphia, in 1824. The author was well qualified to write on this subject, as he had visited daily from 60 to 80 patients, and in August, 1823, was himself attacked. He arrested the disease in a few days by taking Jesuit's bark in quarter ounce doses. This was a trial of medicine to which few patients would submit. Sulphate of quinine had not yet come into use in Ohio, or by it many valuable lives might have been saved. An article was published in 1825 on the malarial diseases, or sequela of the great epidemic in the Western Journal of Medicine, Cincinnati. In 1819 he wrote a series of papers on the natural and civil history of Washington County, which appeared in Silliman's Journal in 1826. One of these articles gave a drawing and description of the spoonbill sturgeon found in the waters of the Ohio. In 1827, his articles contained descriptions and drawings of several fresh-water shells found in the Muskingum, of which nothing had been known. His series of meteorological registers, published in that journal from 1828 until March, 1863, are useful for reference to writers on the climate of Ohio.

At the request of Professor Silliman, Dr. Hildreth undertook to explore the coal regions of the Ohio, the result of which was published in the Journal for January, 1836, under the title of "Observations on the bituminous coal deposits in the valley of Ohio, and the accompanying rock strata, with notices of the fossil organic remains, and the relic of vegetable and animal bodies, illustrated with a geological map, by numerous drawings of plants and shells, and by views of interesting scenery." The Journal said editorially that this was one of the most important of Dr. Hildreth's scientific labors, and by far the most valuable contribution which up to that time had appeared on the subject discussed. It filled an entire number (185 pages) of the Journal, and was profusely illustrated by figures of fossils, sections, and original drawings, embraced in 36 plates on wood. Articles on the history of the North American locust, saliferous rock formation, with a history of the manufacture of salt from the first settlement of Ohio. "Ten days in Ohio,"—a geological description of the country from Marietta to Chillicothe by way of Zanesville,—and "the Diary of a Naturalist" appeared in the same journal from 1830 to 1836.

In 1832 he wrote a history of the floods in the Ohio since the first settlement, which was published in the volume of the transactions of the Historical Society of Ohio. In 1837 he was employed, in company with other geologists, to make a geological survey of the State. He delivered an address in 1839 before the Medical Society of Ohio, of which he was president, on the climate and diseases of Southwestern Ohio, which was printed.

In 1830 Dr. Hildreth commenced the collection of a cabinet of natural history. While out on his daily professional rides, he would stop to gather insects, shells, fishes, fossils, and minerals. He often employed boys in the country to do this service for him. When he returned from a drive, he was in the habit of picking out the specimens he desired to keep, labeling them and placing them in cases. Duplicates were sent to Eastern friends in exchange for books or specimens of that section. In the course of eight years his cabinet contained more than 4,000 specimens, and his library, a choice variety of works on natural history. Shortly before his death he donated his cabinet and library to Marietta College, where it is known as the "Hildreth Cabinet." "This donation made Dr. Hildreth one of four or five of the largest benefactors of the College."

In 1840 Dr. Hildreth turned his attention to writing history of the first settlements of Ohio. He collected his material with great care from manuscripts and personal interviews, and wrote a book of 550 pages, which will always be of interest and value. He was the means of preserving a variety of important history and interesting anecdotes, which would otherwise have been lost to posterity. His second volume of "Lives of the Early Settlers of Ohio" was published in 1852. These two books have a permanent place in history. Dr. Hildreth, besides, contributed many interesting historical papers to the Pioneer, and a history of the first settlement of Belleville was published in the Hesperian. A journal of diseases each month, with a bill of mortality, was kept from 1824 till his death. A large amount of manuscript of permanent value, though never published, besides many smaller articles were among the products of his pen.

Rodney M. Stimson in summing up the character of Dr. Hildreth says forcibly:

"He looked on the bright side of things—loved beauty, although of an eminently practical turn of mind—was very fond of flowers, which he cultivated diligently. Industry and system in all that he did may be accounted among his marked points. Besides his laborious medical practice, he accomplished, as he himself expressed it, by 'saving the odds and ends of time.' Without having a brilliant mind he exemplified the fact that 'industry is talent.' He was exact in all his dealings, an honest man, a Christian. His was a complete life—he finished his work.

"His life was gentle, and the elements so mixed that nature might stand up and say 'to all the world: This was a man.'"

Dr. Hildreth's able and productive pen gave him an extended acquaintance among the scientific men of his day. He was one of the first pioneers of science west of the Alleghany Mountains and was regarded as one of the most acute observers of facts of his time. Prof. Benjamin Silliman, his warm friend, has written a feeling tribute to his memory:

"In his private life he illustrated every virtue of a Christian gentleman. Bright and cheerful by nature, he loved nature with the simple enthusiasm of a child. Industrious and systematic in a high degree, no moment of life was wasted. In his family we have seen a beautiful example of domestic happiness and warm-hearted hospitality. He lived with nature and nature's God—and among the patrons and co-workers in this journal, who have left its founder almost alone, no one had shed a purer and more mellow light in the horizon of his setting sun—no one had departed more loved and regretted by the senior editor."

Dr. Hildreth died July 24, 1863, in his 80th year. He had been in his usual good health; a well-preserved and happy old gentleman until a few weeks before his death. He sank away gradually, his mental faculties being preserved to the last. His funeral was on Sunday, July 26, the services being in the Congregational Church, of which he was a member. These last sad rites were conducted by Rev. Mr. Wakefield, of Harmar, and President Andrews of Marietta College.

The following letters came into the hands of the editor in August, 1902, through the kindness of Dr. George O. Hildreth. We append them to the sketch already given of the life of Dr. S. P. Hildreth.

CITY OF WASHINGTON, April 2, 1855

DEAR SIR:

I returned from Europe last September, having been abroad since April 19, 1849. I came to this city a few days ago, and in a bookstore saw for the first time a work by you, entitled Pioneer History of the Ohio Valley and the early settlement of the Northwest Territory," chiefly from original papers, etc. I purchased the book and subsequently ascertained that it was the only copy for sale in this city. The publisher remarked that it formed the first volume of the transactions of the Historical Society of Cincinnati, and that the manuscript of a work containing "ample" biographies of the first settlers of Marietta and its vicinity, would be published as the second volume of the transactions.

I enquired unsuccessfully at every bookstore in Washington but none had the book. I requested Messrs. Taylor & Maury to purchase it for me in Philadelphia or New York and in a few weeks they returned answer that it could not be procured in either place. Happening to think of the "Omnium Gatherum" Collection of Peter Force, the Bibliomaniac of this city, I there found the book and subsequently I saw a copy in the library of the National Institute. Now as I wish to obtain the 2d volume of the Historical transactions containing as it does an imperfect sketch of my venerated ancestor, Geo. Parsons, I will thank you to inform me whether it can be purchased in New York or New England.

I have read curiously the 1st volume of "Pioneer History of the Ohio Valley," and as you are disposed to render unto Caesar the things that are Caesar's, I beg leave to ask your attention to page 109 where you say: "The Board of Directors (of the Ohio Company Associates) employed Dr. Cutler to make a contract with the Continental Congress for a tract of land in the great Northwest Territory of the Union. In July following (1787) the Doctor went to New York, and after tedious and lengthened negotiations succeeded in contracting for a million and a half acres for the Ohio Company at two-thirds of a dollar per acre." Now my dear Sir, if the original documents in the handwriting of Samuel Holden Parsons, signed by him alone with his genuine signature, and preserved in the eighth volume of the Washington manuscripts, Page 226 and 230 numbered 41, can be relied upon, the "Memorial to the Continental Congress for a grant of land" and proposition for the purchasing of land in the Western Country was made by Gen. Sam. H. Parsons and presented by him as Agent of Associates and in behalf of the Ohio Company, May 8, 1787.

The memorial was read May 9 and referred to Messrs. Carrington, King, Dane, Madison and Benson and acted on July 23, 1787—I have a copy of the original documents in the handwriting of Gen. Parsons.—Subsequently, July 21, 1787, "Proposals of Samuel H. Parsons and others for the purchase of a tract of land in the Western Territory" were introduced in which Mr. S. H. Parsons as associated Agents—but Mr. Parsons is first named and the memorial is filed and endorsed, "Proposals by S. H. Parsons, July 21." So much for historical events based upon original vouchers.

Please address me Middletown, Connecticut, where I now reside, and oblige.

Yours truly,

S. H. P.

I hope in a few weeks to see you in Marietta.

MARIETTA. 11th April, 1855.

To S. H. Parsons, Esq.

Dear Sir: Yours of the 2d inst. is at hand. The brief sketch I have given in the Pioneer History, of the purchase of lands by the Ohio Company, is made on the authority of the original journal of their transactions now in the hands of W. R. Putnam, grandson of Gen. Rufus Putnam, one of the original Directors and superintendent of the settlement in Ohio. The journal says that on the 7th of March, 1787, at a meeting of the company in Boston, it was resolved that three directors be appointed for the company and that they make immediate application to the Hon. Congress for a private purchase of land, etc. When Gen. S. H. Parsons, Rufus Putnam and Rev. Manasseh Cutler were named and chosen, this Board of Directors authorized Mr. Cutler to make a contract with Congress for a tract of land, for which purpose he left home the latter part of June, 1787—called on Gen. Parsons at Middletown, Conn., the 2d of July and "settled all matters with reference to my business with Congress."

He arrived in New York on the 5th of July and in the 53 Vol. of the N. American Review, page 335 and onward, you will find the history of the "tedious and lengthened negotiations," contract with the Board of Treasury on which was based the purchase. "At a meeting of the Directors and agents of the Ohio Company held at the Bunch of Grapes Tavern in Boston, Aug. 29, 1787, the report of Mr. Cutler was read—That in consideration of the Res. of Congress of the 27th and 29th July, 1787—he had agreed on the conditions of a contract with the Board of Treasury of the U. S. for a particular tract of land containing in the whole as much as the company's funds will pay for, should the subscriptions amount to one million dollars agreeably to the articles of association, at $1.00 per acre, from which price is to be deducted one-third of a dollar for bad lands and defraying expenses of the surveying," etc. Then follows the boundaries and other matters—"whereupon, Resolved, that the above report be received, the proceedings of Mr. Cutler be fully approved, ratified, and confirmed."

While Mr. Cutler was negotiating for the purchase in New York, he had requested the Directors to associate with him in this transaction—Winthrop Sargent, Secretary of the Board—which was done.

"Boston, Sept. 1, 1786.—At a meeting of the Directors of the Ohio Company at Brackett's Tavern—present—Gen. Putnam, Rev. Cutler and Gen. Varnum—Resolved, that Mr. Cutler and Winthrop Sargent and they each of them be authorized and empowered to complete the contract made by them with the treasury Board of the U. S." And then directs the treasurer of the company to pay the treasury of the U. S. $500,000 on the order of either Cutler or Sargent.

The deed of sale was made and executed the 27th of Oct. 1790, &c., signed by Mr. Lee and Samuel Osgood for the U. States, and by Mr. Cutler and Win-third Sargent for the company and is in an immense old parchment (see Note), now in the possession of W. R. Putnam.

I have thus endeavored to explain to you the grounds and authority I had for saying that the contract with Congress for the Ohio Company lands was made by Messrs. Cutler and Sargent.

There is nothing more recorded in the journal of the doings of your grandfather, Gen. Parsons, in this transaction, that I have seen; had I been in possession of the facts you have stated in your letter, I should certainly have taken pleasure in noting them in my history of the matter.

Should a second edition of the work ever be required, it will be an act of justice to recall more fully the services of Gen. Parsons.

If you can point out any way by which I can send you a volume of "The series of the first settlers of Ohio," I will do so as I have several small ones.

Very truly yours,

S. P. HILDRETH.

DR. JOHN COTTON was a physician well known and highly esteemed in his time, and is still remembered as a successful practitioner of physic and skillful surgeon. He was the son of Rev. Josiah Cotton, and was born in Plymouth, Massachusetts, in 1792. Rev. Josiah Cotton was a descendant of Rev. John Cotton, of Boston, and a graduate of Harvard College. The subject of this sketch entered Cambridge University at the age of 14 and graduated in 1810 with honorable standing in his class. He received his medical degree at Cambridge in 1814, and began practicing in Andover, Massachusetts. In 1815 he married Susan Buckminster and came to Marietta, being attracted by the climate. In the latter part of the year he opened an office on the west side of the Muskingum, and soon acquired a comfortable practice, which grew with age and experience.

Dr. Cotton was an enthusiastic worker in the cause of religion. Immediately upon his arrival, he set to work at organizing Sunday-schools, and in 1816 one had been opened on the west side and two on the east side. He continued an enthusiastic Sunday-school worker and teacher. He accumulated a large collection of theological books, and at the age of 40 studied Hebrew that he might be able to understand more fully and explain more satisfactorily difficult passages in the Old Testament.

Dr. Cotton was ardent in his opinions. He soon became a local political leader, and in 1824 was chosen Representative in the Legislature. In 1825 he was chosen associate judge and filled the position until the time of his death. For a number of years he was chairman of the Whig Central Committee, and proved himself an adroit politician. He took delight in scientific studies, and often lectured in the Marietta Lyceum and the Young Ladies' Seminary. Astronomy was his favorite theme. He delivered an address in Latin on the occasion of the installation of the first president of Marietta College. He was one of the original trustees of the College and for many years president of the Board. He was also trustee of the Medical College of Ohio. He died unexpectedly after a brief illness of three days, April 2, 1847.

DR. JONAS MOORE was a native of New Hampshire, and was in the senior year at Dartmouth when his father died, necessitating his return home. He never went back to graduate. His whole family was soon after carried off by scarlet fever, and he came to Marietta where he taught school and studied medicine with Dr. S. P. Hildreth. He next went to Louisiana where he practiced for a number of years. He afterward became one of the leading physicians of Marietta, where he died in March, 1856. He was a trustee of Marietta College, and took deep interest in educational matters. He was of a scientific turn of mind and invented a number of mechanical devices for use in surgery. He was highly respected as a man.

DR. G. M. P. HEMPSTEAD, who was a native of Connecticut, came to Ohio in 1802, and found good facilities for obtaining an education in Muskingum Academy, where he was prepared for college. He was for a short time under the tutelage of Hon. Gustavus Swan, late of the Supreme Court, and Dr. Jonas Moore, of Marietta. He graduated from Ohio University, in 1813, being the first literary graduate of that institution and consequently the first in Ohio. He received the degree of A. M. in 1822 and LL. D. in 1879. He began the study of medicine in 1813, and in 1816 went to Waterford, where the spotted fever had become epidemic. He was there three or four months, and thence removed to Portsmouth, Ohio, where he was a prominent physician for many years.

DR. MORRIS GERMAN was a native of Chango County, New York. He attended lectures and received a diploma in New York City. He located in Harmar during the epidemic of 1823, and in a short time was in possession of a full practice, which he held until his death in 1835. Dr. German was a contemporary of Hildreth and Cotton, and held an honorable standing in the profession. He died at the age of 39.

DR. FELIX REGNIER, the second son of Dr. J. B. Regnier, was born in Otsego County, New York, in 1801. When he was two years old, his parents moved to Marietta, Ohio, where he received a liberal education and began the study of medicine under Dr. S. P. Hildreth. He received a diploma from the Medical Society of Ohio in 1824, and in that year began the practice of his profession at Gallipolis, Ohio. In 1831 he removed to Jacksonville, Illinois, where he remained two years and then came to Marietta. He had an office in Harmar and was regularly engaged in practice here until April, 1866. During the succeeding 11 years he traveled, in the hope of improving his wife's health. After her death in 1877, he removed to Carthage, Illinois.

DR. HUGH TREVOR, a descendant of Sir Hugh Trevor, was born in County Down, Ireland, in 1806. He graduated at Trinity College, Dublin, and at the College of Surgeons, Dublin. He afterward spent nine years in the hospitals of Paris. He came to Marietta in 1834, and began the practice of medicine. His medical knowledge was of a high order, and he had the confidence of a large class of people. While in Marietta he married Maria Holder, daughter of Joseph Holder. In 1858 he removed to St. Joseph, Missouri, and in 1881 located at Quincy, Illinois, where he died in April of that year.

DR. SHUBEL FULLER was born in Canada in 1806. In 1818 his parents came to Marietta. After passing through the schools of that period, he began the study of medicine in the office of Dr. John Cotton. He attended lectures at the Ohio Medical College, Cincinnati, and opened an office in Marietta in 1835. Dr. Fuller was a successful physician, and conducted a large practice until the sickness which terminated in his death, February 17, 1857. Dr. Fuller was a descendant of the Plymouth Rock family of that name.

DR. G. J. STEVENS, an old practitioner, was located in Harmar for 13 years. He was a native of Berkshire County, Massachusetts, where he was born in 1805. He attended lectures at Fairfield Medical College, and received a diploma in 1827. He practiced in New York, and in Portage and Summit counties, Ohio. He died at his home in Harmar in April, 1881.

DR. WILSON STANLEY was born and spent his early life in North Carolina, and graduated from the Homeopathic Hospital College, of Cleveland, Ohio. He practiced medicine for about 10 years in Marietta, and moved to Memphis, Tennessee, in 1866, where he died within a year.

DR. GEORGE O. HILDRETH, son of Dr. Samuel Prescott Hildreth, graduated at Ohio University in 1829, at the age of 17. He entered upon a course of medical study under the direction of his father, and attended lectures at Transylvania University, Kentucky, where he graduated in 1835. He was regularly associated with his father until the death of the latter in 1863. Since then he has been alone, occupying the same house and office on Putnam street. His practice has continued over a period of a little more than 60 years, with but a single intermission, during a period of four years—1849-53—which were spent in California. For the last five or six years failing health has compelled him to decline to visit patients. Until the summer of 1902 he continued to walk about the streets as actively as a man of 40, but since that time he rarely ventures beyond the door of his home.

DR. JOSIAH DEXTER COTTON, son of Dr. John Cotton, was born in Marietta, Ohio, May 18, 1822. He graduated at Marietta College in 1842, being the youngest of a class of nine students. He began the study of medicine in his father's office, and after attending lectures at the medical college in New Orleans and the Ohio Medical College, received the degree of M. D. from the medical department of the university at Louisville, Kentucky, in 1847. He began practicing at Mount Vernon Furnace, Lawrence County, Ohio, and there married Ann M. Steece, on July 6, 1848.

When his father died, Dr. Cotton returned to Marietta and has been engaged in active practice ever since, except three years during the war, when he was surgeon of the 92nd Reg., Ohio Vol. Inf. He was brigade surgeon of General Turchin's brigade at the battle of Chickamauga and medical director of the Provisional Division of the Army of the Cumberland and Tennessee at the battle of Nashville. He was a member of the Council of the city of Marietta for 10 years, from which he resigned to enter the army.

DR. Z. D. WALTER succeeded to the practice of Dr. W. Stanley in 1866. He was born of Quaker parentage, and spent his early life in Chester County, Pennsylvania. He received his education and afterward taught for two years at Westtown boarding school, a Quaker institution, and attended medical lectures at the Homeopathic Medical College of Pennsylvania, where he received his degree in 1866. From that time he continued to practice in Marietta until 1889, and in that year he removed to Pueblo, where he continues the practice of medicine and takes a deep interest in scientific research. At the present time he is enjoying his experiments in managing a new automobile.

DR. H. N. CURTIS and his wife (the first lady physician in Marietta) occupy the old home and office of Dr. Walter in Marietta.

DR. SETH HART was born in Berlin, Connecticut, November 13, 1814, and came to Washington County in the spring of 1825, and on the 9th of April of that year opened an office in Watertown. He remained in practice until September 27th, when he returned to New York and attended a course of lectures at Fairfield.

Dr. Hart practiced in Watertown from the spring of 1825 until 1836, excepting the time he was absent attending lectures in New York. Since 1836 his office (until his death in 1891) was located in Harmar, with but two breaks. In 1865 he was called to Tennessee to assist his son at the army hospital at Tullahoma. After the close of the war he remained two years. In 1869 he took charge of a mining enterprise in the Rocky Mountains and remained one year.

Dr. Hart, ever after entering the practice in 1825, made a habit of keeping and preparing his own medicines. His first experience in compounding medicines was at a drug store at Palmyra, New York. Since then a long and busy life of practice gave him an intimate acquaintance with drugs and their use.

During the period of his practice in this county—more than 60 years—Dr. Hart always maintained the highest reputation for efficiency as a doctor and integrity as a man. His life was useful not only to himself and family but also to the community which he served for more than half a century. His visits were an inspiration to thousands of families in the hour of pain and distress, and his life was indeed an example of industry and uprightness. He joined the Presbyterian Church at the age of 16. When he came to Harmar, he united with the Congregational Church, where he held his membership until his death.

DR. SAM HART was born in Watertown township in 1830. He completed his studies at Marietta Academy in 1849, and received a degree from the Medical College of Ohio in 1852. He began practice in Marietta in 1853, and has continued till the present time, except during a period of four years of active surgical practice in the army in charge of a hospital, and two years spent in Bellevue Hospital, New York.

Sketches of other prominent physicians and surgeons of Washington County will be found in another part of this volume devoted more extensively to the biographical history of representative citizens.

CHAPTER XXI.

LATER HISTORY OF THE OHIO COMPANY.

We have described in a former chapter the early history of the conditional purchase made by the Ohio Company of Associates and the hard bargain which was extorted from them by the Congress of the Confederation. In that first contract, it was expected that the company would buy 1,500,000 acres of land about the Muskingum, and pay for the same $1,000,000 in cash or in the hard-earned certificates, which they had received in lieu of money, from the government, for their services in the Revolution. The Indian war with its hardships and perils, and the subsequent opening of the large tracts of fertile land to the north and west, rendered it impossible for the company to find a sufficient number of shareholders, at $1,000 each, to buy the full amount. There were but 819 shares subscribed and paid for. Finally Congress in 1792 directed that three deeds be given to the company, amounting in all to 1,064,285 acres, but really only 964,285 acres went to the shareholders, since 100,000 acres, which by the way included nearly all the best land available at that time, west of the present Newport township line, were given in lots of 100 acres each to actual settlers whether they were members of the Ohio Company or not. In no sense could this "donation" tract be considered a part of the land sold to the Ohio Company since it was paid for by the holders in actual military service in the militia in defending the frontier against the Indians, who were incited to make attacks by the British agents.

Each shareholder received one eight-acre lot near Marietta; one three-acre lot in the same vicinity; one city lot of one-third of an acre; one 160-acre lot; one 100-acre lot; one 640-acre lot; one 262-acre lot; making a total of 1,173 acres to each shareholder for the $1,000 he had paid to the government. These larger tracts were rarely occupied by those to whom they were first assigned by lot. In the course of years they were bought up at a low rate by persons who could afford to hold them, in the hope that they would appreciate in value. Besides the money which the shareholders had paid to the government for the land, they had expended large sums in making the settlements, providing for the general defense and the welfare of the pioneers, and in carrying out the surveys and allotments. The total amount of these expenditures was very large and a grievous burden upon men who had spent so long a time in the prime of life in the service of their country.

In 1815 Gen. Rufus Putnam advertised a final dividend of the Ohio Company,—a payment of $3.75 to each one of the shareholders who had contributed so much to the common fund, but it seemed as if the final settlement never would come, as the following extracts from Marietta papers of later date will abundantly show. Among these assets of the company were 43 Loan Office Certificates, for the sum of $400 each, issued by authority of Congress and countersigned "by order of J. A. Treutlen, Governor of Georgia" by E. Davis, Jr.

Nahum Ward, believing that these certificates, whose genuineness was beyond dispute, represented a just claim upon the government, bought up the shares of the Ohio Company and in its name presented a claim against the government. The suit was continued after his death, according to the directions of his will, by his son, William S. Ward. In 1870 it was decided by the Supreme Court that there was no legal claim on the part of the plaintiff against the United States government and thus we may say that at this late date the affairs of the Ohio Company were finally settled.

NOTICE OF A MEETING OF THE PROPRIETORS

Whereas, The Interests of this Company are multifarious, scattered and unsettled.—The Resolutions of January 1796, passed at the last meeting of the Ohio Company, in this place, making a provision for a speedy, final settlement and division of the residuary property, then in the hands of Benjamin Tallmadge, Esq., Treasurer of said Company, not having been complied with—as there are now in said Treasurer's hands, belonging to said Company, Loan Office Certificates, issued by order of Congress, dated 23d Dec. 1777, on interest at 6 per cent. per annum, for the sum of $17,200.—And as there are also large acts of land in the Ohio Company's Purchase, belonging to the shareholders ($17 in number) yet held in escrow.

Therefore—the undersigned—owner and proprietor by Deeds of one hundred and fifty-two shares, and special Attorney for sixty-five other shares—Gives Notice that there will be a meeting of the Proprietors of shares in said Company, by themselves or legal representatives, on the 3d of July next, at 3 o'clock P. M. in the Exchange Coffee House, Boston—for the purpose of adopting such measures in regard to the interests of the Company as may then and there be resolved upon.

NATHUM WARD.

Ohio Company Land Office.

Marietta, O., May 12, 1831.

P. S.—Powers of Attorney to present shares in said meeting, postage paid, directed to me—care of A. H. Ward, Esq. Custom House, Boston—will claim my special attention.

Marietta, Ohio, November 10, 1831.—

"At a meeting of the Shareholders of the 'Ohio Company,' held this day, at the Court House, by adjournment from time to time, of a meeting of the shareholders of said company, at Boston, Mass., July 5, last past, at which Temple Cutler, Esq., of Lynn, was appointed Chairman, and John Skinner, Esq. of Boston, Secretary, and of which notice was given in the newspapers; and the proceeding at Boston published, and forwarded to all the proprietors known to the members at said meeting.—Temple Cutler, Esq. resumed the Chair, and William A. Whitney, Esq. was appointed Secretary.

"Three hundred and twenty shares was represented as follows:

Hon. Levi Barber,	8
Col. Joseph Barker,	9
Nahum Ward,	230
Ephraim Cutler,	18
Temple Cutler,	44
Wm. Skinner,	10
William A. Whittlesey,	1- 320

"There not appearing at this adjourned meeting a majority of shares, as was fully anticipated, and not being disposed without further trial, notwithstanding the apathy of many shareholders, to abandon the interest we have in the undivided property of the company which cannot be obtained without a majority of the whole number of shares: Therefore,

Resolved, That when this meeting is adjourned, it be to the first Wednesday of May next, at this place, at 3 P. M.

"And it was further

Resolved, unanimously, That Temple Cutler, Nahum Ward and Joseph Barker, Esquires, be and are hereby appointed a committee to make a concise statement of the unsettled affairs of the "Ohio Company," and communicate the same to the shareholders, in such manner and form as shall be in their opinion most for the interest of all concerned; that those shareholders, not represented at this meeting, may, if possible, be induced to be represented at the adjourned meeting in May next, that the unsettled affairs of this company may be legally and finally closed.

"This meeting was then adjourned to the first Wednesday of May next, at 3 P. M., in this place.

"TEMPLE CUTLER, Chairman.

"WM. A. WHITTLESEY, Secretary."

Marietta, November 15, 1831.

"To the Shareholders, or Their Legal Representatives, in the Ohio Company.

"The undersigned, proprietors and shareholders in the Ohio Company of Associates, which was first organized at the Bunch of Grapes Tavern, at Boston, in 1786, having been appointed a committee to lay before you a concise statement of facts, relative to the unsettled affairs of this Company, that you may more fully comprehend the objects which we have in view, it will be necessary to a correct understanding of these matters, that we give an historical sketch of the Company from its formation.

"In the organization of the company, the following named gentlemen appeared as agents, and represented the number of shares against their names, viz.:

Joel Barlow, 10 shares.
 William Corlis, 100 shares.
 Arch. Cray, 15 shares.
 M. Cutler, 80 shares.
 Ephraim Cutler, 13 shares.
 E. Downer, 18 shares.
 E. Harris, 31 shares.
 Henry Jackson, 13 shares.
 John May, 35 shares.
 S. H. Parsons, 91 shares.
 Rufus Putnam, 59 shares.
 Winthrop Sargent, 148 shares.
 E. Sproat, 43 shares.
 N. Freeman, 9 shares.
 Benj. Tupper, 30 shares.

"The proprietors by these Agents appointed the Rev. Mr. Cutler and Winthrop Sargent, Esq., to contract with the Government for 1,500,000 acres of Land, and appointed Richard Platt, Esq., of New York, their Treasurer.

"A contract was entered into by the parties on the 27th of October, 1787, for 1,500,000 acres. Subsequently a patent was then taken out by the Directors of the Company for 750,000 acres only, in the present district of Marietta, Ohio. In 1793, Mr. Platt failed, and sunk a large sum for the Company. In the same year, Benj. Tallmadge, Esq., of Litchfield, Conn., was chosen as Treasurer, and all the stocks, notes, and effects, in the hands of Mr. Platt belonging to the Company, together with 43 Loan Office Certificates, the private property of Mr. Platt, paid to the Company to make good, in some measure, the loss they had sustained by him, were placed in the hands of Col. Tallmadge.

"About this period, Col. Hamilton, having established the Funding System, the Directors of the Company advised the turning of the stocks and effects of the Company in the hands of the Treasurer into cash, and to make arrangements with the Government, whereby no more land should be patented to the Directors in trust for the Company, than could be covered with the army warrants, then on hand. This arrangement was effected, and two dividends were made of the funds prior to 1796. The army warrants covered a tract of 214,205 acres, which was located on the west and north side of the first purchase, in ten townships.

"By the ordinance of Congress of May, 1785, it is therein enacted, there shall be reserved, Sections No. 8, 11, 26 and 29, for future disposition of Congress, and Section 16, for the maintenance of public schools. In the Contract with the Agents of the Ohio Company, Oct. 1787, by the Board of the Treasury of the U. S., it was expressly stipulated that in each township, or fractional township, Sec. 16 should be reserved for schools, and Sec. 29, for the purposes of religion. The Patent for 750,000 acres contains those reservations; but in the second Patent there are no reservations whatever. At the last meeting of the Company, January, 1796, the Agents made a donation of Sec. 16 for the use of schools, and 29 for the purposes of religion in the ten townships last patented, before a division was made of the land among the Shareholders, that these townships should not be disfranchised of their rights; and then they petitioned Congress for twenty Sections in lieu thereof, which, if granted, were to be sold for the benefit of the shareholders. What became of the petition to Congress, which is mentioned on the books of the Company, we have no knowledge.

"In April, 1802, Congress ordered other lands equivalent to Sec. 16, out of the reserve lands, to be given. And by Act of Congress, March, 1803, it was enacted, that the Sections of land heretofore promised for the use of Schools, in lieu of such of Section 16 as have been otherwise disposed of, shall be selected by the Secretary of the Treasury out of the unappropriated land, most contiguous to said Townships, which was done accordingly and is recorded on the books of the Treasury. The several townships accepted of lands given by Congress in lieu of Sec. 16, is the undivided property of the Company. The Company have a fair and just claim on Congress for ten Sections of land, in lieu of the ten sections, 29, disposed of by Congress.

"There are also several tracts of undivided common land, at the mouth of the Big Hocking River, and in the vicinity of Gallipolis;—in all there is a fair and undivided claim of about 13,000 acres of land, which is a claim too large to be lost sight of.

"We will now remark upon the Treasury affairs of this Company. By referring to the resolutions of the Company, January, 1796, we find Col. Tallmadge was authorized to sell and dispose of all the funded or unfunded stock belonging to the Company, on the best terms he could, without limitation of price, and petition Congress or otherwise to obtain the payment of the Loan Office Certificates, which were received of Col. Platt, and when the Treasurer had turned all the stock, notes, and accounts, and other funds of the Company into cash, he be directed to make a final dividend of the same. Auditors were appointed to examine and report to the Superintendent, Gen. R. Putnam, a final settlement of the Treasurer's accounts, when requested so to do by the Treasurer, agreeable to the resolutions of 1796; and, by the same resolutions, the Superintendent was requested to deliver up the Treasurer's bond, and all receipts by him given for any effects belonging to the Company, when a final settlement was ready to be made, and dividend declared to the shareholders. The Treasurer's final account, as presented to Gen. Putnam Oct. 1804, is a very ambiguous document, which, by its own showing, was not final, as the Auditors say, 'We find a balance of $818.12 due said Treasurer, which balance together with the interest arising on the same from the date hereof, he is at liberty to take and apply, from the avails of the first property he may receive in behalf of, and on account of the Ohio Company.'

"On the presentation of this final account to Gen. Putnam, the Treasurer demanded his bond and receipts. Gen. Putnam informed two of this Committee, that he peremptorily refused to deliver up the bond and receipts of the Treasurer, but would hold them, as a sacred deposit for the shareholders to rest upon, until a fair and full development was made of the whole property in Col. Tallmadge's hands, and a final account of it rendered, agreeable to the resolution of 1796.

"It is well, however, that the frequent correspondence was carried on between the Superintendent and the Treasurer from 1804 to about 1814—upon the subject of funds in the Treasurer's hands subsequent to the 3d dividend being declared, and the rendition of his final account; when Col. Tallmadge proposed that he would divide among the shareholders the further sum of $3,073—to this Gen. Putnam would not accede, but demanded, from his knowledge of the funds, a dividend upon the capital of $6,241—and to Gen. Putnam's agency Col. Tallmadge paid a dividend on this sum being $7.76 per share, ten years after his final settlement, and the demand of his bond and receipts, as some of the committee have heard him say, and have received dividends of him accordingly.

"What sum formed the capital, when the 3d dividend was declared, has never been made known to the Agents, nor is it known what property or effects were remaining in his hands on presenting his final account, out of which, some ten years afterwards, he acknowledged the sum of $6,341 to be in his hands—no account has been stated or rendered since 1804, to our knowledge, yet immediately upon the death of Gen. Putnam, in 1824, Col. Tallmadge again demanded his bond and receipts and Gen. Putnam's Executor gave them up.

"The Loan Office Certificates, 43 in number for $405 each, dated 23d Dec. 1777, made payable to Thomas Stone or bearer, on the first of Dec. 1781, with interest annually, at the rate of 6 per cent, signed, Samuel Hillegas, and countersigned E. Davis, were presented at the Treasury of U. S. Dec. 22d, 1781, and the interest paid on 31 of the 43 as certified by Samuel Illllegas, Treasurer. Those certificates now in the hands of Col. Tallmadge, Treasurer of the Company, and which he acknowledges belong to the Company, were presented at the Treasury in 1792 to be funded, but refused for some informality. Col. Hamilton, in his report to Congress '92, said 'It would be a hardship to individuals; who, upon the payment of the interest have been induced to become the purchasers of those certificates for a valuable consideration.' 'It remains for the Legislature to decide how far there are considerations strong enough to induce a special interposition in their behalf.' He says further—'There is no evidence that the Certificates were issued for any purpose of the United States.' Since that period, evidence has been obtained from Gentlemen of the highest standing, and familiar with the transactions of the Revolution, that they were legally signed and countersigned—and paid out in Georgia for the subsistence of the Continental Army. Setting aside whatever claims there may be upon the Treasury for funds many years on hand, and not distributed, the Loan Office Certificates, and the undivided lands together with the claims on the Government for the ten Sections will, when turned into money, make a sum worthy the attention of every shareholder.

'From the foregoing considerations we cannot but urge the shareholders by themselves or proxy to be represented at the adjourned meeting on the first Wednesday in May next. Without a majority local proceedings cannot be had.

"We are respectfully, your ob't serv'ts,

"TEMPLE CUTLER,

"L. BARBER,

"EPHRAIM CUTLER,

"NAHUM WARD,

"JOSEPH BARKER.

"P. S. We are in justice bound to say that Nahum Ward, Esq., has been assiduously striving for many years, at a heavy expense, to bring this concern to a close—and had it not been for his indefatigable exertions and unwearied attention the claims of the Company, set forth in this report, would have been forever lost.

"The undersigned have placed unlimited confidence in Mr. Ward in the management of this concern, having, each of us, given him power to act for us when we are not present.

"TEMPLE CUTLER,

"E. CUTLER."

"ATTENTION, LATE OHIO COMPANY.

"Among the articles received by the Directors of the late Ohio Company from Colonel Platt, the first Treasurer of said company, towards the payment of the balance of his debt, were a number of Loan Office Certificates. These were duly deposited in the Treasury Department, to be funded; but on examination they were rejected, from some supposed informality in their issue. Application was then made to Congress to have them assumed and paid by the Government; and although repeated applications have been made to Congress, nothing favorable has yet resulted.

"Being very desirous to close this business, I deem it proper to make the following proposal. Each Loan Office Certificate for division, being for $400 principal, it has been found utterly impracticable to divide them among more than 800 proprietary shares. If then the proprietors, or legal representatives of twenty-one proprietary shares, will unite and authorize some person to present their claims, the same being substantiated and allowed, said Agent or Attorney shall receive one of these Loan Office Certificates of $400 principal, for every twenty-one proprietary shares. The original agents are already authorized to draw for their whole agencies; but no evidence of title to draw dividend, already paid, will be sufficient to substantiate a claim for the Loan Office Certificate, as those vouchers are filed away among papers and accounts closed.

"To save much trouble and expense from a personal application, and to obviate the inconvenience arising from my occasional absence, I would recommend George C. Woodruff, Esq., Attorney at Law, and Post Master at this place, as a suitable person for the complainants to appoint to transact their business with me.

"Holding a few small unclaimed dividends, of long standing, belonging to said proprietors, this may notify all original proprietors aforesaid, or their legal representatives, whose dividends remain unpaid, that I wish them to apply for the same, through the said George C. Woodruff, or in any other way that shall be agreeable to themselves. No application to me, through the mail, will be noticed, unless the postage on the same is paid; and in every application the original proprietary share and agency must be particularly noticed.

"BENJAMIN TALLMADGE,

Treasurer late Ohio Company.

"State of Connecticut,

"Litchfield, April 22, 1834."

REMINISCENCES BY COL. JOSEPH BARKER.

SKETCH OF COL. BARKER'S LIFE—THE EARLY COURTS—STORE SUPPLIES—SHIP-BUILDING—THE FRENCH EMIGRANTS—INDIANS DISSATISFIED—SCARCITY OF FOOD—WHY THE INDIANS DID NOT KEEP THE TREATY OF HARMAR—BUILDING OF THE BLOCK-HOUSES—BIG BOTTOM MASSACRE—WOLF CREEK MILLS—PROVISIONS FOR DEFENSE—INDIAN ALARM—THE GARRISON AT "THE POINT"—INDIAN TROUBLES—FIRST ENLISTMENT OF MEN FOR THE INDIAN WAR—CULTIVATION OF LAND ENCOURAGED—BELPRE—UPPER AND LOWER SETTLEMENTS—REMINISCENCES OF PROMINENT PERSONS OF THE EARLY SETTLEMENTS.

COLONEL JOSEPH BARKER was born in New Market, New Hampshire, September 9, 1765. He was educated at Exeter Academy and afterward learned the trade of a carpenter.

In 1789 he married Elizabeth Dana, daughter of Capt. William Dana, of Amherst, New Hampshire, and with his father-in-law came to the new settlement on the Muskingum. Their mode of conveyance as far as Simrell's Ferry was an ox team; at the ferry they were joined by Isaac Barker from Rhode Island and Thomas Stanley of Connecticut. The three friends built a boat and in it floated down to Marietta. Throughout the time of the Indian war, Colonel Barker remained at Marietta serving in the militia and working at his trade.

In 1795 he moved up the Muskingum, about seven miles from Marietta. The next winter his cabin, work-shop, store house and tools were destroyed by fire, also nearly all the provisions laid up for the year. In that day the loss represented the destruction of many thousand dollars in capital if we measure it by its importance to the owner. Mr. Barker returned to Marietta and resumed work at his trade; building a house for Paul Fearing, for William Skinner, for Rev. Daniel Story and the Blennerhassett mansion. He returned to his farm on the Muskingum and began to build vessels. In 1806 he built 15 boats for the famous Burr expedition.

He was commissioned by Governor St. Clair as justice of the peace in 1799. He also passed through the different grades, by promotion, in the militia until he became colonel of a regiment. In 1830 he was elected associate judge of the Court of Common Pleas, an office which he continued to hold until declining health forced him to resign in 1842. He died in September, 1843, aged 78 years.

Colonel Barker left a son, Joseph, who was for many years an enterprising citizen of Newport township.

Before his death Colonel Barker left in the care of Dr. S. P. Hildreth a volume of manuscripts describing men and scenes of the early day in and around Marietta. From these manuscripts we have made selections which make up the remainder of this chapter:—

THE EARLY COURTS.

I do not remember any court being held in Marietta during the Indian war, nor do I recollect any circumstance which would induce me to believe there was at Cincinnati; subsequent to the war, they traveled by water up and down; it was easier, cheaper, and more expeditious traveling by water than land; there were no bridges—no roads—no taverns and but few cabins; aside from the danger from the Indians, when in a canoe or pirogue one could carry his kitchen, his dormitory, and his magazine, and could shift sides of the river to avoid danger.

In 1792 a mail route was established from Pittsburgh to Cincinnati. Charles Mills—brother to Col. John Mills—who now resides in Gallia County, was employed to carry the mail from Marietta to Gallipolis once a week in a skiff or canoe for $20 per month, and $8 apiece for two hands; how long the mail was carried in this way, I do not remember.

In June, 1788, the Governor and judges commenced the duties of their office and the county of Washington was laid off, including the Ohio Company's Purchase, as far north as the Indian boundary. Joseph Gilman, Esq., and Gen. Benjamin Tupper were appointed magistrates for Marietta; Griffin Greene, Esq., for Belpre; Col. Robert Oliver, for Waterford; Col. Ebenezer Sproat, high sheriff; Benjamin Ives Gilman, clerk of the Court of Quarter Sessions, and Court of Common Pleas, and Return Jonathan Meigs, Jr., prosecuting attorney.

The first Court of Quarter Sessions and Common Pleas was held in September, 1788; the next court was held in March, 1790, at which a grand jury was empaneled and found a bill against Ezra Lunt for stealing a hog, who was later acquitted on his trial before a petit jury.

Return J. Meigs, Sr., and Paul Fearing were the only professional lawyers then, and until after the war the court was held in the Northeast Block-house chamber, in the Campus Martius, where religious and other meetings were held; similar meetings were held at "The Point," in Buell's & Munsell's Old Red House Hall—where William Holden's store now stands.

To collect a sufficient number to form a grand jury or petit jury, Colonel Sproat had summoned most of the Revolutioners from Belpre, so that by what were legally required to attend, and those who attended through curiosity or the novelty of the case, a larger number of Revolutionary officers met together than had assembled on any former occasion or did afterwards; as there was no public occasion to call the settlers together during the war. After the war, the influx of settlers made it unnecessary to call many to any one point. They seemed to be perfectly aware of the circumstance, and it was the topic of general conversation that it was probable that no future occasion would require the assembling of so large a proportion of those who had been associated in securing American independence, and the fee of the land they had purchased for a home. There was a kindness of feeling and friendship which had been created by association in peril, and toils, and dangers, and which were renewed and strengthened by a re-union; in the toils and watchfulness in subduing and cultivating a wilderness and repelling the dangers which threatened their peace and security from a crafty and vindictive enemy, while securing a second independence,—a permanent competency for themselves and families.

Colonel Battelle lived adjoining the Court House and had brewed a keg of spruce beer for the occasion, and as they were all from the "Land of Flip," and it being no sin to drink flip in those days, and as their hours of convivial enjoyment were few and far between, each one who had not attended court in Ohio before was mulcted a pitcher of flip, and while the chord of friendship was still brightening, they gave the parting hand with a warm inquiry "When shall we all meet again?"

After the war, the Court of Quarter Sessions was held quarterly, composed of the justices of the county—Joseph Gilman and Benjamin Tupper of Marietta—Griffin Greene and Daniel Loring from Belpre—Robert Oliver from Watertown—Alvin Bingham from Middletown (Athens)—Philip Whitten from the Long Reach (then in Marietta)—and your humble servant from Adams (now Union and Adams); subsequently others were appointed as the population increased.

Colonel Sproat, as sheriff, and Benjamin Ives Gilman, as clerk, held their offices until the reformation from Federalism to Democracy took place.

Adam Smith says that "laws were made to protect the property of the rich, against the poor." It would seem to follow, where there is very little property, little law is required. I do not recollect of any civil suit being commenced during the war, nor but one criminal action; an officer from General Harmar's garrison struck a citizen with his cane, who complained; the officer was fined a dollar and costs. Although we had sufficient law, we had not sufficient means to carry it into effect. We had no place of confinement, and if your debtor had no property, taking his body would only be increasing the debt, unless he would consent to work, and then you must be your own bondsman. Much like the present time—if your debtor can secrete his property, you cannot take his body.

STORE SUPPLIES.

There were but a few merchants, and those with limited capital; no one came here with property who could do better with it somewhere else; the price of calico was from $1 to $1.75; coffee 50 cents; tea—young Hyson—$2; salt, from $4 to $5 a bushel; nails, 25 cents; sugar, we made ourselves—sugar trees were plenty, but metal to boil in was scarce and dear, so that many settlers labored under the want of kettles who otherwise might have gone far toward supporting their families. When General Putnam was in New York, and obtained the grant for the "donation" lands, Lady Washington sent out a keg of loaf made from maple sugar to be distributed among the ladies of the officers of the Revolutionary Army residing in the Ohio Company's Purchase; the demand for kettles for making sugar induced traders to fetch them on, and although very dear, 10 and 12 cents per lb., still it was an advantage to procure them at that rate.

SHIP-BUILDING.

Ship-building commenced at Marietta at the beginning of this century; the brig "St. Clair" was built in 1800 by Charles Greene & Company. Her burthen was about 100 tons; she was constructed by Stephen Devol from Rhode Island. The company loaded her with flour and pork principally; this was the first square-rigged vessel built upon the waters of the Ohio, and navigated to the ocean. She was commanded by Abraham Whipple from Rhode Island, who was a commodore in the Navy of the United States during the Revolution. In 1802 the ship "Muskingum," of 20 tons, was built by Captain Devol, and owned by Benjamin Ives Gilman; and the brigantine "Eliza Greene," owned by Charles Greene—both of Marietta. Several were built in Marietta, and ship-building was carried on largely at Marietta and above and below, and was a popular business for several years; these vessels were built principally by English goods; the workmen were paid by orders on the store, and these orders passed from hand to hand as currently as the present bank bills, and much of the same character. They would bring dry goods only. Groceries, such as tea, coffee, salt, and iron were cash articles, and were an exception as these dry goods banks did not pay specie for their notes. Prices of goods were very high, and vessel building with goods seemed to promise a profitable investment of capital, but on trial it proved disadvantageous to the owners, the workmen, and the country; the owners all became losers from numerous causes; the difficulty and expense of employing unexperienced workmen, although they were paid cheap, their labor came dear, because it required from 50 to 100 competent men to perform the work; they frequently had to take the vessel to New Orleans or an Eastern port to be rigged, which was more than half of the expense, and thus from having to entrust the business to the care of an agent, was likely to be ordinarily and dearly executed; but, above all, the difficulty of selling to advantage; shippers say that a second-hand vessel is like a second-hand coat; if a man wants a coat, he chooses to make it himself, and will not buy a second-hand one, even if new; so, if a shipper wants a vessel, he chooses to build one to suit the trade he is in, and the arrangement of his voyages; it is a maxim of shippers that a second-hand vessel is always unsalable; with the skipper, much depends on the character of the vessel; the workman, to be sure, got his goods, but like a track in the water, they soon disappeared, and he was none the richer from year to year, while the country suffered for improvement and cultivation, which is a prominent addition to the capital of himself and society.

THE FRENCH EMIGRANTS.

In September, 1790, what have been called the French emigrants arrived, and were permitted by Colonel Sproat (who then had charge of the garrison) to take possession of all the vacant rooms at Fort Harmar; they arrived in the night, in six Kentucky boats, and said to be 450 men, women and children; this company came from Paris to settle on lands which were purchased from Colonel Barlow, and which they expected to find immediately below the Ohio Company's Purchase. General Putnam was one of the company who sent Barlow to France to sell land; finding the company would fail in giving a title from the United States, they made General Putnam agent, who brought out Major Burnham with a company of laborers who erected some houses for the reception of the emigrants, a part of whom went down the next spring and took possession; the greater part of these emigrants were engaged in France in employment of companies and individuals who came out with them, paid their passage, and subsistence, and some wages, on to the Muskingum; they were to be employed—some as house servants, others in clearing and cultivating the land, others in building houses, others as carpenters, tailors, blacksmiths, &c.—all kinds of trades. There were others—private adventurers and gentlemen—some single, some with families. Beaucaire was said to be designed for a priest, and others for subordinates in the ecclesiastical line; in fact, some of every trade from the marquis down to the porter. The Marquis Manassa and his son, the Viscount, seemed to be the ostensible leaders; a large number came out in his employ; M. Debutts—a German-Frenchman—had a number under him; there were companies of two or more who brought out parties, but for what particular purpose, it was difficult to ascertain. The Marquis got a house in the Campus Martius and had a number of domestics. M. Debutts resided at "the Point;" others at Fort Harmar.

Toward spring, they began to scatter; the Marquis, Debutts and some other gentlemen went over the mountains and back to France; quite a number went to Gallipolis; some to Canada; some staid about Marietta, and got "donation" lands. I suppose they had been defrauded in their purchase of land; they were disappointed—put out—and ill-natured; they grumbled; they Sacre Fouted the Yankees; they jabbered; there might have been more tongues in Babel, but they never went faster; take them all together, they were a trifling acquisition to our settlement.

THE INDIANS DISSATISFIED.

I was not in when the Indians were in for a treaty in 1788, and where they remained till the treaty was signed, the 9th of January, 1789. I arrived in Marietta, November 1, 1789; I was informed (by the concurrent testimony of all the inhabitants) that the Indians came in dissatisfied and uncheerful to the treaty; they complained of being duped and deceived by the removal of the place of holding the treaty. They expected the treaty to have been holden at Fort Lawrence, on the Tuscarawas; it was Lawrence township; the north side of the Tuscarawas was a county, where a fort had been built and armed and garrisoned with a lieutenant's command; but circumstances convinced the Governor that it was unsafe to hold a treaty in the center of the enemy's country, as the Indians were strongly suspected of a design of cutting off all the whites with the garrison that were assembled for a treaty. General Harmar sent a party of soldiers in the Ohio Company's boat—"Mayflower"—who propelled her up the Muskingum, and brought off the garrison, arms, provisions, for the treaty down to Fort Harmar. As the Indians came in to the treaty, they employed themselves in hunting and disturbing the game for which they had no use (they drew rations from the public) except for the skins of the deer; so great was their industry and perseverance that in the fall and winter they brought in deer and turkeys and piled them up on the banks of the Muskingum, west of Doctor Cotton's, like a rack of hay, until the inhabitants were obliged to assemble and throw them into the river to abate the nuisance. The carcasses left about the woods brought in the wolves and panthers, and destroyed all deer. (A man by the name of Bagly coming from Wolf Creek, toward spring, one cold, snowy, frozen afternoon, was attacked by a large gang of wolves who drove him up a tree, where he had to sit and play the fiddle for them until they saw fit to leave him next day). When interrogated why they destroyed and wasted the game, the Indians answered they meant to "destroy and starve out every white-face north of the Ohio." They frequently alluded to the prospect of repossessing their lands, and recovering their hunting-ground. One old Indian, when he drew his blanket, threw it over his shoulders, saying he had got his corn-field on his back, but he would have it to walk on next year.

SCARCITY OF FOOD.

It was said there were better than 400 Indians—men, women, and children—and so thoroughly did they destroy the game, within 10 miles of Marietta, that barely a deer could be seen where before a good hunter could kill from 10 to 15 of a day; I have heard Hamilton Kerr (who hunted for General Harmar and supplied his garrison with wild meat the year previous) say that the hills between the Muskingum and Duck Creek were the best hunting-ground he had ever seen, and he could leisurely kill 15 deer of a day, and frequently of a morning. The Indians were burning the woods every year to keep down the undergrowth and made good pasture for the deer, and good hunting for themselves. To the circumstances of the Indians destroying nearly all the game in the neighborhood, combined with that of a severe frost in the early part of September, 1789, may be attributed the very great scarcity of bread and meat in the spring and summer of 1790. Many families were destitute of cows; there were a few yoke of oxen, which could not be spared from clearing and the plow; and no young stock except a few breeding sows. A large majority of the emigrants had literally strewn all their money on the mountains, and in the enjoyment that they had got to the "Land of Promise" they forgot to provide for the future; in fact there was very little to be bought, for those who had money. Where wild meat had formerly been very plenty, there was very little brought in; some few from over the Ohio; but those who had not means could not buy, and by the middle of May the majority of people were out of bread, meat, or milk, and especially those families—the largest and most necessitous—where poverty, improvidence and scarcity meet; charity and benevolence only could give relief. It was no time for catch-penny and chuck-farthings. Genuine hospitality prevailed; those who had, dealt out freely but sparingly, without money or price, to those who had not, which soon brought on a general scarcity; then the most free-handed adopted the strictest economy, and management that they might assist the needy; nettles were the first herbs up in the spring, and were freely used; next, pig-weed and poke sprouts.

The latter part of May, General Putnam wrote on to Col. R. J. Meigs to "open a hole of potatoes" he had at the Campus Martius and "distribute them among the people for planting at 50 cents." They were all taken in a few hours (although very much grown, they answered well for planting). When the potatoes were up, the tops were used for greens; coffee, tea, and sugar were out of the question; spice-bush and sassafras were the common drinks; some maple sugar was made, but most people were not prepared for want of metal to boil in—in this way, the people got along until the season brought relief in squashes, beans, then potatoes, then green corn, which was considered a complete relief, and then wheat harvest, and the hand mill was considered a luxury.

It was the fore part of June, 1789, before the great cornfields on the plains extending from near the Wilcox house up to Washington street, containing 70 acres, were fenced, grubbed, and girdled and fit for planting; all hands had been employed during the summer of 1788, and most part of the winter, in the employ of the United States surveyors in building log cabins, sawing planks, and putting up the block-house, and other buildings in the Campus Martius, for the Ohio Company—in building a large, heavy bridge across Tiber Creek, where the stone bridge now stands (from which a man by the name of Lot Cheevers, goldsmith from Boston, fell and lost his life)—until it was too late to think of clearing and fencing; there were small patches of bottom land which were too much shaded for cultivation. A large number associated together to go to work and inclose a large field on "the Plain" and each one occupy in proportion to labor he put in, to prepare the field for planting; the field was planted with a great variety of vegetables and would have yielded a fair return, had the frost held off as in ordinary seasons. But the crop being planted late, and the frost coming early, the whole was injured; the appearance of some of the corn induced a belief that after being dried through the winter it would do to eat; but, on making bread of it in the spring, it produced an effect similar to "sick wheat." Charles Greene had a crib at Belpre of 30 bushels which had the appearance of being good, but on trial none could eat it; it even made the hogs sick. Corn soon rose, in Marietta, from 50 cents to $1.50 and $2 a bushel. Here Mr. Williams' benevolence stepped, in of which you are sufficiently acquainted. Capt. Jonathan Devol and Isaac Barker got into a canoe and came up to Mr. Williams'; they had half a guinea in gold; they told him their families had no bread and they came to get the worth of their money in corn. "How many is there of you?" said Mr. Williams. "Rising of 20," was the reply. "Dang it"—says the old man—"there's a heap of you; but you must have half a bushel apiece;" and they had.

At a meeting of a small circle of elderly ladies, the most reputable and independent the country afforded, while discussing over the collapsing times—over a cup of spice-bush tea, and a piece of dry johnny-cake, without meat or butter—mutually agreed that should they live to see the return of a bare comfortable plenty, they would never again find fault or even complain of their living.

WHY THE INDIANS DID NOT KEEP THE TREATY OF HARMAR.

I am not enough acquainted with the relative transaction of the parties of that time to be able to make up anything like a correct opinion; but think it probable the reason may be found in the circumstances that the Western Indians were continually committing depredations on the south side of the Ohio River until the commencement of hostilities; that the Miamis and Wabash Indians utterly refused to come into the treaty, which was the cause of considerable difficulty between them and the Wyandots and Delawares, with a majority of the individuals of the tribes who did come in were opposed to the treaty, and in particular the influence which the British garrison and the British agents on the Maumee, who received their skins and furs and delivered them arms and ammunition, had, to induce them to commence hostilities against the United States. Governor St. Clair sent the late Governor, Return J. Meigs, to Detroit with a dispatch to the British commander. Col. Thomas Gibson from Pennsylvania, who was afterward Auditor of the State of Ohio, was the licensed Indian trader, and had a strong block-house store on the bank, near where the steam-mill stands in Harmar. The tall, well-built, active, half-French and half-Indian Garoot, who was known to Colonel Gibson and bore a good reputation, agreed for a price to take Meigs upon one of his horses and escort him to Detroit; the writer well recollects that he sold Garoot, through Colonel Gibson a new saddle worth $20 for which he has not got the pay. Creditors have the best memories. Meigs went out with the expedition in safety, found the British very sociable and polite, but the Indians were morose, distant, and cold; and from their looks and actions, and some information obtained from the inhabitants, he had well-grounded suspicions that they intended to waylay him, coming in, and take his life; he closed his business in the most private and shortest manner, procured a young half-French Indian, with some good horses, and started without the knowledge of British or Indians; they made forced marches, and short encampments, and got so far the start that the Indians gave up the pursuit, and he arrived safe. This same Charlie was one of the Indians, recognized by Meigs two years after, who waylaid him, wounded his young man, killed his boy, and chased him with a tomahawk to within protection of Fort Harmar.

BUILDING OF THE BLOCK HOUSES.

Early in the summer, Capt. Jonathan Devol was employed in furnishing timber for the corner block-houses; he erected two saw-pits on the bank of the Muskingum, near the upper end of the present corn-field where a good spring comes out under the bank. Two sets of sawyers were employed. They furnished hewed poplar logs, which were whip-sawed into four-inch planks, of which the block-houses were constructed. He built a house for himself of the same material, on the south side of the Campus Martius, which received his family in the summer of 1789. I presume "the Garrison" was begun in 1788, and finished in the summer of 1789, as it was apparently completed—that is, that part which was built by the Ohio Company—when I arrived, in November, 1789. Governor St. Clair and his family arrived in January, 1790, and occupied the Southwest Block-house which was called the "Governor's Block-house," which was finished with good, smooth, poplar floors, doors, casings, &c., and a brick chimney, with three fire-places below, and three above.

In August, 1790, I was employed by General Putnam with two hands, Owen and Flagg, to line the pickets between the houses, with four-inch ash stuff, pinned on to the pickets so high as to cover a man, perforated with embrasures convenient for a musket. Likewise the plank of the block-houses had been sawed in a proper direction for embrasures which had not been cut out; they were cut out and filled with plugs, which could be taken out and put in as occasion required. I moved into the Campus Martius the 1st of December, 1790, after which some further repairs were made.

BIG BOTTOM MASSACRE.

Lots had been surveyed and drawn for by a number of persons who had associated to make a settlement at Big Bottom, who, about the beginning of winter, determined to go on and cultivate their land; those best acquainted with the Indians, and those best capable of judging from appearances, had but little doubt that the Indians were preparing to commence hostilities, and strongly opposed the settlement going out that fall, and desired that they remain until spring, by which time, probably, the question of war or peace would be settled. Even General Putnam and the directors of the Ohio Company, who gave away the land to have it settled, thought it risky and imprudent, and strongly remonstrated against venturing out at that time; but the young men were impatient—confident in their own prudence, and ability to protect themselves, and sanguine in the hope of success, they went. They put up a large block-house, which might accommodate the whole on an emergency, covered it and laid puncheon floors, stairs, &c. The house was made up of large beech logs and rather open, and it was not chinked; this job was left for a rainy day, or some more convenient season; here was their first great error; here their building of Babel stopped, and the general interest was lost in that convenience of each individual, and with this all was lost. The second great error was that they kept no sentry; the Indians had got an Indian lad about 18 years old, who was born and brought up in Rhode Island, whose name I forget; he had been enticed by the Ohio Indians without the settlement and then restrained from coming back; they took him to Sandusky and round in their hunting parties and came on to the Muskingum about Christmas; they came down within about 20 miles of Big Bottom, and struck a camp for hunting; this lad had been employed to keep camp and do chores, but was seldom left alone; they told him he must stay and keep camp a day or two—that they were going to look for a better hunting-ground, but still wished to keep their present camp until they could find a better; the Indians proceeded down the westerly side of the Muskingum, opposite the block-house, where there was a high hill near the river, from which they could view as much of the bottom as was not obstructed by trees, see how every man was employed, and what was transacting about the block-house. As was observed, the general business of fortification and security had been suspended; stopping the cracks between the logs of the house, and picketing and a sentry had been neglected; no system of defense and discipline was introduced; their guns were lying in different places, without order about the house; about 20 men in company in the block-house and each individual and mess cooked for themselves; one end of the block-house was appointed for a fire-place, and when the day closed in, all came in, built a large fire, and commenced cooking and eating their supper; the Indians from the opposite hill had watched their motions; the ground was frozen, the river was frozen over and strong, and covered with snow. When it began to grow dark, the Indians slipped across the river, surrounded the block-house, and each had a deliberate aim at the inmates through the door and the cracks in the logs. Part of the Indians rushed in at the door, others kept up the fire from without, and secured those who attempted to escape. Those who were not crippled at the first fire endeavored to escape by getting into the chamber, and some got through the roof, and jumped down, but were all killed or taken. Two Mr. Bullards had a small camp back in the Bottom, which probably had escaped the notice of the Indians, who on hearing the guns at the block-house, made their escape and got into Waterford and gave the alarm; the Indians took up the puncheon floor and built a fire, and attempted to burn the slain and the house; but, as the wood had been recently cut, and was all green, the fire subsided burning some so as to disfigure them—others partially—the arm of William James was found, clinching a piece of Indian bread in his right hand, which he was probably eating at the time he was shot; Mr. James was the largest and supposed much the strongest man in the colony; six feet and four inches high, and very strongly built; two or three sizes larger than his brother, John James of Pike County, whom you know, or his sister, Mrs. Bennett Cook; but physical power is lost when prudence and science are neglected.

These men, no doubt, had the power to defend themselves against the Indians, but they had no Revolutionary officer to plan and direct their defense; had they spent a few days in picketing their block-house and chinked well between the logs, and kept one sentry, which would have required service from each of but one day in 20, the Indians would never have attacked them. They had no stock or other plunder to induce an attack; nothing but dry fighting could have been expected, at which the Indians have no relish, except on the most advantageous terms. The Rhode Island Indian boy suspecting they were on the Muskingum, made his escape, and after a day or two got in very much alarmed, and in continual fear lest the Indians should get him again. He embraced the first opportunity and returned to Rhode Island.

WOLF CREEK MILLS.

The destruction of Big Bottom was a signal for all the settlements to move into garrison, and fortify themselves against the Indians. The settlement of Wolf Creek Mills was the most of an outpost. Col. Richard Oliver, Maj. Haffield White and Capt. John Dodge and a few more families resided there. This being the only mill in the county, and resorted to from all the settlements for bread, was given up with reluctance, but as no pecuniary inducement offered to induce people to stay, they were obliged to abandon it. Colonel Oliver and Captain Dodge went to Marietta, and the rest to Waterford garrison, of which I know very little.

Wolf Creek Mills were built in the summer and fall of 1789 by Col. Robert Oliver, Maj. Haffield White and Capt. John Dodge, all from Massachusetts. The machinery was brought by two brothers by the name of Potts from Pennsylvania, who afterward built a mill on Mill Creek a little above William McFarland's, which was nearly completed when burnt by the Indians in the spring of 1791.

In January, 1790, the company were taking their millstones up in a small keel-boat: through carelessness of the hands, the water rose in the night and took the boat off, which was taken up by Captain Stone next morning at Belpre; it was followed by Major White, he being on a visit to Belpre. I assisted Major White up to Marietta with his boat and mill-stones. In March following, in company with a number of neighbors from Marietta, I went to Wolf Creek Mills, which had been in operation a few days; we had a large pirogue and 60 bushels, principally of corn; we landed within half a mile of the mills at 10 o'clock; a four-ox team took our grain to the mills, and returned the meal, and we had all ground and started for Marietta at two and arrived at Marietta before sun-down. I saw a bushel of corn ground in those mills in two minutes by a watch. As there was no one living at the mills during the Indian War, the people set a day for grinding, and everyone went with his grist and his gun, and kept the guard while the mills were grinding.

PROVISIONS FOR DEFENSE.

In Marietta, the Campus Martius was sufficiently strong to offer security to the inhabitants in that quarter; but "the Point" had no blockhouse or pickets for defense. Arrangements were immediately adopted for the erection of a fortified enclosure, which would include a large portion of the inhabitants, with a sentry-box. A large block-house was erected on Front street, near C. Humphrey's house, where McLane now lives. Then a line of pickets extended westerly by Judge Cotton's to the bank of the Muskingum, where there was a small block-house with a sentry-box on top, which was occupied by some families; thence from the center block-house (the lower story of which was occupied by the guard and the upper story accommodated two families and a large sentry-box on the top, guarded with bulwarks to protect the sentry) a line of pickets extended southerly on a line diverging east from the east line of Front street, so as to include the old red Buell house, where Mr. Holden's store now is, to the bank of the Ohio River, where a small block-house with a sentry-box was occupied by some families, near which, on Ohio street, a strong gate was erected, sufficient to pass teams, and another the same size near the bank of the Muskingum, which were all the gates which led into the garrison; a four-pound cannon was placed on the Ohio, and a four-inch howitzer at the center block-house; these pieces were fitted with cartridges, filled with cut pieces of iron, and ounce lead balls; this garrison was guarded by three sentrys—one on the center block-house, by day; and the same on each block-house by night. The enlisted men kept one sentry day and night on the center block-house—No. 4—the other was taken by routine from the inhabitants; alarm posts were assigned for all the inhabitants within, to which they were to repair in case of an attack or alarm; these alarm posts were—first, the block-houses, next such of the dwelling houses as were best fortified, or made so, against an attack by the Indians. The firing of a cannon was to be the signal for each one to repair immediately to his alarm post with his arms ready for defense; the cannon were fired in the daytime when news came of Indians in the neighborhood, and of the discovery of Indian signs in the vicinity, to put all persons out of the garrison on their guard; we had several alarms of this kind, but nothing like a serious attack.

INDIAN ATTACK

In the spring of 1791, a party of 20 or 30 Indians were in and hanging loosely upon the skirts of the settlement at Waterford, then at Marietta, then at Belpre. On a very rainy, dark night, the sentinel from the bastion of the Campus Martius saw by the help of a flash of lightning an Indian skulking almost under him; the cannon was fired, answered at "the Point," but nothing further was seen of the Indians, but plenty of their tracks in the morning. Some short time after, Capt. Joseph Rogers from Pennsylvania, and one of the men with him, were killed and scalped on the hill in the Indian path leading from Mill Creek to the Campus Martius. Edward Henderson, from Massachusetts, another spy who was with Rogers—although a number of balls passed through his clothes—made his escape, was followed by the Indians, but being an athletic man he outran them and, taking a cir-cuitous route over Duck Creek, came in on the Ohio, and about 12 o'clock made the gate on Ohio street. He was immediately recognized by the sentry; Colonel Sproat was called—a cannon was fired, and answered at the Campus Martius and Fort Harmar. The story ran through the garrison, and from the simple statement that Captain Rogers was killed, and Henderson had been chased, it rose to that the Indians had chased him into the garrison, and were at the gates, making the attack. All was consternation, but everyone made immediately for his alarm post. Some little circumstances served to mark the propinquity of different individuals; the first person for admittance at the central block-house was Colonel Sproat with a box of papers; then came some young men with their arms; then a woman with her bed and children. Then came old William Moulton—from Newburyport—aged 70, with his leather apron full of old goldsmith tools and tobacco; his daughter, Anna, brought the China tea-pot, cups and saucers; Lydia brought the great Bible, but when all were in, mother was missing. "Where is Mother?" She must be killed." "No," said Lydia, "Mother said she would not leave the house looking so; she would put things a little to rights, and then she would come." Directly mother came, bringing the looking-glass, knives, forks and spoons, &c. Soon messengers were exchanged and hostilities were discovered. All returned to their homes in the morning. A party from "the Point" and the Campus Martius went out about 10 o'clock and brought in Captain Rogers, and buried him in Second street on the east side, a little north of the large brick house built by Waldo Putnam last year.

In the spring of 1792, a party of United States troops were stationed at "the Point," commanded by Lieutenant Tillinghast from Rhode Island, who erected the block-house, which, after the war, was occupied by the county as a court house and jail; it was built by the United States troops, superintended by a carpenter from the citizens, paid by the United States; it was built of hewed logs 18 inches thick, the lower story 26 feet outside, with a suitable projection in the upper, and a well-guarded sentry-box on the top; well-chinked, good puncheon floors, and a bullet-proof door, &c. This house was set in the line of pickets, partly in, and on the east side of Front street, not far from where Mr. Buck's house now stands. This house was occupied by the United States troops, who kept a sentry and assisted in guarding the garrison until ordered down the river with General Wayne.

After the defeat of General St. Clair, Captain Haskell was ordered to "the Point," and took command of the garrison and military government. The gates were closed at sundown and sentries set on the adjacent block-houses, which prevented any passing until sunrise next morning. This produced some conflict between the military and the citizens. A number of families who had stock, houses, &c., outside the garrison, went out by day and returned by night; this made it difficult to conform to the strict policy of the garrison, as the citizen had to divide his own rations while the soldiers were fed by the public. Many necessary circumstances prevented the citizen from so arranging his business as to be in garrison before sunset; several families moved out to the houses in the vicinity of the garrison, and staid out at the risk of the Indians.

A considerable of land was cultivated about the Court House, and around by Mr. Slocumb's, and out on Hart street. People who were out there and about the Campus Martius were not disturbed by the Indians, and staid out until peace.

JOHN GROBELS

About the time General Harmar was sent out, Matthew Kerr, a native of Ireland, had located himself and family immediately above the mouth of Duck Creek; he had three sons—Hamilton, George and Matthew, all expert woodsmen—and a son-in-law, Peter Neiswan-ger; their principal occupation was hunting. Hamilton Kerr hunted to supply General Harmar's garrison. They had cleared and cultivated a small field which supplied vegetables for the family, and feed for their stock; on the taking of Big Bottom, they all moved into the garrison, but left their cows, horses, hogs, corn and vegetables above the Creek, where they went daily in a canoe, and fed their stock and brought away such vegetables as were wanted. Late in the spring of 1791, the old gentleman got into his canoe, and went up and fastened it in the mouth of the Creek, and after taking care of the stock returned to his canoe with some potatoes; he had got into his canoe with his gun and pushed off when the Indians, who were secreted in the bush, shot three or four balls through him—run down—caught the canoe—and took his scalp and gun and fled, after shoving off the canoe. A party immediately pursued but did not overtake them; the canoe floated down the river, and was taken up a little above the garrison. The people standing on Ohio street heard the report of the Indians' guns, saw them run down the bank and take his scalp, and heard their yell of victory. Not long after, some of the young men went up to look after their stock, and found that the Indians had been there that morning, killed a large hog, and taken a part, with some potatoes, turnips and cabbage, and had gone. They came immediately back; a party was soon assembled from the Campus Martius and "the Point." Those who attended public preaching were required by law to carry their arms; it was about the middle of the forenoon service. The young men jumped to their arms, left the meeting, and were immediately in pursuit of the Indians. They followed them from the mouth of Duck Creek a few miles up the Little Muskingum, then they saw a smoke arise up a run, where the Indians had built a fire, commenced cooking, having their camp-kettles over the fire, filled with pork, potatoes, turnips, &c., and were in high spirits, enjoying the prospect of a good breakfast. Edward Henderson headed the party; he took a number of men and proceeded up the run under cover, with a view to flank or get beyond the camp; but the concert of action was not such as to command success; when the first party got within gunshot, Henderson fired and wounded an Indian mortally, but not so as to prevent his running a quarter of a mile; the Indians—seven in number—sprung to their arms, and were out of sight in an instant; the rest of the party fired promiscuously, while the Indians were in motion, probably wounded one badly, as he threw away his blanket, but was assisted by the others and got over the hill and out of sight. The one first shot was assisted and exerted himself to near the top of the hill, where they left him with his gun loaded that he might have his revenge, but he was too far exhausted to use it to effect. They got one Indian—his arms—two blankets—the camp-kettles and their dinner—and some other small things, which were sold at auction for the benefit of the party, and returned without injury. In the summer of 1791, a cow belonging to 'Squire Russell came in to the Campus Martius with an arrow sticking in her side; the arrow was hickory with a tri-angular piece of tin fastened in the end. A scout was immediately raised, consisting of 20 citizens, led by Hamilton Kerr, and 22 U. S. troops who were stationed at Fort Harmar, commanded by a Lieutenant. This party proceeded directly to Shepard's Mills—now Robinson's. Another of 12 was ordered up the Muskingum to ascertain if the Indians had driven off the cattle. We found the cattle along by and above 'Squire Putnam's, and the trail of 20 or 30 Indians—fresh made—going up. They crossed Mill Creek and kept to the mouth of Second Creek, turned short round under the hill—lower side of Second Creek—and went up and, as was afterwards ascertained, went directly over the hill to the aforesaid mill, where they met the party of 40 from the Campus Martius. Sproat and Shepard had built a log cabin near where Robinson's house now stands, and cleared the land about 70 yards toward Marietta. As Kerr and his party arrived at the edge of the clearing, within 70 yards of the house, they saw the Indians coming up through the weeds which were high, round the lower corner of the house; as they came up, one after another—eight or 10—they kept their eyes steady, examining the house, without noticing the party who stood directly facing them. The party could gain nothing by moving, and stood waiting for orders until Mr. Kerr fired and shot an Indian through the heart; the Indians dropped instantly down into the weeds and were out of sight, and soon down under the bank of the creek. George Kerr fired about the same time, but only one Indian was killed. A promiscuous fire issued from the rifles and muskets when there was nothing to be seen; the wounded Indian dropped his bow and arrows, and jumped down the bank, and ran through the high weeds 10 or 12 rods before he fell dead. The Indians ran across Duck Creek and over toward 'Squire Hobby's. The whites did not think proper to follow them, and came in without the Indian Kerr had killed, but in the afternoon they augmented their strength, procured a horse, and returned, and brought in the Indian whole. The party who scattered up the Muskingum as far as Barker's Ford, thought it imprudent to return by the river, and took back over the hills, over Tupper Creek and Mill Creek, and fell in with the party going out for the Indian, about where Sampson Cole's house now stands, on the top of the hill on the road to Duck Creek, and went out with them, and all came in together.

In the spring of 1792, Robert Wharff, a citizen residing in Fort Harmar, was shot while chopping on a log below the garrison, near where Mr. Fearing's house stands, and scalped by the Indians, who made their escape without being detected, until their mischief was completed.

In July the late Governor Return J. Meigs was returning from an eight-acre lot which he cultivated, a little below the garrison, on "the lower Point," with his hired man and a mulatto boy about 12 years old; while walking upon the westerly side of the run to cross back to the Campus Martius, where his family resided, when about half way up, he was fired cealed near their path. The man—Joseph Simmon—was shot through the left shoulder, and instantly jumped down the bank and swam the river; an Indian pursued him to the river but did not think it prudent to follow him in deep water. While this was transacting, the boy got the path and ran to the Campus Martius; he had got up to opposite the upper end of the corn-field, on the east bank, below Washington street. He ran down the bank into the river to get across—the water being shoal on the sand-bar, to where it was about two feet deep—when the Indian overtook, tomahawked, and scalped him. There were men on the eastern bank but with no guns at the time. When he had got the scalp, the Indian swung it over his head, gave a shout of victory and ran up the bank, but men had run down and several guns were fired at him before he got into the bushes but without effect.

It is now time to return to Meigs—left with the other Indian. When the Indian saw Meigs made no use of his gun, he rightly suspected that it was not loaded, threw down his gun, and advanced upon Meigs with his tomahawk and knife. Meigs—knowing the other Indians must be near—threw his gun away, and took to his heels. When within 15 or 20 steps, Meigs recognized this Indian to be the same who two years before had escorted him in from Detroit, and said: "Is that you, Charlie?" The Indian threw his tomahawk and pursued him down to near the Steam Mill, Meigs having gained a good distance in the race. Charlie turned and ran back until he joined the other Indians where their trail was followed up the hill, opposite the Campus Martius; by this time the banks were strung with armed men but the birds were flown.

The Campus Martius was laid out, and the corner block-houses were built by the Ohio Company; the lines intermediate between the block-houses were built by individuals, except some short lines of pickets; the gates, the outside line of projecting pickets, the abbatiss, and other defenses had been done by the soldiers and inhabitants in company in March, 1791. In consequence of the large number of Indian moccasin tracks around some large trees on the top of a hill, opposite the Campus Martius, on the west side of the river, a consultation was held by our white chiefs, who came to the conclusion that there must be a large party of Indians encamped in the neighborhood, who probably had or would have some British with a small field-piece, who would throw rockets from that hill and burn the Campus Martius; all hands were set to work—soldiers and citizens to cover the roofs with mud, to prevent the fire; they split white oak lath, one inch square, and 10 or 12 feet long, and nailed them within one foot of each other across all the roofs, and then carried up mud and covered all the roofs, about one inch thick. Had the covering been of good clay, it would have lasted some time; but as it was only of common earth the first heavy rain washed the whole off. But the British never came.

FIRST ENLISTMENT OF MEN FOR THE INDIAN WAR.

On General Harmar's being ordered to Cincinnati, about the 1st of September, 1790, the Secretary of War—General Knox—directed Colonel Sproat to take charge of the public property left at Fort Harmar. He enlisted for one month into the United States service one sergeant, one corporal, and 12 privates to guard and preserve the public property in and about Fort Harmar; in order to induce these men to enlist, the Ohio Company advanced their wages, in addition to the pay of a United States soldier, to $8 per month, paid out of Greene & Meigs' store, and when the men were discharged, they gave Colonel Sprout a power to draw their wages from the Paymaster-General, which was sent on by Charles Greene and brought out in goods. This furnished a remittance to the merchant, and a footing to his store bill.

Half of this guard was stationed at Fort Harmar, and the other at the Campus Martius. This was the first enlistment of men for the Indian war. About two months after, a full company was enlisted—officers and men—with three surgeons, and mates: these were distributed between the Campus Martius, "the Point," Belpre, and Waterford. The officers and surgeon's mates drew the same pay and rations from the United States as those of the same grade in their service, and the men the same as United States soldiers, made up by the Ohio Company to $8 per month. Mr. Fearing was appointed commissary and supplied rations on a commutation to those who chose. These enlistments were renewed every three months the first year. To introduce a routine in the officers and men, after the first year, the Ohio Company stopped their addition to the pay of the soldiers, and they only received pay as United States troops and, although the pay and rations of the soldiers was not more than $5 per month, yet there was a competition among the citizens for the berth, the means of getting money in any other way being extremely difficult. The officers and surgeon's mates continued to receive pay. The spies—six in number—Henderson and Shenn at Marietta, McGuffe and — at Waterford, Oakes and Delano at Belpre, and some occasional changes, received $1 and rations per day; these different sums constituted by far the greatest part of the circulating medium until the fall of 1792, when there was a demand for all the corn that could be spared to supply the commissary's department at Fort Washington, Cincinnati, preparatory to Wayne's march against the Indians, at 40 cents per bushel, delivered on the bank. In the fall of 1793, large quantities, for the amount of settlement, were exported to Cincinnati. As the people worked in large parties and kept a sentinel and had escape an attack, they felt themselves tolerably secure from surprise, and almost every man had more or less of a corn-field for which he could get any kind of goods on credit or money by waiting till the return of the delivery of the corn.

CULTIVATION OF LAND ENCOURAGED.

The proprietors of land near the garrisons encouraged every person to clear, wholly or partially, and cultivate as much land as they had means to accomplish; in this way everyone found means of obtaining the few things absolutely necessary, and by 1793 the travel up and down the river, added to the immigration into the settlement, furnished a ready market and demand for all the surplus produce that could be spared from home consumption. In the spring of 1793, Col. Alexander Oliver purchased four or five acres of land on the bank of the river at Belpre; he planted the 17th day of June, and in November I saw to the measure of 75 bushels of corn from the acre delivered into a boat belonging to Charles Reed to take to Cincinnati.

BELPRE.

Belpre was the most thriving settlement; of the number of settlers there was a greater portion of Revolutionary officers, whose military education, mature judgment, enterprise, perseverance, and industry gave them a decided superiority and certain success over their less fortunate contemporaries. They were born and educated in New England, where knowledge, prudence, and industry were exalted to the height of the cardinal virtues; these were the elements which formed a reputable Yankee character, and of which it was disreputable to be without.

Belpre was surveyed, and the settlement commenced, and several small fields were planted in the spring of 1789. In June Captain King was killed and scalped by the Indians; he was shot while chopping a log in the "Middle Settlement." Considerable improvement was made in clearing and erecting houses in the summer and fall, and in the winter and spring of 1790. Most of the settlers got down on to their lots and by the 10th of June had a small corn-field planted on the front of almost every lot; they adopted the plan of running a straight fence parallel with the river, carrying the path for traveling back of their corn-fields, and fencing on the river road the next winter. As the future wants of the settlements were to be supplied from present crops, every exertion was made by each to get into the ground as great a variety and quantity as possible amidst the wants and privations of the very necessities of life, and, as their corn-fields all bordered on the river, they showed a continued corn-field for miles, except at some intervals where there were no settlers. Being at Marietta, and wishing to get home, Major Goodale stepped into a flat-bottomed boat with an old Virginian who was bound for Kentucky, floated down, and as he lived at the lower part of Belpre he showed the Virginian the continued corn-field, as they passed along, and told him the quantity of labor which had been done in a few months. "Well—" said the Virginian—"I know one thing; you must have been ——— poor, or you would not have worked so hard." When that crop was matured plenty commenced, and want has never looked industry in the face since.

The rough journey over the mountains and the work and toil incident to a new settlement was great and the old clothes were giving out. Col. Ebenezer Battelle, from Boston, and Captain William Dana, from New Hampshire, in the spring of 1790, sowed flax, pulled it in the blossom in June, water-rotted it in swamps near the bank, dressed, had it spun and wove by William Dana, of Newport, and made it up into shirts and trousers, which were worn on the 4th of July at a meeting for the celebration.

On the commencement of the Indian War in January, 1791, all the settlers in Belpre built and went into one large garrison called Farmers' Castle, but found it very difficult to move their stock and feed for them to the vicinity of the garrison; those living nigh left all and went, and fed occasionally; those living at a distance had to haul their feed and make the best shift they could until summer.

When they had got their families into garrison, all who owned stock formed themselves into a company for the mutual insurance of each other's stock; they appraised each other's stock, and each man became obligated to contribute to any loss of stock by the Indians, in proportion to the value of his own. A number of cattle were killed in the spring. Mr. Lasure had two cows killed. Capt. Benjamin Miles, from Rutland, Massachusetts, drove in his team, a yoke of extraordinary oxen as to size and value: they were a complete match—red, 15 hands high, girting eight feet, and equally good for work. As the stock was all thin in the spring, killing was sheer wantonness, as the Indians made use of no part of what they destroyed. These cattle were dressed and a part brought to Marietta, with a view to supply the troops, but in consequence of its lying in the blood for some time, and being so very lean, the soldiers would not eat it; but the insurance was immediately paid by the other stockholders. As the Indians had not wantonly destroyed the stock on the south side of the Ohio, the settlers on this side practiced turning their stock across onto the islands and on to the main, where they remained secure until fall.

In the garrison, guards were strictly kept by day and night. They were partly men enlisted in the service of the United States and partly drawn out by routine from the inhabitants; they were commanded by an officer in the pay of the United States, whose duty it was to provide the sentinels and see that they were regularly and strictly kept up; these were selected from the more experienced officers of the Revolution—what was called the "Senior" class. These served in rotation as officers of the day, and while on duty had command of the whole; they made it their business to see that the pickets, the gates, the houses, and every part of the garrison was kept in repair; to see that the wood and other combustibles were so arranged that they would be safe against a fire; to see that the stacks of fodder, pens, &c., were not brought so near as to make it a cover for the enemy; and to see that too many had not left the garrison at one time,— and those without arms; to receive the reports of the spies, and to send and receive dispatches, as was found necessary. When spring returned, each individual must produce something to support his family. This could only be done by working in parties large enough to keep sentries to secure those at work while the spies were looking out for the whole; by making large circles around the settlement, by which it was difficult for the Indians to come in without leaving a trail or some sign, and there were very few instances during the war that the Indians were not discovered by their signs, and the news circulated through all the settlements before they made an attempt at mischief. It is surprising what a small circumstance will catch the eye of an experienced woodsman; a leaf has been moved—a tree broken—or a spear of grass bent—which will lead to a minute investigation and discovery.

UPPER AND LOWER SETTLEMENTS.

As the settler who moved in from a distance found it very inconvenient and expensive in time to carry on their land and maintain their families, they began to conclude that they could move back, and fortify and protect themselves; those from below built a garrison at the lower point of the island, on Major Goodale's farm, and those from above built one a little below the mouth of the Little Kana-wha, on land of Capt. Jonathan Stone, and called "Upper Settlement" garrison, in which Captain Stone, Capt. William Dana, Wanton Casey and Col. Silas Bent were the principal landholders. Maj. Nathan Goodale was proprietor of the land at the "Lower" garrison, and was considered one of the most industrious, persevering and well-bred farmers in the County; he had been an officer through the Revolution, and moved to this county from Brookfield, Massachusetts. Previous to his starting to this country, he selected the best bull and three of the best cows that he could procure; he broke them to work together in the yoke, and draw on to this country a wagon with part of his family. The breed of that stock was disseminated through this county and is still held in high estimation to this day. In fact, they have been considered the best milkers that have been introduced into this county.

In the spring of 1792, Major Goodale was clearing and preparing some ground for planting, some 20 or 30 rods back of the garrison, within gunshot, with his team; he was moving some timber for clearing and fencing near the edge of uncleared land and had been there but a short time when the oxen were observed standing still, but he was not to be seen. After some little time, the team remaining still, anxiety was felt for his safety, an examination was made, but he was not to be found; moccasin tracks were discovered, which led to the conclusion that he had been taken by the Indians; but no certain information has been obtained of the manner of his capture, the direction he was taken, or the event of his fate.

At the treaty of 1794, some information was obtained relative to every prisoner captured by the Indians along the river and taken as far back as the Indian villages. Hence it is probable that somewhere in the intermediate distance, either from cool, deliberate barbarity, or in some struggle to regain his liberty, he fell, either by the rifle, the tomahawk or the knife. His loss made a vacancy hardly to be filled; his memory is still fresh and green in that of his contemporary pioneers, and still cherished with respect and affection by their descendants. His name is not lost; a son and a daughter still survive: Mrs. James Kilbourne, of Washington, and Dr. Lincoln Goodale, of Columbus,—one of the wealthiest and most reputable men in Ohio.

The members of the "Upper Settlement" of Belpre succeeded in fortifying and protecting themselves against the Indians, and were fortunate in the safety of their persons and property, while they adhered to the rules which had been adopted, and practiced for their safety. But in March, 1793, one of the settlers, Jonas Davis, from Massachusetts, found a skiff laid upon the ice at the mouth of Crooked Creek, three miles above the garrison, and as nails were a very scarce and dear article he proceeded to take it to pieces for the nails; as he was at work at the water's edge, two Indians and a negro shot him from the top of the bank; one with a large-bored musket; scalped him and took his clothes and tools. They were not detected until he was found, and he related all the circumstances at Wayne's treaty.

Early in the year 1794, a party of about 20 Indians had made a large bark canoe about 15 miles down the Ohio; in which they crossed over to the Virginia side, sunk their canoe under water beneath some willows, and set out to hunt some prey between the river and Clarksburg. Taking the Little Kanawha in their route, they found a family by the name of Armstrong, living on the bank of the river, at the head of Blennerhassett's Island, about a mile below the Little Kanawha. The house stood immediately on the bank, and a little garden, inclosed with a brush fence, on the other side; the Indians got on the fence and pressed it down—the fence—to imitate cattle breaking over. Armstrong got up, unbound the door, and went out; when within a rod of the fence, he saw the Indians jumping over; he hastened in and barred the door, but the Indians were close upon him; the door not being sufficiently strong, they beat it down with their tomahawks; the man and his wife crept into the loft, burst a hole through the roof of the cabin, and jumped out; the man made his escape; the woman broke her leg in striking the ground and was despatched with an ax; a boy about 10 years old, in the house, was taken prisoner; the rest—four or five girls and boys—were tomahawked and scalped. One boy by the name of Hugh, whose brains were running over his face, was still creeping and moaning about the house—perfectly insensible, and who died that night. Two sons—nearly men—were in a small floating mill anchored in the Ohio, and escaped without injury.

*Reminiscences of Prominent Persons of the Early Settlements.**

BENJAMIN IVES GILMAN, son of Joseph Gilman, was a prominent and talented citizen; he was the first clerk of the court in the county of Washington, which office he retained until the commencement of the Territorial government, when he was released. The subsequent history of himself and family is well known. He was a delegate from the county to the convention which formed the Constitution of Ohio.

WINTHROP SARGENT, a native of Boston, and secretary of the Northwest Territory, married the daughter of Gen. Benjamin Tucker, and resided in Marietta until the fall of 1790, when General Harmar was ordered down the river; he followed and tarried below.

CAPT. JOSIAH MONROE, a native of New Hampshire. He served through and commanded a company at the close of the Revolution; he came on directly after the company and subsequently brought on his family; he was the first postmaster in the county; he died at Marietta, but has left a number of descendants, by his son, Joseph Monroe, and by his daughter, the wife of Col. Daniel Converse, in Muskingum County.

Permit me to mention a circumstance to show how hard was the case with many a Revolutionary officer and soldier. At the close of the war, in 1783, Captain Monroe returned home, purchased a small farm, amounting to about $1,000, paid a small part and got credit for the balance for four or five years, giving his brother-in-law, Captain Crosby, as surety, thinking by the time the money was due he should realize the money for his services—to the amount of $800, and interest. In 1787 final settlement of the notes would bring but 12 to 15 per cent. on their nominal value. In *Lives of other pioneers are sketched in other chapters of this work, notably in Chapter XXX.

1788 he left his final settlement notes with his brother-in-law, who managed to keep off the execution until the Constitution was adopted, when they rose to 23 per cent. above par and paid all demands.

CAPT. WILLIAM MILLS, a native of Boston, Massachusetts, father of Col. John Mills, of Marietta, and brother of Col. John Mills, Adjutant General of the United States troops, who died in Cincinnati. He was appointed by the Governor captain of artillery, in January, 1790. He was sometime necessarily absent as administrator of his brother's estate in Cincinnati; subsequently he brought on his family, who resided in Marietta.

CAPT. WILLIAM KNOWLES, from Boston, a Revolutionary officer, a gentlemanly, intelligent man, resided in Marietta some two years without engaging in any particular business, then returned.

MAJ. CORDESWELL, COUNTY REEL MAJ. ASA COBURN, from Rhode Island, lived in the Campus Martius during the war. Their descendants are settled along the Muskingum. Phineas—Major Coburn's eldest son—came out with the Ohio Company, and now resides in the north part of this county.

MAJ. EZRA PUTNAM, of Danvers, Massachusetts, came early to the Western Country with his family, three sons,—two of whom were massacred at Big Bottom. He was an officer in the Provincial troops, at the taking of the Island of Cape Breton in 1745. He and his wife lived to an advanced age in the Campus Martius, and kept a domestic boarding house; he was prolific in the legends of the old French wars, and frequently sang a ballad of 70 verses, on the taking of Copertoon, when he could not remember whether he had his axe in his hand or had left it in the house!

CAPT. ENOCH SHEPARD, from Massachusetts, and brother to General Shepard, who commanded at Springfield when General Shays attacked the arsenal, came early to the county with a large family of children, one of whom still lives in Marietta, the wife of Maj. John Clark. He was a substantial, intelligent business man. In the summer and fall of 1790, in company with Colonel Sproat, he expended a large amount of labor and property in erecting a saw-mill and grist-mill on a large scale. They had the frames and machinery ready for operation on the site where Robinson's mill stands, on Duck Creek, when the war stopped their operations and the mills were burned by the Indians, and the whole was a dead loss. But his industry and enterprise were not cramped by this misfortune, for many undertakings of magnitude and utility, after that, were executed by his judgment and perseverance.

DUDLEY WOODBRIDGE, ESQ., from Norwich, Connecticut. Himself and family removed here early in 1789. He was bred to the law, but subsequently engaged in trade, and was one of the first merchants in Marietta, which business he continued to pursue. He was one of the first judges of the Court of Common Pleas for the county, under the Constitution. His descendants are among the most reputable and prominent citizens of the Western Country.

WILLIAM SKINNER, ESQ., was a native of Pennsylvania, and one of the first settlers in the county, and was engaged in mercantile business, under the firm name of Skinner & McKinley. He was the second high sheriff, and the first under our present Constitution. His descendants are too conspicuous to require any further relation from me.

CHARLES GREENE, a native of Rhode Island. He was bred a merchant, and came early to Marietta with his mother-in-law (by the name of Sheffield) and Isaac Pierce, Esq., (whose wife was her daughter) and one other daughter who married Major Zeigler, of the United States troops. Mr. Greene was afterward in company in a store of goods, under the firm name of Greene & Meigs. This firm was established principally by the credit of the Ohio Company to provide the means of redeeming their outstanding orders in goods which were selling at a large discount; but as goods were a cash article, these orders immediately rose to par, and furnished a valuable medium; likewise, all the soldiers employed by the company, and by the United States, and the spies, could get credit at the store, by hypothecating their wages which were paid in the East.. This induced all the retailers of goods to fall into the same plan; this was the introduction of the credit system in our county. Mr. Greene moved to Cincinnati, where his descendants are reputable citizens at this time. Orders on the store were as current then as bank bills are now.

Belpre

Let us now leave the city, with all its good, and all its necessary evil, and its root of all evil, and its professions where the Judge tries all—the Lawyer pleads for all—the Sheriff hangs all—the Doctor cures all—the Merchant cheats all—the Mechanic works for all—and the Soldier fights for all—and go into the neighborhood where the farmers pay for all.

MAJ. NATHAN GOODALE was from Brookfield, Massachusetts. He was a soldier and an officer in the Revolution, belonging to the infantry. He was an active partisan, faithful and persevering. Rufus Stone mentioned to me not long since that among the old family papers was a letter from his father, who was in the army, to his mother, where he mentions that Captain Goodale had just brought into camp 15 prisoners; his reputation was that of a faithful, enterprising and brave officer; he was one of the most industrious and successful farmers, for the time allowed that was to be found in the county. His loss threw a damper over the whole settlement; no one could be more regretted, as no vacancy would have been so difficult to fill.

CAPT. JONATHAN STONE, from New Bron-till, Massachusetts, was a soldier and an officer during the Revolution. He commanded a company of light infantry, and was principally engaged in partisan warfare, where his station was near the lines which separated the antagonistic troops, by which he was subjected to numerous perils, which demanded the utmost vigilance and activity, both of the soldier and the officer. Early in life he had qualified himself as a practical surveyor, and subsequent to the Indian war completed the survey of the Ohio Company's Purchase, in company with Jeffrey Madison. He was run for a member of the first Territorial Legislature; but his chief characteristic was that of an intelligent and substantial farmer, and an industrious and useful citizen.

CAPT. JONATHAN DEVOL, a native of Rhode Island, came out with General Putnam, and his company, but was not in the Ohio Company's employ until they arrived at Simrell's ferry, where he was employed by General Putnam to build the Ohio Company's boat, which was called the "Mayflower," which brought the pioneers of the State of Ohio to Marietta; he was then employed by the superintendent in providing the material and erecting the block-house on the Campus Martius, where he built himself a dwelling house. Early in 1789 he removed his family to Belpre "Upper Settlement," where he remained until the close of the war, when he removed to Marietta, and from there up the Muskingum, where his descendants now reside. While residing in Belpre, Captain Devol, in company with Griffin Greene, Esq., built the first floating mill to be operated on and put in action by the current of the Ohio, in the quick water between the island and the main, above Farmers' Castle. This mill was placed upon two boats of unequal size, the water-wheel running between them, and the machinery and stones for grinding were placed in the larger, which likewise received the grain and the tenders and the customers, &c. This mill was anchored in the quickest water, and a communication with the shore was kept up by means of canoes and boats, which were the only traveling carriages incident to a country where there were neither roads nor bridges, but only the navigable streams. This mill—although but a makeshift—supplied the garrison and the scattered inhabitants for 20 or 30 miles up and down the Ohio. These mills were a risky piece of property, and gave the owners much watchfulness and expense in securing their safety; but like other floating capital, they were not subject to statutory provision to regulate the remuneration of the miller, but by the law of custom he was allowed to crook his hand to any extent in stroking his toll-dish.

At the close of the Indian war, Captain Devol selected a suitable site, purchased land, moved his family, and commenced building another floating mill, in 1795. In the absence of all other kind of mills except hand mills and the means of purchasing from abroad, the exigency of the public demanded something that would reduce corn to breadstuff. Captain Devol had made one experiment, and was still to make improvements, and he persevered under very discouraging circumstances,—want of necessary funds, the difficulty of procuring iron, millstones, &c.: in the beginning of 1796 the mill began to grind, and although a mere circumstance to a mill—a mere temporary concern—yet it did the grinding, in the times of a thin population, for a distance of 50 miles above Marietta and 50 miles below, and even ground meal to go to Zanesville in its first settlement. Subsequently Captain Devol built a mill upon a larger scale, which stood prominent upon high stone pillars, with a water-wheel 40 feet in dimensions; this mill accommodated a large circle of inhabitants, as the Muskingum is the only perennial stream in the county; at the time of the year when mills ceased to operate was the most advantageous time for these mills, and the most beneficial to the public.

In 1801 Captain Devol built the ship "Muskingum," of 204 tons, launched in the spring of 1802, belonging to Benjamin Ives Gilman, Esq., and the brig "Eliza Greene," owned by Charles Greene, merchant, of Marietta.

In 1802 a number of vessels were built at Pittsburgh, Wheeling, Marietta, and on the Muskingum, which were launched and floated down the Ohio, in April, 1803.

CAPT. WILLIAM DANA, a native of Watertown, near Boston, was some time in his country's service. He commanded a company of artillery previous to and for some years after the battle of Bunker Hill. He had leased a large farm and resided in the neighborhood of Worcester and was a devoted patriot.

the same to prevent a large sacrifice of property. He left New Hampshire early in May, 1788, with two sons, and arrived in Marietta the fore part of June. He built a log cabin on the corner of Market Square, exactly where the Post Office now stands; he was to clear and improve the land and give up his possession when the people required its use. As it was too late to plant, he and the boys cleared a small piece toward the Female Seminary and made a small kiln of bricks, which were probably the first kiln of bricks burned in Ohio. Bricks were made near the same place by Maj. Ezra Lant of Newburyport, Massachusetts, in the summers of 1789 and 1790. When I took possession of the cabin I purchased the lease, and cleared and fenced Market Square, and the common in front of the Muskingum, and sold my possession to Mr. Burlingame, and he to Dr. True, whose descendants now own it. I had a small chimney built of those bricks, and when I removed to the garrison of "Upper" Belpre in the spring of 1793, I took some hundreds of those bricks to build a small chimney in the chamber of Captain Dana's block-house, and when I moved up the Muskingum—December 1, 1795—I brought up in General Putnam's barge 500 bricks, a considerable number of which I took to Belpre and which were made in the first kiln made on Market Square, and are now about our premises.

COL. EBENEZER BATTELLE, a native of Boston, had been captain of the Ancient and Honorable Artillery Company of Boston, who could not be elected to that position without he had held a colonel's commission under the Governor of Massachusetts. He arrived with his family in Marietta in 1789, and removed to Belpre in the spring of 1790. He was liberally educated and was an active partner in a bookstore with Isaiah Thomas in Boston. He was educated with a view of his embracing a clerical life, but he did not embrace that profession. He moved to Ohio and became a farmer. He officiated as chaplain in the Belpre settlements during the Indian war. These patriots of the Revolution did not forget that they were the recipients of the gifts of a protecting Providence, and did not neglect to meet on the holy Sabbath and offer up their prayers and adoration to our Gracious and Merciful Father, their constant and bountiful benefactor, and with thankfulness and gratitude for the present and past implore His protecting care for their country and themselves in time to come.

CAPT. NATHAN CUSHING, a native of Boston, Massachusetts, a soldier of the Revolution, and a true and valuable officer, came with his family early to the settlement, and settled in Belpre. Farmers' Castle stood partly on his land; he was head of the police and had principal charge of the military in that garrison. He was one of the most candid, industrious and valuable citizens. He had a large family, which he took the utmost pains to educate during the war, and who now occupy reputable and respectable stations in the country.

CAPT. ROLAND BRADFORD, a native near Plymouth, Massachusetts, a soldier of the Revolution, was a good man, a good citizen, and a good farmer. He left but one child now living—Robert Bradford, of Parkersburgh. He was a descendant of old Governor Bradford, of Plymouth, and brought to Marietta a number of articles of household furniture that belonged to his ancestors, several of which are now in possession of his son Robert. He had a rare escape from the Indians in returning from Scioto Springs, in 1794, with G. Greene.

CAPT. OLIVER RICE, of Rutland, Massachusetts, was an officer through the Revolution. He married after the war—lost his wife—came out early, and settled in Belpre—was afterward a major in the militia—a sterling citizen and among the best of farmers; his line is extinct in this country. He was a brave man at Stony Point, and was a lieutenant.

CAPT. JONATHAN HASKELL came early and settled in Belpre; subsequently he was appointed a captain in General Wayne's army. He was with General Harmar out against the Indians; he came up with his company and resided one winter and a part of a summer in Marietta. He married a sister of Capt. Daniel Green. He was out with Wayne; he returned to Belpre, where he raised his family and made his exit; he had a daughter married to Mr. Lawton of Barlow.

LIEUT. GEORGE INGERSOLL, a native of Boston, came early to Belpre, having been an officer of the Revolution; he was a lieutenant of the first artillery company in the county. He was for some time under pay as an officer of the United States in the Indian war; he returned over the mountains after the war. He had some employment at West Point, where he got married and did not return.

The following were prominent citizens of Belpre and of the county all in the month of March, 1790.

COL. ISRAEL PUTNAM, son of Gen. Israel Putnam, of the Revolution, came with his son, Maj. Aaron Waldo Putnam, and returned to Connecticut, and in 1793 brought the residue of his family. Colonel Putnam was one of the largest capitalists of the time that emigrated to our county; he was an experienced and enlightened agriculturist; his example and precept were beneficial in giving an earnest tone and direction to farming in Belpre. Many of our Revolutionary settlers had been practiced to watchfulness and inured to danger, and disciplined to the use of the sword and gun, who were not familiar with the plow and the scythe and the sickle, but by the example of those better skilled, they soon became good farmers.

MAJ. A. W. PUTNAM, late of Belpre, was one of the most skillful, extensive and thorough farmers early in the settlement. His farm lay about half a mile below Farmers' Castle, and when the war commenced he moved into that garrison, but left his stock on the farm, where they required his daily attention. The Indians—who were secreted back on "the Plain," covered by the woods—watched those who went out to feed their stock; as Major Putnam was on his way to feed, and had got a sufficient distance, as they judged, they left their cover and endeavored to cut off his retreat, but he early discovered them and gave the alarm to the garrison; the citizens flew to their arms and made a sortie with all speed down the river in the direction to meet Major Putnam and intercept the Indians before they should meet Major Putnam. When the Indians found they could not effect their object, they made a halt, fired several shots at Major Putnam and received several shots from the party without effect, then made their retreat to the woods; but the citizens did not think prudent to follow, lest they should be led into an ambush.

GRIFFIN GREENE, ESQ., from Rhode Island, was an early settler. He moved to Belpre in the spring of 1790. He had been engaged in mercantile business in Rhode Island and had been active in the cause of his country during the Revolution, suffering some loss which led him to Europe, where he observed a floating mill for grinding grain, near Amsterdam, which led to the erection of one of similar construction in Belpre, in company with Capt. Jonathan Devol, as related elsewhere. Esquire Greene was a man of genius, and a man of talents, a useful, enterprising and exemplary citizen. His after life and family are well known.

DANIEL LORING, from Massachusetts, was an early settler in Belpre; he was appointed a magistrate by General St. Clair, and subsequently a judge under the Territorial government; he was a substantial and correct man, and one of the best kind of citizens; his descendants are an exemplification of his worth and estimation in society.

ISAAC PIERCE, ESQ., a native of Rhode Island, was brother-in-law to Charles Greene; they came together early in 1789; he was an early settler in Belpre; he was bred a merchant, but he soon learned the trade of a farmer; subsequently he became a magistrate, and was much resorted to for those instruments of writing so necessary in society to keep its surface smooth, by keeping the rough even and the crooked straight. His physical powers were moderate, but his moral and mental were such as made him a good man and a good citizen.

COL. ALEXANDER OLIVER, from the western part of Massachusetts, came on in 1789, and moved to Belpre in March, 1790; he had a large family; one daughter married Judge Daniel Symmes, another William Spencer, of Cincinnati. The family were reputable; his descendants are all settled in the western part of the State.

CAPT. BENJAMIN MILES, of Rutland Massachusetts, settled in the "Lower Settlement" of Belpre; his family was large and reputable. He was a substantial farmer and took much pains to educate his children, some of whom, I believe, occupy prominent situations in society.

WILLIAM BROWNING, from Rutland, Massachusetts, came on with General Putnam's family in 1790. COL. DANIEL BENT, from the same place. ISRAEL STONE, from the same place. All were settled in Belpre in 1790. They were all substantial farmers. CAPTAIN CURTIS, from Connecticut, MR. GUTHRIE and family, from the same place, were in garrison during the war, were settled in Newbury. The above persons had large families, some of whom occupy prominent stations, and all are reputable and noted.

I have been more particular with the first settlers of Belpre, because I consider they possessed in a more eminent degree those sterling qualities which form a base on which to erect this social edifice, and which are best calculated at once to cherish, guard, and perpetuate our republican liberties. They must have had some education in early life; they must have been practiced to industry and economy under the influence of a respect for morality and religion; they could not have been selected to lead their countrymen to battle for their country's rights merely for their physical powers (as of old) but they must have been chosen from their moral standing and superior intellect. They had a second education in the army of the Revolution, where they found the process of wisdom and saw the examples of bravery and fortitude; they had been disciplined to obey and learned the advantage of subordination to law and good order, in promoting the prosperity and happiness of themselves and the rest of mankind.

I must not omit the name of one person; he deserves a rank with our best men—DANIEL MAYO, from Boston. He was educated at Harvard University; he came early to Belpre and taught school in Farmers' Castle in the time of the war; he was not only a scholar but a gentleman, a most esteemed citizen, and subsequently married a daughter of Col. Israel Putnam and moved to Newport, opposite Cincinnati.

DEAN TYLER, a native of Haverhill, Massachusetts, came out very early. He had been liberally educated. He possessed abilities, but his genius was eccentric; he had been exclusively confined to handling books and found it difficult to become accustomed to the ax-handle and the hoe, and without the means to live without, there were few implements which offered the means to keep the pot boiling, and instead of growing up with the settlement and becoming a guide and benefactor, he became worse than indolent, buried his talents and his errors should not be remembered.

WILLIAM GRAY, of Massachusetts, was a nephew to William Gray, an extensive merchant, for whom he was named, who lived some time in Salem, and subsequently in Boston. He came early with his family and settled in Waterford; his physical and mental powers were such as would command attention and favorable notice in any society had his passions been under the guidance of moral principle and his intellect under the discipline of education. He was some time employed as a lieutenant in the United States service, and his uncle—Billy Gray, of Boston—regularly sent him money enough to maintain his family, but he was deficient in the characteristics of the Yankee—industry, economy and regular habits. Two of his daughters are respectively married to the Messrs. Howard, of Waterford.

GILBERT DEVOL, ESQ., a native of Rhode Island, came early to the county with his family, which were numerous. His oldest sons, Gilbert and Jonathan, settled in Marietta; they were both blacksmiths, industrious and valuable mechanics and good citizens. He was some time a judge of the Supreme Court of Rhode Island, in the time of the Revolution, when patriotism ran down the streets like a stream, and paper money like a flood. He was a man with a strong hand; had read much and had formed some eccentric theories by which he arrived at the conclusion that the moral and mental were and ought to be subordinate to the physical powers.

BENJAMIN SHAW, from Beverly, Massachusetts, came early to the country and settled at Waterford; he was a good citizen and a substantial farmer. He had a large family, who now hold reputable and respectable stations in society; his oldest daughter married Benjamin Dana, of Waterford; his youngest son, Boylston Shaw, now resides on and inherits the paternal property at Waterford.

BENJAMIN DANA, from Pomfret, in Vermont, came out with Col. Israel Putnam's family in 1704 and resided in Belpre until the peace with the Indians. He then purchased property in, and removed to, Waterford; he became one of the most extensive and successful agriculturists in the county. He inherited all the qualities analogous to the evergreen and granite of his native State, and adopted all the improvements and advantages incident to the more fertile soil and congenial climate of the State of Ohio. He very early began the cultivation of the fine-wooled Merino and Sax-on sheep; his flock is the largest and finest in the county. Very few men with the same means could have accomplished so much and still fewer could have done more.

Several other persons—Captain Davis for instance, father to a large family now scattered over the State. A Mr. Barlow, brother to Joel Barlow, the poet and land agent, who died in France; this man was probably 60; he got a lot—now a part of the William Dana farm—built a cabin, cleared a field, and raised a crop; he lived by himself, refused to go into garrison, contending the Indians would never kill him while he had his Bible. But the Indians came in the spring of 1791, early in the morning, and seeing a little hut, which they took to be solitary, they began to whoop and halloo; the old man, taking advantage of this warning, after losing faith in his Bible, fled to the river undiscovered, and crept out on a leaning sycamore over the water. As the water was rising fast, it drove him into the top, and as he was out of hearing of the garrison, he had to stay until some time next day before he got relief. A party from the garrison, knowing that the Indians were in, went down to see if Mr. Barlow's Bible had been a protection; they found the Indians had been at the house, the Bible torn to pieces, his bed emptied and the bed clothes and other clothing taken away, with all other things of value; his pots and kettle broken and strewed about; they heard some one hallooing at the river and found him on the tree. He immediately left for Vermont, where he was alive a few years ago, aged between 90 and 100.

In the last 10 or 12 years of his life, Mr. Woodbridge, having then retired from active business, wrote many interesting sketches describing early events in Washington County, and it had been the hope of many that he would collect these sketches and publish them in book form. Our hope has not been realized. Fortunately the most of his articles, published as they were written in the local papers, have been preserved. From them we make liberal extracts, believing that they contain many items of general interest stated by one who was a keen observer and a careful writer. The persons and events described represent nearly every part of the county. As an introduction to the chapter we give a short biography of the writer, from the pen of Rev. David H. Moore, Bishop of the Methodist Episcopal Church:

HON. GEORGE MORGAN WOODBRIDGE.—This distinguished Ohioan died in Marietta, March 23rd inst. (1900), in his 86th year. In the Western Christian Advocate of January 24, 1894, we printed his cut, a sketch "by a long-time friend," and editorial comment.

Now that he has entered into rest we cannot do better than to draw upon these for this memorial to his worth. He was born in Marietta, October 3, 1814. His grandfather, Dudley Woodbridge, came from Connecticut with the early colonists of Ohio, in 1790. His son, Dudley Woodbridge, Jr., father of George M., was a great merchant and business man of Marietta for about 50 years; of the courtly and gracious dignity of the old school.

From childhood George Woodbridge was a prince among his companions, honored for his wit, loved for his good-heartedness. He was an early graduate of the Ohio University, and was even then a brilliant orator, with prophetic promise of the eloquence that in after years captivated and swayed the multitude.

A politician born, he was elected to the Ohio Legislature in 1842. As Representative from Washington County, 1842-43, he ranked well up among the remarkable young men of that General Assembly—such men as Robert C. Schenck (General Schenck); Caleb J. McNulty, of Knox (died on the Mississippi in 1846); LeGrand Byington, of Pike; John A.

Smith, of Highland; not to mention the famous Dr. Edson B. Olds. Mr. Woodbridge was not a candidate for re-election. He continued to take an active interest in political affairs for more than thirty years, until the shades of his evening were drawing nigh. He was a delegate to the first National Republican Convention, which nominated John C. Fremont for President; and he became assessor of internal revenue in 1862, in time of the War of the Rebellion, and continued in that position to the public satisfaction till about 1873, or a period of some ten years.

It was while in the Legislature that he met and won his bride, Miss Lizzie Hensley, of Kentucky, who for more than half a century graced his home, and added an unsurpassed charm to the society of Marietta. She preceded him into the rest for which both toiled and lived.

His oratorical powers were put to noble use at the outbreak of the Civil war, when, with his fellow-laborers, designated by the Military Commission of Washington County, he was largely instrumental in recruiting the Thirty-sixth, Sixty-third, and Seventy-seventh Regiments of Ohio Volunteers. During the entire struggle, his voice, influence and substance were on his country's altar.

He was a life-long and loyal Methodist. For more than seven months he was a great sufferer. During all that time his patience was unbroken and marvelous; and he never was aught but the same courteous Christian gentleman that he was in the class room, on the hustings, in the place of business, in the circle of his family. He talked freely with his daughters, who were constantly with him. Miss Woodbridge writes:

"He said that he was not afraid to die, and that he had 'a conscience void of offense toward God and man.' Nothing hurt my dear father more than a word against the Bible or the Divinity of Christ. Any man who had such ideas he seemed to fear, and really had a horror of. The Apostles' Creed, he said, expressed his belief."

And so, very peacefully, at four in the afternoon of Friday, March 23d, he fell asleep.

In the second year of my ministry I was his pastor, and learned to love him as a son might love a father. In 1896 I feared he would slip away from us, and so had the biographical sketch prepared in advance, from which I have drawn today. But I used it at once, explaining my decision by the editorial note which follows, and which, better than anything I could write today, tells the story of his worth and worthiness:

"Why should the above be filed to be used when the splendid genius it commemorates is no more? Rather let the incense of its sincere compliment regale the living; and let the young men of Plymouth and of our Ohio Company's purchase look for inspiration while they may upon a direct and immediate descendant of the Ohio Pilgrims.

"What a priceless privilege to be a Paul at the feet of such a Gamaliel—to be post-graduate in his unchartered school of oratory and Christian statesmanship!

"The chiasm of the beginning of the Northwest Territory was upon his brow, and he taught of the past of our country as one rehearsing his own experience. A careful student of the Constitution, he knew each man's relation to that imperishable document, and could point with inerrant finger to the parts contributed by Jefferson and Hamilton. Following him, our history was not as the weird wonders of half-explored caverns dimly lighted by the smoking torch of garrulous pride; but as the wide landscape seen from mountain summit when the sun bathes it in cloudless splendors. For such a country as he saw and described, it were sweet to die.

"In that earlier time there were sparkling and inexhaustible fountains of poetry in his nature. His soul deepened from boyhood. When a lonesome student at the old Ohio University, he threw himself weeping on the worn horseshoe tracks that marked his father's homeward journey. Ever within him was a holy place of tenderest feeling, in whose seclusion he might hide and weep alone. This it was which surcharged his speech with magnetic currents that leaped from heart to heart, and gave to his cogent reasoning and fertile fancy the unpurchasable spell of eloquence.

"After all, his life has been an outline. As when some artist crayons his grand conceptions on the waiting canvas, and passes on, nor ever returns to fill in the sketch with details that make its possibilities immortal in the finished painting; so he, poet, philosopher, statesman, orator, each in all and all in each, outlined his chef d'oeuvre, and then scorned to pay the price a selfish world would have exacted for the easel-stores its completed glories require."

A WATCH-NIGHT MEETING OF FIFTY YEARS AGO.

At an early period in the history of Methodism that society adopted the plan of holding what was called a "watch-night meeting," including the last hours of the going-out year, and the segment of an hour of the incoming year, in which were held religious services. In accordance with this custom, public notice was given, the preceding Sunday, that at nine o'clock on the evening of the 31st of December religious services would be held in the church, to which all well-disposed persons were invited.

In accordance with this time-honored service, such a meeting was held in the Centenary Methodist Church of this place, commencing at nine o'clock on the evening of the 31st of December, 1842, and continuing until after midnight. The pastor, Rev. Frederick Merrick, was the conductor, aided by the local preachers of his charge and ministerial brethren from adjoining circuits.

When the hour came for the commencement of the exercises, to the surprise but gratification of the pastor and his official brethren, the church was filled to overflowing. The exercises were opened by the singing of that almost universally well-known hymn, commencing:

From all who dwell beneath the skies,
Let the Creator's praise arise.

The conducting of this exercise was by Wyllys Hall, and almost the entire congregation joined in the singing. After prayer by one of the visiting brethren, and the singing of an appropriate hymn, three short sermons were listened to by the congregation, after which an hour was spent in prayer and praise by the religious people assembled; which was followed by a general experience meeting, led off by the official members of the church and others of other denominations. As usual such opportunities open the way for varied talks, some of which would naturally lead to criticism. One speaker, in a vainglorious way, spoke of his reformation, and of his having turned over a new leaf. A wide-awake but not irreverent listener remarked: "I trust he will pay me the $3.00 that he has for a long time owed me." "Amens" were here frequent, and it is probable that most of them proceeded from those who had long since learned that the habit of the speaker had been only to pay his honest debts at the end of an execution.

The next speaker was one who announced to the audience that he was once more converted, and intended to follow in the footsteps of his Master. More than one of the listeners, in their hearts, felt, when he announced his conversion and good intentions, to exclaim "shoot him on the spot." But the talking was not all of that sort. Holy men and women, who by their lives and conversations, gave evidence that they were "born again," told of the goodness of God and the joys of His service.

The companionship, friendship and example of such people as the last could but bear one toward the heavenly country. They are gone now, but from their blessed habitations above they beckon us onward and upward. The hour of 12 o'clock was approaching, when the preacher in charge, evidently weighing the seriousness of the hour, invited all present, who had assumed the Christian name and resolved that in the coming year they would do more to advance the Master's kingdom, heavenly assistance being given them, to manifest such resolve by rising. A large proportion of the audience responded to this call, and while they were still upon their feet, the same gentle, heavenly-minded man asked that all those present who had never assumed the Christian character, but who had resolved upon leading a new life should rise. Nearly every seat was vacated. With tears of joy streaming down his cheeks, he looked over the audience, and then, with eyes turned heavenward, for a moment seemed engaged in silent prayer; and then he said: "Brother Crawford, you pray." Such a prayer was never uttered in my hearing. I have heard bishops and far-famed clergymen of many lands offer petitions to heaven, but I think I never heard a prayer so impressive, the utterances of which were so suggestive and that seemed more like direct communication with the Almighty. To those who have heard this holy man pray, the above will not appear as an exaggeration. No language that the writer commands can explain the power and pathos of his utterances. He asked that all who had by rising expressed the resolve, strength being given them from above, to live lives of righteousness; and that they who had declared the purpose to seek redemption, he nerved on to duty.

The last words of that inimitable prayer still ring in my ears: "If there is one who is joined to his idols, and defiant, I pray God that he remember that the time is coming when the voice of pardoning and redeeming mercy will be silent throughout the universe of God." As if horror-stricken with this last thought, he exclaimed: "O Lord, that is not yet! Save them now."

The good pastor, that holy man of God, who but the other day laid down the cross to take up the crown, after a few touching remarks, said to the audience: "The last fifteen minutes will be spent in silent prayer. The old year has nearly gone, and a new year will soon commence."

Where are all that multitude that filed out of the church and hid to their homes? "Sacred to the memory of ——" is written upon the stone which stands at the head of the graves where most of them lie.

May God be with the few who remain, probably never again to meet such a crowd of earnest worshipers until they reach the circle where the saints and angels meet to join in songs of praise to the Great Redeemer.

EARLY FLOODS IN THE "OHIO BASIN."

It is presumable that there are few subjects of more interest to the general reader than that of the overflow of our rivers. This is a hackneyed subject, and to introduce anything particularly new is attended with difficulty.

There has recently fallen into my hands the journal of a Mr. Walcutt, who, in the year 1790, was a visitor among our people. Among the novelties encountered during a stay in this wilderness was a flood. Having the account of his journey before me I quote as follows:

"February 18, 1790.—I went out in the evening before I went to bed and found the back-water of the Muskingum had come into the creek at the door and above the bridge so as to cover our dam and fill the pond high. Toward night and in the evening, it rained very hard with thunder and lightning. Expect to be routed again with the high water.

"February 19.—We got up at sunrise this morning, the doctor calling, and telling us the water rose so fast that it would soon be in the house, when I immediately got up. We soon had the tea-kettle on, and got our coffee boiled, and before we could get our breakfast done, the water came in so fast that the floor was afloat, and we stood in water up to our buckles to drink the last dish. We had before got such articles upstairs as the water might injure. Everybody on the point below the great bridge is obliged to move. Only three houses are out of the reach of the water, owing to their being placed so high. Messrs. Woodbridge (merchant), Rockwell and Wells (tailors), Mr. Bent, Prince, Webster, Moody, Skinner, Mixer, Mills, Lucas, Neal, Tuttle, Barber, Landon, and Mathews were flooded sufferers. The flood carries away fences, barrels and everything that will float.

"February 20.—The river continues to rise.

The ice almost all passed down. But it is supposed there have been heavy rains, as well as the Allegheny probably broke up, that cause the present rise, which several besides Col. Gilman say it is about one foot higher than it was last May."

I find in an old scrap book, an article written by Caleb Emerson, Esq., on the "Ohio Flood in 1832," in which he says:

"Written Dec. 12, 1852.

"Some seventy years ago, when the Ohio basin was involved in its native wildness of wood and wild grass, there occurred a remarkable 'Freshet,' which, according to the relics and traditions indicated by Dr. Hildreth, was higher and more tremendous than any one since.

"In about thirty years after, say to the beginning of the year 1813, including some twenty years after the settlement of Marietta, such floods were frequent; but prior to December, 1808, we hear of none of such height and power as to be of any marked annoyance to settlers along the banks. Structures and fences, unfortunately placed on low bottoms, were sometimes invaded and misplaced, but no flooding to cause much disturbance on the higher bottoms along the beautiful river, where settlers almost uniformly chose to locate their dwellings, till the Christmas 'Fresh,' 1808.

"That flood at Marietta was two feet higher than any before, since 'the settlement.' This was alarming, in Belpre, the elder and most interesting of the 'company's' agricultural settlements, where the substantial farmers had begun to erect along 'the bank' their commodious farm houses, similar to those of New England. It was distressing to think of being driven back from the near view of the river, which had long been the main thoroughfare, where they could be gratified by gazing on the down-floating arks, with their freights of hopeful immigrants, or of up-river produce, or on the rarer sights of up-bound keel-boats, where the hardy boatmen tugged at the weary oar. But they had comfort in the hope that as no such 'Fresh,' had before occurred since the building of Fort Harmar, 1785, so, in all likelihood, no other such uprisings might be apprehended for one or two generations hereafter.

"The fluvial history of the upper Ohio, in the last forty years, has by no means realized the hopeful anticipations. In midwinter, 1813, came the tremendously destructive 'Ice Fresh,' four and a half feet higher than the 'Christmas.'

"There had, indeed, been two intervening 'Freshes,'—a moderate one in the winter of 1811, and the 'Pumpkin Flood,' very destructive on the waters of the Allegheny. The pumpkins' and the cornstalks floated past Marietta from above, but there was no flooding here. The Muskingum did not sympathize with the Allegheny. It was so low that the back-water from the Ohio pushed back its current about twenty miles. Driftwood ran up, along the shore of Point Harmar, seemingly as fast as it ever ran down. Some down-river boats, in a foggy night, were interdrawn into this up-river current, and the navigators, when the morning sun dispersed the fog, found themselves drifting many hundred yards up the Muskingum. Marietta escaped, unharmed, this outburst of waters, while Pittsburgh suffered severely. But Marietta abode not long in its fancied impunity. The tremendous 'Ice Fresh,' with its signal afflictions was had.

"The first half of winter in 1812-13 was severe and snowy like New England. Good sledding endured for weeks. The snow, about Marietta, accumulated and condensed to the depth of one and a half or two feet; in higher altitudes, and more northern districts, the depth may have been much greater. There were some apprehensions of high water. The proverbial 'thaw of January' began about the 12th. A week of sunshiny, April-like days took away the earth's winter coating about the mouth of the Muskingum. No rain yet, snow agoing finely. On a fair Sunday eve the Muskingum, still low, began to rush and swell. The ice was not broken, but the dreaded rush of snow-water was running rapidly away, but the Muskingum 'saw another sight' by Monday's lingering dawn of light. The horizon was densely shrouded, and the rain descended in torrents, and held on through the day and night. The ice was broken and was fearfully crushing and crowding down the currents. During Sunday night the water had swollen up to within 10 or 12 feet of overflowing the banks, from which almost every 'raft' was swept away.

"The light of Tuesday morning exhibited the waters swelling up towards the height of 'Christmas Fresh,' and pressing up the streets across Marietta 'Point,' where the people were in great trouble. The rising continued through the day, which was mild, but the temperature changed very suddenly at night. There fell about six inches of snow. The rain-water was arrested in descending the slopes. As the side current up the streets was checked by a downward current across the bottoms toward Duck Creek and down the valley between 'the Point' and 'the Plain,' nearly the whole surface of water among the houses at 'the Point' above Front street, was frozen over. This was a check to intercommunication, but saved many things from floating off.

"Notwithstanding the icy check, the rising continued till Thursday morning, when it had overpassed the 'Christmas Fresh' four and a half feet. It was the opinion of Gen. Rufus Putnam that if the mild weather had continued, the rise might have been from three to five feet higher.

"Much damage was done to the towns and the farms along the Ohio. But it was hoped that as this visitation was owing to peculiar circumstances, especially the sudden melting of immense masses of snow, the like might not again occur for an age or two.

"But the lapse of twenty-seven months showed the futility of these hopes. The light of 'All Fools Day,' so called, April 1, 1815, exhibited an overflow at Marietta, as high as the 'Ice Fresh.' Some twenty miles up the Muskingum it was said to be about seven feet higher than in January, 1813. March had been mild, peach trees were in bloom, and it may be doubted whether snow-water added much to its over-flow.

"Within about three years thereafter, three overflows of the Ohio occurred,—one in November, 1817, one in June, preceding or following, another which came within eighteen inches of the 'Ice' and the 'April,' perhaps after the wonderful snowfall of February of 1818. The three occurred, it is believed, within less than twelve consecutive months. After this was an intermission of nine or ten years, till January, 1828, when about the 8th, there was an ordinary flood at Marietta. But the crowning flood, hitherto, was that of February, 1832. Winter closed in severely by the first of December, 1831. The Ohio was soon frozen over, and so continued, with fine sleighing till near the middle of January, 1832, when there was a 'January thaw,' which sent off the ice and snow-water to our great comfort. But Old Winter rallied directly, with severe cold and snow. The Ohio was ice-bridged, till some days into February, when the sunshine and the gulf winds dissolved the snow, and then a general rain, commencing probably at head waters, deluged the Ohio basin and raised the waters at Marietta five feet above the 'Ice Fresh' and the 'April.' Immense damage was done to the 'river towns' especially to the Queen City, less proportionately to the town of Marietta than to almost any other. A long intermission followed, almost sixteen years. There were threatening high waters almost every year, coming quite near to an overflow and then receding. The extensive clearing of the banks, removing the overhanging and interposing growth of brush- es, and the removal of treetops, drift piles and snaggery and last, mayhap not least, the enlargement of the river bed by abrasion, principally from steamboat surfings, have rendered the beautiful river less susceptible of moderate overflows, such as occurred in the first twenty years after the first settlement of Marietta."

REVOLUTIONARY RECORD.

Messrs. Editors: Some interest of late has been manifested in the finding of human bones disinterred in the necessary excavation of earth for drainage purposes in West Marietta. And no little interest has been manifested in the inquiry which has followed the finding of an ancient silver spoon. It was found imbedded in the earth three feet below the surface in a lot fronting on Post street, this city. But I confess to a more lively interest in being allowed the privilege of examining the record of his regiment kept by Lieutenant-Colonel Grosvenor.

Among all the writings and valuable papers that I have, through the courtesy and kindness of the owners, been allowed to examine, none have given me more pleasure and instruction than the record of his regiment kept by Lieutenant-Colonel Grosvenor during the years of 1776 to 1782, of the Revolutionary War. This record wisely cared for by the colonel's son and in later years by his grandson, Capt. Samuel Grosvenor, is worth the most careful examination of the curious, and indeed of all who care for the particulars of that noblest of all struggles,—that of our forefathers for liberty.

I feel that to have in your hands a book once held by a patriot, and read the record of a regiment celebrated for its country-loving character, is a pleasure beyond the ordinary.

To-day I shall return this book to its owner and in his possession it will probably be subject to the readers' inspection. I note a few among many things of interest gathered from its pages:

Names and ranks of officers of the First Continental Regiment of Foot, formed Jan. 1, 1781, and dates of commissions.

John Durkee, Colonel, Aug. 10, 1776, died May, 1782.

Thos. Grosvenor, Lieut.-Col., March 13, 1778; became Commandant May 29, 1782.

Robert Warner, Major, May 29, 1782.

Edward Eells, Captain, Jan. 1, 1777.

Erastus Wolcott, Captain, Jan. 1, 1777.

Simon Spaulding, Captain, June 23, 1778.

Samuel Clift, Captain, May 20, 1779.

John H. Buell, Captain, Jan. 20, 1780.

Jonathan Hart, Captain, May 1, 1780.

John Durkee, Jr., Captain, Oct. 26, 1780.

David Judson, Captain, May 29, 1782.

The reader will discover in some of the above, as he would in the entire record of the regiment, names quite familiar to old citizens, and indeed many of the original Ohio Company shareholders.

The next thing we should speak of is the causes which led some of the soldiers to overstay their leaves of absence:

Lieutenant Elijah Ranson, one day beyond leave, occasioned by a storm.

Captain John Buell (leave granted by Col. Meigs) overstayed time seven days; occasioned by want of money.

Ensign George Cotton (leave of absence granted by Col. Sherman) overstayed his time sixteen days; excuse, married a wife.

Capt. Samuel Clift overstayed time two days, waited for cloth; his reason adjudged sufficient by a court.

From register of the dead of the regiment:

One death of consumption.

Of sore thigh amputated.

Of smallpox.

Killed in action near Jamestown.

Of sickness. Left old blanket and breeches in care of Sergeant Avery.

Of cholera morbus or colic.

Of fever and flux.

Of fever and ague.

Apoplectic fit by drinking 12 gills of rum.

Of fever.

Of wounds received in boarding enemy's vessel.

Executed for an example.

Drowned, fell out of a canoe.

Killed by Col. Delany's thieves.

Crimes and punishments:

Repeated desertions: to suffer death, was pardoned on gallows; dismissed as unfit for a soldier.

Stealing public clothing, 50 lashes; received it.

Stealing a pack belonging to a recruit while in his tent, 100 lashes; received them.

Theft in taking tobacco from a sutler; badges taken off.

Threatening to desert, 50 lashes; received it.

Endeavoring to excite mutiny; to suffer death; executed May 13, 1782, by hanging by the neck.

The usual punishment for ordinary offenses was lashes from 10 to 100.

The men of the regiment were chiefly farmers and mechanics from the counties of Hartford, New London, Springfield, Windham, New Haven, West Morland, Fairfield, Litchfield, West Chester, Hampshire, Providence, Dutchess.

Three Guinea negroes and one Indian band were in one company.

Captain Durkee's company had 40 negroes and six Indians.

Who were the officers who were upon the Court Martial:

Capt. J. H. Birch	Col. Tupper.
Maj. Wally.	Capt. Tupper.
Capt. W. L. W.	Ensign J. B. B.
Col. Sherman.	Col. Meigs.
Col. Putnam.	Gen. Parsons.

All but one progenitors of Ohio men.

Of very great service would this record book of departed heroes be to those, their descendants, who are now engaged in the attempt to establish their rights as Daughters of Revolution, Colonial Dames, or Sons of the Revolution. I know not of another record in private hands.

REPORT OF THE EARLY BURIALS IN WATERFORD TOWNSHIP.

A report of a recent visit made to the burial-grounds in Waterford township, by Henry Brokaw, of the Marietta Academy, gives us information with regard to early burials in that part of the county. The reader will observe that among the names here given are three of the 48 pioneers who first landed at Marietta, viz., Maj. Haffield White, Capt. William Gray and Peltiah White.

The following are inscriptions from the Waterford burying-ground:

1. "In memory of Dr. Silas Durkee, who departed this life May 8th, 1813, in the 47th year of his age."

2. "In memory of Jane Leget, daughter of John and Sarah Leget, who died in October, A. D. 1806."

3. "In memory of John Leget, Sr., who died Jan. 24th, 1804, in the 39th year of his age."

4. "In memory of William Leget, son of John and Sarah Leget, who died Jan. 24th, 1801."

5. "In memory of Mr. Sherman Waterman, who was wounded by the savages, being shot through the body on the 21st, and died on the 22nd of May, 1795, aged 27 years."

last man killed by the Indians in Washington County.

In the spring of the year 1795, some young men who had drawn "donation" lots on the south branch of Wolf Creek, about three miles from Waterford garrison, decided to clear their land in company. Their names were William Ford, William Hart, Jacob Proctor, John Waterman and Sherman Waterman. On the 15th of June, the fore part of the day was wet with heavy showers of rain at intervals so as to discourage them from their common work of chopping, and they decided to spend the forenoon in a little enclosure occupied as a garden near the house (a small block-house which they had built). During a hard shower they retreated into the house. Sherman Waterman, wanting some fresh bark to put in the bottom of his sleeping berth, had gone down to the creek, a few rods distant, to procure it, and a few moments thereafter the report of a rifle was heard. Each man seized his gun and stepped to a port-hole to discover the enemy. Directly Waterman came running toward them, and fell down exhausted from loss of blood, a few rods from the house. William Hart and one other man rushed out amid the shots of the enemy and brought him into the house, themselves unharmed. William Hart then volunteered to go and carry news of the disaster to the fort at Waterford. A party of men, led by McGuffy, soon came up and took the wounded man in a bark canoe down the creek to Tyler's block-house, where he died that night.

6. "In memory of William Gray, a native of Massachusetts, who died July 24th, 1812, aged 52 years."

7. "In memory of John Dodge, who departed this life Oct. 8th, 1805, in the 58th year of his age."

We turn again aside from the record to tell something of John Dodge and his connection with the Wolf Creek Mills.

Simultaneously with the settlement at Plainfield, a company of three men, Col. Robert Oliver, Maj. Haffield White, and Capt. John Dodge, with a number of laborers, commenced operations for the erection of a mill on Wolf Creek, about a mile from its mouth.

We leave the record here for a brief period to relate the incidents connected with the killing of Sherman Waterman, who was the

By great industry and perseverance the dam and mills were built in the course of that year and by March following, the grist-mill as well as the sawmill was in operation. The mill-stones were procured from Laurel Hill, in the vicinity of Brownsville, which affords a hard, conglomerate rock, very suitable for grinding Indian corn and rye, but not of a proper texture for the manufacture of flour. The iron crank for the sawmill was manufactured at New Haven, Connecticut, and is said to have been transported across the mountains to Simrell's Ferry on the back of a pack-horse and thence by water to the mills. When put in operation, they fully answered the expectations of the builders. From tradition we learn that the grist-mill, with good head of water, could grind a bushel of corn into fine meal in four minutes. In the summer of 1790, it furnished a large portion of the meal, used by the people of Marietta and the surrounding country. Early in the following year the Indian war broke out and the settlement at the mills was broken up and the mill company removed their families to Marietta. During the war parties composed of twenty or thirty men sometimes went up by water with their grain, a part of them marching by land in sight of the boats as guards. While the load was being ground, sentries were placed in the adjacent forest to protect the workmen from an attack of the Indians. It is a curious fact that the mills remained unmolested during the four years of the war, though signs of the savages were often seen in and around them. After the war closed, the mills were repaired and put in use again. They were the first ever built within the bounds of the State of Ohio.

From the Cedar Hill burying-ground we have the following records:

"In memory of Major Haniel White, one of those Revolutionary warriors who continued in his country's service from the commencement to the end of the perilous struggle which obtained the independence of our country. He was also one of the first settlers of the State of Ohio. He was born at Wenham, Mass., Jan. 3d, A. D. 1739. Died Dec. 13th, 1818, aged 88 years."

2. "In memory of Peltiah White, who emigrated from Wenham, Mass., in 1788, to the Northwest Territory, and suffered many hardships in the five years' Indian blockade at Marietta. He died Feb. 17th, 1832, in the 63d year of his age."

3. "Sacred to the memory of Peleg Springer, a native of Rhode Island, and a pioneer of the Western forest. Endured many privations and encountered many hardships during the five years' Indian blockade in the first settlement of Marietta, Ohio. He died Sept. 28th, A. D. 1828, in the 63d year of his age."

4. "In memory of Susanna, wife of Peltiah White, who died Sept. 12th, 1823, in the 52d year of her age."

I much want other reports. I, at this time, will designate only two, one of which is in the neighborhood of Miller's schoolhouse in Marietta township, the other on the Henry Sheets farm, Newport township, not far away from the Barker schoolhouse.

SOME DISTINGUISHED VISITORS DURING THE PAST CENTURY.

Editor of the Register: If any complaint is made by your readers that the signature "G. M. W." so often appears in your columns, it may be charged to the promptness with which what I write appears. For instance, scarce was the ink dry with which was penned the article styled "Old Titles, Etc.," than I read it in print.

The ladies of the "Woman's Centennial Association" having planned a course of articles to be read before the Association, which embraces subjects of general interest. I have not the program before me, but I believe that the topic of one paper is to be "The Celebrities Who in Old Times have Made Marietta a Visit." I shall enlarge this theme by adding the names of some who have been mere passers-by.

In the year 1749, M. Celeron de Bienville, with three hundred men, was directed by the French government to traverse the country as far as the Appalachian Mountains.

This officer was furnished with leaden plates with the arms of France engraved on them; and he was ordered to bury them at particular stations. In accordance with this order M. Celeron de Bienville buried one of these plates on the west bank, near the mouth of the Muskingum River. This leaden plate is now in the museum of the Antiquarian Society, Worcester, Massachusetts.

On October 27, 1776, George Washington, in descending the Ohio River, made the following entry in his journal: October 27.—"Left our encampment a quarter before seven, and after passing the creek near which we lay and another near the same size and on the same side, and also an island about two miles in length, but not wide, we came to the mouth of the Muskingum, distant from our encampment about four miles, and there viewed some ancient earth-works."

In the year 1795, Gen. Anthony Wayne made Fort Harmar the place of assembling his troops, before his celebrated and successful campaign against the Indians.

In the year 1796 William Henry Harrison (afterward President of the United States), as a lieutenant in the military service, was for more than a year a figure in the circles of Marietta society.

Tecumseh, the great Indian warrior, in the year 1792, after the murder of the Carpenters less than seven miles distant from this place, from the Virginia hill tops saw the ascending smoke from the cabins of the picket point.

In the year 1820, the great statesman and orator, Henry Clay, on his way to Washington City, spent several hours at the home of his friend and admirer, Col. Levi Barber.

Gen. La Fayette, the noble friend of this country in its struggle for independence, in the year 1825, was entertained at the hospitable home of our fellow citizen, Nahum Ward, and was honored, as no man since has been honored, by the turning out of every living being in the town to greet his coming.

John Quincy Adams, in the year 1843, was received by an overflowing house at the Congregational Church by the multitudes who felt proud to honor one of our greatest statesmen.

Thomas Ewing, Sr., one of Ohio's most distinguished men, honored us by his presence and made one of the greatest speeches ever listened to by a Marietta audience. He tried his first penitentiary offense here, in 1816.

In the political campaign of 1840, Cassius

M. Clay, one of the most brilliant men of his day, delivered, in our Court House, a telling speech.

Kind reader, don't suppose whilst this article fails to name scores of others than those mentioned, that they are lost to memory.

Thomas Corwin, President Hayes, Senator William Allen, Gov. John Brough, President Garfield, Governor Hoadly, Governor Morton, of Indiana, Senator Thurman, Senator Sherman, President McKinley, Senator Hanna, and Foraker have addressed our people. C. Vallandigham, an opponent of the War of 1861, also made his presence here and made a speech in 1863.

Among the distinguished divines who have honored us with their presence and filled our pulpits are Bishops McIlvaine and Hamline, Rev. Dr. Plumer, Dr. Lyman Beecher, each entitled to a chapter of many pages, but here is not the place to record their greatness.

Marietta has also been honored by visits from Generals Turchin, Crook and Steadman. Later on Senators Hoar and Daniels have been the honored guests of our city, and to assembled multitudes delivered addresses, the thoughts contained in which will dwell in the minds of listeners, as long as life lasts.

On one cheerless morning, many years ago, a steamer landed at Hall's wharfboat, which lay near the Third street landing, and was taking on wood for boiler fuel. Soon upon the shore was seen a man in foreign dress. Meeting a boy on Ohio street, he asked, "What place is this?" In reply the lad answered, "Marietta, the oldest settled place in the Northwest." To which the interrogator remarked (at the same time looking at the dilapidated, tumbled-down buildings on Third street).—"This does look settled." The speaker was no less a person than Dickens, the celebrated English author.

In my next I may speak of men who claim Marietta as their home.

RECOLLECTIONS OF SOME MEN OF FORMER YEARS.

If your readers have patience to follow me,

I will write briefly of some of those who lived here long ago.

Just outside the north corporation line, long years since, there lived Deacon William Rufus Putnam, a son of Gen. Rufus Putnam. He cultivated the land now owned by Marietta College. He was a member of the first Constitutional Convention, and afterward repeatedly honored by his fellow citizens in being elected to places of trust. He died in the year 1854, leaving an only son to inherit his possessions. This son, William Rufus Putnam, after receiving a liberal education, settled down upon the home farm and by a life of quiet, good behavior gained the confidence of his fellow citizens, and soon after the breaking out of the War of 1861, was made commander of the post at Marietta with the title of colonel. Whilst he was an ardent and determined supporter of the Union cause, yet he was a lover of peace rather than warfare, and his peace-loving disposition was sometimes amusingly apparent during his career as a military officer.

At the time of Morgan's raid, when it was considered almost certain by the people of Marietta, that Morgan's troops would cross the Muskingum here, Colonel Putnam ordered that a large number of bales of hay should be placed in the bridge to impede their progress. Had Morgan's men ever reached this point they would doubtless have been rejoiced to find an abundant supply of food for their horses in waiting for them, whilst the waters of the Muskingum were then so low that they would have found not the slightest difficulty in crossing anywhere.

The story has been often told of how Col. David H. Moore, then at Athens, started out, mounted upon a fine horse and carrying a handsome gold watch, to fight Morgan's men, and of how he entered in a few days on foot and without his watch. A message was sent him from Marietta over the wires, asking him the time of day, and this response was soon received: "How many bales of hay was it that Colonel Putnam ordered put on the bridge for the use of Morgan's cavalry?"

Upon another occasion, during the war, the people of Parkersburg called upon the people of the surrounding country to aid them in their defense. A number of brave and enthusiastic young men from college here, volunteered their services, but before the party set out, the writer, who was to have charge of the expedition, was called aside by Colonel Putnam, who exacted a solemn promise from him that he would have his boats in readiness so that if the enemy should really come, all the students might be quickly transferred to this side of the river. "For," said he, "their parents would feel dreadfully, and would blame me if anything should happen to them."

Leaving the residence of Colonel Putnam and coming down Main street at the corner of that street and Sacra Via, at an early date was the home of John Newton, a most estimable citizen. Having been successful in the accumulation of property in the Cow Run oil district, he had much leisure in the later years of his life and spent many hours each day in caring for and guarding Mound Cemetery. A few rods below on the same street, in a large frame house still standing, lived Harry Shipman, a most worthy, industrious mechanic, much respected by everybody.

Recollection brings us next in view of the homes of two of the most honored and well known citizens, Col. Ichabod Nye and Gen. Rufus Putnam. A newspaper article would not allow of my writing of their meritorious lives and extended usefulness. Fortunately an abler pen than mine has recorded much of their history. Passing on down Front street, at the corner of Knox street lived Rev. Pardon Cook, who for many years was a traveling minister who preached the Gospel for the Gospel's sake.

Still further down the street, at the lower west corner of Wooster street, was the home of Azariah Pratt, who at a very early date located here, pursuing the following of a gunsmith and locksmith. His son, Elisha Pratt, later occupied the same house and pursued the same business. Both were very worthy men.

Nearby lived George Dunlevy, who was quite a prominent citizen. For several years he was clerk of the court and an active member of society. On the adjoining lot was the home of Judge Joseph Wood, who in the last century moved from Belleville, Virginia, to Marietta and for many years was registrar of the U. S. Land Office. He lived to a great old age, always social and kindly. His home was a favorite resort for old and young alike, and his daughter, Miss Nancy, was in her day quite a belle.

Passing on down the street, in the house now occupied by Mrs. Hickock, lived Benjamin Putnam, an accomplished accountant and cashier of the Bank of Marietta.

In the square just below, in the house now occupied by Judge Follett, lived Gov. R. J. Meigs, of whose life and history much has been written. The dwelling house next below at that period was the home of Col. Ebenezer Sproat. His father-in-law, Commodore Whipple, was an inmate of the household.

In this same dwelling for many years resided Capt. Daniel Greene, a man of very character. His title as captain was won upon the ocean, where he commanded a merchantman for many years. He, like others in the same service, encountered not only the danger of the ocean, but of piratical attack. On one occasion, when near mid-ocean, his vessel was attacked by the crew of a pirate schooner, and while upon deck giving orders for defense, Captain Greene was shot through both cheeks. He bore the marks to the day of his death, and they are plainly discernable in his portrait, which now hangs in the "Relic Room." His fondness for the water was such that in after years he for many seasons commanded steamboats upon the Ohio. In the early days of which we write, there was no dwelling-house upon this street below those named until we reach Butler street. On the right of Main street, immediately south of Butler street, dwelt Dr. John Cotton, a man of rare mental qualities and superior medical education. For years he was the chairman of the Whig Central Committee. At the period of this service, the custom was to send out circulars to different parts of the county, and never once was there a misstatement of facts or an unkind attack upon any opposing candidate or upon the party in opposition. He never sought an office, but was repeatedly honored by his fellow-citizens in being selected to fill positions of responsibility.

On the left-hand side of the street, passing down, we first encountered the dwelling-place of Capt. Thomas Baker, who probably did more keel-boating on the Ohio and Muskingum rivers than any man of his day. Although strictly honest and a man of great industry, he became involved in debt, chiefly to a business firm in Wheeling. To that firm, Knox and McKee, he deeded about fifteen acres of ground. McKee had it laid off in lots, which he sold at a small price and, unless the writer is mistaken, it was added to the city corporation as McKee's addition. This part of the city has latterly been known as Texas.

The next dwelling below on the east side was the home of Jason R. Curtis, a man of various employments and great industry. He was especially prominent during the War of 1812, being upon the staff of Governor Meigs.

The remaining houses on that side of Main street were occupied by John Cunningham, Bailus Phillips, Titus Buck, L. Edgerton, Sr., and John Gibson. On the west side of the same street was the home of Nathaniel Holden. Next below lived Joseph Holden and family, and, if my recollection is correct, there was no other dwelling house until you reached the corner of Main and Ohio streets. On the ground where now stands the Bellevue Hotel was the dwelling of Joseph Lincoln, Esq. Not one of the persons named as inhabiting these dwellings at the time of which we write is now living.

SOME FARTHER RECOLLECTIONS.

Editor of the Register: Chiefly for the relief of my mind nowadays I write, and at times take up subjects, perhaps treating them in an uninteresting way. I shall not be dis-committed if you, after reading them, consign them to the waste-basket as valueless to your columns.

The death of James Holden, as announced in your columns a few days since, has led to a train of thought which but few now living can verify. My recollection of men and their pursuits, in the twenty years succeeding 1828, is most vivid. Even previous to that date I have clear recollections of many things. South of the foot of Front street, over the Ohio River bank, sustained by wooden pillars, was a frame building divided into two store rooms, one occupied by Joseph Holden, the other by Nathaniel Holden. Perhaps it was in the year of 1833 that these gentlemen erected what was then considered a large building, where previously had stood the tavern-house of Shepard McIntosh. For many years the Holdens, in separate rooms of the building, sold merchandise. At a later date, Joseph Holden built a storehouse upon the corner of Front and Greene streets, the building latterly remodeled and now occupied by the First National Bank. At different periods dry goods, groceries and hardware were sold in that building by Joseph Holden, Sr., and for many years business was continued there by the father and his three sons, William, Joseph, and James. The building formerly mentioned as having been built by Joseph and Nathaniel Holden was the brick building owned and occupied of late years by Mr. Best.

As far back as memory goes, Casper Smith and wife sold goods in a building on Ohio street, between Second and Third, where at a later period the business was continued by John Broughy, who married the widow of Casper Smith. It was in the employ of the latter that G. C. Best had his business training, afterward becoming one of the most accurate, honest, and honorable of all Marietta dealers.

In two of the frame buildings on Ohio street, between Second and Front, John Mills sold merchandise. Upon the same street, near the corner of Second, a store was kept for many years by Weston Thomas, who aided much in giving to Marietta business men the reputation for justice and fair dealing. At a later period he was associated with David C. Skinner. They built and occupied as a store-room the large, brick building near the corner of Second and Ohio streets. At a subsequent date, year not remembered, John Mills bought the Lincoln House at the corner of Front and Ohio streets, where now stands the Bellevue Hotel, transformed it into a business house and there sold merchandise, associated successively with Luther Edgerton, Noah L. Wilson, Rufus P. Iams, and others, during a portion of that period, probably doing the largest business on this side of the Muskingum River.

Dudley Woodbridge first commenced mercantile business as early as 1798, in a storehouse long since torn down, standing at the corner of Ohio and Muskingum streets. As early as 1818 he fitted up and occupied as a storeroom the building at "Flat Iron Corner," at different periods doing business under the names, Dudley Woodbridge & Co., D. T. Morgan & Co., Morgan & Woodbridge, Woodbridge & Racer. In the year 1835, the building then occupied was torn down and the building which now stands upon the ground was erected.

William F. Curtis for many years was in the mercantile business, occupying the store-room on Front street. Robert Crawford also sold goods in a storeroom on the Muskingum bank, just below the mouth of Tiber Creek. R. J. Meigs and Henry P. Wilcox were for several years engaged in the sale of merchandise, in a building at the corner of Front and Putnam.

The tavern-keepers of that day were: Samson Cole, Amos R. Harvey, Isaac Miner, John Broughy, Moses McFarland, Alexander Hill and John Lewis.

The carpenters and house-joiners were: John Gibson, William Knox, Stephen Daniels, Richard Robinson, and Thomas Clogston.

Brick masons were: Oren Newton, father of Stephen Newton, Samuel Geren, and Thomas J. Westgate.

Blacksmiths were: Nathaniel Bishop, grandfather of W. G. Way; Count Debonny, J. L. Reckard, father of J. L. Reckard, Jr., Alvin Reckard, and Joseph Glines, grandfather of Charles Glines.

Shoemakers were: Titus Buck, Daniel Nichol, and William Heidrick.

Tanners were: Justus Morse, James Ferguson, T. & G. Vinton, Skinner Ralston & Co.

Tailors were: John Lewis, John Cunningham, and Thomas B. Harsberger.

Lawyers were: David Putnam, John P. Mayberry, William A. Whittlesey, Arius Nye, Melvin Clarke, Davis Green, and C. F. Buell.

Physicians, John Cotton, Samuel P. Hildreth, George O. Hildreth, Shubel Fuller, and Felix Regnier.

These are some of the business and professional men of that early day, though in this hastily written sketch there are undoubtedly many omissions.

MOUND CEMETERY.

Messrs. Editors: Trusting that neither you nor your readers will conclude that we have Mound Cemetery on the brain, we venture once more to write upon that subject.

After spending a full half day in looking over the grounds and reading epitaphs on numerous gravestones, and realizing that there lay buried there at least 5,000 of those who once claimed citizenship among us, and that that number embraced soldiers of all wars, statesmen of all parties, our own fathers and mothers and brothers and sisters, the dear companions of our youth, whose joy could not be complete unless we participated, we felt impelled to further effort to remove any objection in the way of proper care and protection of those graves.

The first difficulty, the apparent lack of interest in many lot-holders, was brushed aside by the large attendance at the meeting of last week, at which a spirit was manifested that promises immediate action on the part of many to do all in their power to give a presentable appearance to that most beautiful spot.

Greatly gratifying was it to everyone who feels interested in this burying place to have it authoritatively announced that there was more than $2,000 in the hands of the Cemetery Trustees, by them to be properly expended. Following this statement came the declaration of one who should know and whose statement is corroborated by a recent examination of the records, that there was nothing in the city ordinances forbidding the use of a necessary portion of said fund for placing in proper condition this most hallowed place.

This in conjunction with the fact that the funds on hand arose entirely from the sale of portions of Oak Grove Cemetery, two-thirds of the money for the purchase of which was paid by those whose graves we now desire to protect.

A reply to one more objection, and we have done. Many have feared that the title by which this property was held was incomplete. To the great pleasure of the writer an examination of the early records of the Ministerial Trustees gives conclusive evidence of the appropriation of this square for burial purposes.

A copy of those proceedings is given below.

THURSDAY, MAY 7, 1841.

The Board met agreeably to adjournment. Present, Messrs. Squire, Towns, and Campbell. Hughland.

Dr. Towns presented a Memorial, to be considered for the use of the town of Marietta, for a public burying ground, for the use of the town of Marietta.

Whereas, it appears from the certificate of the town clerk that the inhabitants of the town of Marietta, in a meeting held on the 11th day of May, 1841, did, by resolution, direct the Town Council of said town to make application to the Trustees of the Ministerial Mile Square in Marietta for a certain parcel of ground, known by the name of "Mound Square," for the use of the town as a public burying ground, and, whereas, said Town Council, viz., Levi Barber, and Joseph Holdin, did make application, this seventh day of May, 1841, agreeably to the resolution:

Now, therefore, be it resolved by the Board that the above named square be reserved to the town of Marietta, for the purpose above mentioned free of rent for the term of ninety-nine years, renewable forever, subject to the contract of said town and laid out in such form and under such regulations as they may think proper, and be it further resolved, that the clerk be, and hereby is, directed to make out to the Town Council of Marietta, for the time being, a certificate of the above resolution under the seal of the corporation.

AMOS C. S. P. HUBBARD, Clerk.

What is left to be done? Let all join hearts and hands and unitedly and with spirit see that the desired work be done. Who are meant by all? The one thousand lot-owners, the Ladies' Improvement Association who deserve credit for being largely instrumental in this prospective work, the Cemetery Trustees, two of whom, viz., William Westgate and George Elston, are honored citizens of Marietta, and Mr. Devine of the west side; the latter the writer does not know so well, but believes that his head and heart are right; in fine, all citizens of Marietta who are proud of their home and the attractive, historic spots about it.

MONUMENT TO MARK THE FIRST LANDING OF THE PIONEERS.

An examination of the early maps of Marietta will show the observer that a small rivulet, passing from the southeastern outskirts of the town in a northwesterly direction, crossed Front street near where Buell's drug-store now stands, and wound its way thence to the Muskingum River, near the foot of Monroe street.

The observer of today will have difficulty in realizing that it was necessary, in early times, to cross this little stream upon a plank causeway in driving down Front street.

The action of the water at the terminus of the stream made quite an excavation in the bank; this impression was quite marked and observable. So much by way of introduction.

In the year 1858, Amos Porter, the then only surviving member of the little band of 48, who arrived at Marietta April 7, 1788, then quite an old man, at the request of the writer, that he would show him the exact spot where the pioneers landed, took him and others to the bank of the Muskingum, and the mouth of the above rivulet, stating that the "May-flower" landed on the lower side of the rivulet, and then he and his companions there disembarked. On the opposite side, the bank being somewhat shelving, stood Indians, with their squaws, and some few soldiers from the fort across the river.

The monument erected by the Historical Society, on Friday last (April 7, 1893), to mark the landing of the pioneers of April 7, 1788, was placed at about this spot.

THE OLD COURT HOUSE.

An obliging, competent friend prepared for me an annotated paper embracing all the laws of the Northwest Territory, and the State of Ohio at an early date, authorizing the imprisonment of debtors.—This paper it was my purpose to use in preparing my article for this week's paper—but to my great annoyance I find that the much valued paper is mislaid and therefore I shall be compelled in as brief a manner as possible to write on this subject.

During the Territorial government any resident, holding a claim against any citizen which he declined to pay, could after obtaining judgment have the debtor imprisoned, the creditor paying all expenses.

At an early date subsequent to the enactment of the first territorial law allowing imprisonment for debt, jail bounds were established and the debtor was allowed under certain conditions in the daytime to roam within the fixed bounds. After a time the law extended to all the hours of the day or night. As remembered, the conditions were that the debtor was to give an approved bond, signed by two good and sufficient securities, that he would not pass out of the bounds; if he violated this agreement, his bondsmen were held for the debt.

At an early date the Court of Quarter Sessions was authorized to appoint a committee to lay off the prison bounds for Washington County. In accordance with such an appointment the following paper was presented to the court, after which, it will be observed, the lines were run by surveyors, and report made:

We, the subscribers, appointed by the Court of General Q. Sessions to lay out the Prison Bounds, report that they are contained within the following bounds, viz.:

Beginning at the Northwesterly corner of Square No. 52, across Putnam street, to the corner of City Square No. 48, thence a direct line Northwesterly to a stake on the Westerly side of Second street, 144 yards from the Southeast corner of City Square No. 43, thence a direct line across Second street, to stake, thence on a direct line across to a post, at the Southwesterly corner of City Square 43, thence across Putnam street, to the Northwesterly corner of City Square 50, thence in a direct line to a stake, on the Easterly side of Second street, 177 yards from the Southwesterly corner of the jail, thence across Third street, to a stake, thence a direct line to the Northwest corner of Square 52, the place of beginning.

We beg leave further to report that on our first visit there ought to be monuments at the corners, and sufficient monuments at the corners, and to deliver an accurate plan of the same to the Clerk of the Session.

J. PIERCE,
ROBT. OLIVER,
GRIFFIN GREENE,

It may be observed that the ground enclosed was nearly square. These lines enclosed not a building or dwelling of any kind, except the old Court House and Jail, which was situated near the center. To the east and south was a sugar tree camp; to the north and west were cultivated fields.

It will take but a segment of an hour to trace these lines: Commence then at the City Hall and go southwesterly about 500 feet to Second street, then southwest about 500 feet to the junction of Front and Putnam streets, thence northeast about 500 feet to the junction of Second and Butler streets, thence a distance of about 500 feet in a northwesterly direction to the place of beginning.

I have an indistinct recollection of the confinement within these lines of one debtor, whose home was in Wood County, Virginia. Another case I speak of with some hesitation, especially as to give it point I must name the parties—both of whom I highly esteemed and knew they were valued citizens. But as the parties themselves are long since dead, and their families either far removed, or with the silent majority, I will proceed:

Col. Augustus Stone, a pioneer merchant of very extensive trade, had sold to William Talbot, a maker of hats in Marietta, a bill of goods, payable in wool hats and ginseng. The time of payment having long been past and no attention paid to letters asking settlement, Colonel Stone obtained judgment before a magistrate. Mr. Talbot was arrested and sent to jail. It is very doubtful whether he was locked up, as the jailor and constable liked him. A bond was signed and he was entitled to jail bounds. Mr. Talbot was an honest, good natured, stubborn man. Three weeks of his confinement followed, his wife many days bringing up his dinner to him, and when the weather was pleasant they would sit on a log down Second street and eat together, then, she, employed with her knitting and by reading, would while away the hours. The last three days of his confinement she was absent at her old home on Duck Creek.

For some reason or other the Colonel relented, and Mr. Talbot went to his home. The first evening of his freedom, he said to his wife,—“We must plan in some way to pay Colonel Stone; it is an honest debt, and if possible must be paid.” After listening to his plans and rather enjoying his vexation, she said: “See here, old fellow, haven’t I often told you I was the best manager. Whilst you were away I employed a journeyman who wanted work. In the other room are a dozen or more wool hats of all sizes, and you know the three days Clum and I were at the old place, we dug sang and brought home a great lot. It was easy work, I can tell you; there was sang enough there back of the old farm to fill all the pipes in Germany. Now if you say so, we will go over tomorrow and pay this debt off.” His heart was full and he thanked God for such a helpmate.

The morrow came and so did the couple go to Colonel Stone’s store, and now I will let him tell the rest: “I was a little scared when I saw the woman, she was a Broome, and I had always heard they were smart. The amount of the account was asked for, then came the hats and the ginseng, not only for the account with interest but the board bill. I was never so whipped in my life. I tried to talk and explain.”

Months passed on, the making of hats, hereabouts became unprofitable. Honest Talbot quit the business and bought a yoke of oxen and did general hauling. He had no better employer than Colonel Stone, who gave him all the work he could, and furnished him gratis with ferry tickets that he should have an extended range.

In the year 1838, this odious act was repealed.

We have had much to say of the Old Court House and in our next will say something of the New Court House, built only seventy years ago.

CORN HUSKING TIMES.

Playing, Feasting, and the Labor of the River.

Having written much of early times, I feel inclined to come to a later period, and speak of some of the happy events of boyhood life.

Having spent the summer of 1823 in the hospitable home of William Dana, Esq., of Newport, in my rambles during that summer many hours were spent under the shade of his beautiful sugar tree camp, and, by invitation, spent part of the succeeding February at the same hospitable home. It was sugar-making time and all the girls and boys for miles around assembled in the camp, where the trees were bored, the sap collected in troughs and then conveyed to kettles, some boiled down to sugar and the rest to molasses. It must not be understood that the young folks did all this work, but they enjoyed many happy hours in aiding others. This was continued for days and nights, and we would spell one another for sleep and meals. During that season there were made 500 pounds of sugar, and many gallons of molasses. Work and amusements were continued through the night season, and the boys went home with the girls in the morning.

An acquaintance then commenced, it gives me great pleasure to say, has ever been continued, having always been happy and proud to claim as acquaintances and friends the Danas, Greenwoods, Battelles, Greens Barkers, Bosworths, Littles, Reas, Aaron Edgell, Dr. McIlhenny, Ezra O'Neil, and others too numerous to mention. I must not fail to say here that the girls of that day, in after years grown to womanhood, became eminent and useful as the wives and mothers of prominent men. For instance, Miss Dana, who married Thomas W. Ewart, Esq., they are the parents of Thomas Ewart of this city, and William Ewart of Chicago, the world known discoverer and patentee of the Endless Ewart Chain. Miss Phoebe Battelle, in early life a successful teacher in the Marietta schools, married Rev. Mr. Browning, making their home in St. Louis, Missouri, and exercising for more than a century an almost magnetic influence for good throughout the State. Another of this set, as brilliant and beautiful as any of her companions, chose the fortunes of a Methodist minister's wife, marrying Rev. Israel Archbold, numbering among their children John D. Archbold, the accomplished and successful vice-president of that mammoth concern, the Standard Oil Company.

But enough of the sugar camp and the companions of those days. Others have written their accounts of corn huskings, and the doings of assembled neighbors on such occasions, but I shall venture briefly to give my own recollections of one of these once popular assemblages.

In the early spring of 1826, as well as I can recollect, the young people of Marietta were promised that after the growing crop of that year was gathered, they should be of the number invited to a corn husking on the farm of Mr. Devol, residing up the Muskingum River about four miles from town. I must not allow this opportunity to pass without saying that in the far back years, as well as at the present time, the Devols have been distinguished for their generous hospitality and kindly entertainments, especially to young people.

The growing corn was watched as it approached maturity, its cutting up and being placed in shocks. In fine, every stage of advancement to the earnestly looked for period was marked with interest.

An evening about the middle of November, when the moon was full and the weather auspicious, was announced for the gathering.

Soon after the schools closed in the afternoon of that day, the young folks of Marietta and Harmar, began to gather by appointment, at what was then known as "Post Office Corner." The girls with their baskets of provisions, and the young men, dressed for the occasion, were there assembled, when two farm wagons, strewn with straw, were soon filled by the eager waiters, leaving at least one half of the crowd unprovided with any conveyance. As the distance was short, an agreement was soon reached that the old fashion of travel should be adopted, ride and tie; this by some was understood, the wagons drove on, and the walkers, girls and boys, which constituted the larger number, followed, meeting with no detention, and only halting for a few minutes' conversation with Deacon William Putnam, who, knowing some of us, inquired where we were bound? Told that we were going to a corn husking, he replied, in a cute and kindly way, "I feel sorry for the corn." His son, William, and Abner Guiteau joined us there. After this slight detention, we all eagerly listened to the recital of John Hill, who was of our number, who told us that during the Indian war, on the ridge immediately to our right, was killed and scalped a famous, faithful scout by the name of Rogers. The hearing this tale, the recital of which quickened our steps, soon brought us to the mouth of Mill Creek. It was about here that those, who were acquainted with what ride and tie meant, began to look for the farm wagons, but so much did the parties in possession of the wagons enjoy the ride that they did not suggest to tie till they arrived at the Devol farm. On our arrival some of the kind-hearted ones of those who had rode promised that we should ride back, but such was not the arrangements of the wagoners.

All things were in readiness when we reached the appointed spot; the neighbors for miles around being gathered together. The corn in husks was placed in heaps of about 250 bushels each, the captains, Lu Putnam and Bill Devol, afterward known as Maj. Louis Putnam, and Judge William Devol.

Soon was our party divided, and added to the already two lists for the promised contest. Before commencing the evening's work, a few moments were allowed us for looking about. Under an extended bower were placed the provided eatables, consisting of all the good things of those days. I remember among them baskets or doughnuts, hundreds of pumpkin pies, and in one corner an immense heap of beautiful apples, and a barrel of cider on top; the hill-tops seemed to be all ablaze with brush fires lighted for the occasion.

Corn husking soon began and a busier set of workers I never saw. Some green ones, such as I, who had never husked an ear of corn before, knew not at which end to begin. The piles of the corn grew smaller, and so did the wee hours of the night, before it was apparent which side would win. But as all things must have an end, so did this frolic, and Captain Devol's company was declared the victor. After a few songs came the entertainment which was the best of all. For the first time in my life I had all the doughnuts I wished to eat. After this eating and drinking, an hour was spent in listening to interesting recitals of Revolutionary times by old father Devol, and Indian stories by old Solomon Dickey and others.

After all this, Jack Brough, one of our town boys, who belonged to the beaten side of huskers, challenged the other side to a game of foot ball, in order that the sport should continue. The challenge was accepted, upon condition that suitable ground should be found, and a ball should be forthcoming; Brough, always on the lookout for this kind of sport, suggested a neighboring pasture field, and from his pocket drew a leather covering, in which was a bladder, soon blown to its full and tied at the neck. His captain allowed him to conduct this game. Soon were the parties arranged for the contest, Brough and his competitors in the center of the field to commence the game. No sooner was high buck and low down pronounced, than Brough being successful in securing the ball, kicked it as if aiming at the moon, over the heads of his opponents, and making his way through their ranks, bore the ball to the goal without the aid of one of his forces. Amazement seized all and general acclaim followed the great surprise. Nothing but Brough's avoirdupois (his weight then being near 200) prevented his being seized and borne on the shoulders of the victorious party. Music and dancing on the lawn wound up the night's adventures, and we all made our way to our homes by the light of the moon.

A HUNT IN 1832.

It was early in the morning of a pleasant October day in 1832 that a party of us boys, six or more in number, assembled at the old "Post Office Corner" to place in a rickety old wagon articles supposed to be necessary for two days' camping, fishing, and hunting on the hill tops, woods, and water streams of the center part of the northerly township of this county. I will name a portion of the articles thus gathered: Bedding, guns of all kinds then in use, skillets, bake-pans, ovens, butcher-knives, coffee-boilers, tin cups, bacon, ham, coffee, a bag each of flour and corn-meal, a small vial of laudanum, besides an antidote for snake-bites.

"To ride and tie" was the order of the day. Some of the more experienced ones of our party understood the meaning of this arrangements, and chose first to ride, leaving at least half of the party to do the walking. As was not unusual in those days, the party who first rode made the distance over the quite long hills and crossed the creek at White's Mill before tying; those on foot, coming to the streams were boated over by a neighboring farmer at the small cost of a cent each; the party making the second drive continued on the road, soon coming up with their companions, near what is now Caywood's station, our objective point being the clearing at Esquire Dye's. We were quite willing to give the reins to one of the party who had once before been over the road. Our arrival was anticipated by the 'Squire and his good wife, and we soon sat down to a table loaded with the luxuries of Lawrence township. A lamb had been killed and was served up in various forms; sweet and Irish potatoes, cabbage, and turnips, succeeded by pumpkin and peach pie, delicious pears, and peaches, and apples with cider just from the press made our entertainment. Nothing but the fact that we had for months talked about a hunt and camping out was inducement strong enough to take us from this hospitable home. Here our party was joined by two of the sons of the old 'Squire, and a number of other neighboring youngsters, who, bringing their dogs with them, made, with the hounds we had brought from town, our hunting equipment complete.

Advised by those who knew the country best, we determined to camp on what is now called "Potato Knob," which is the highest point of land in Washington County. To reach this point with our wagon required almost the cutting of a new road-way; fortunately, we found the bed of Bear Creek much of the way bare, which allowed us many times to take the bed of the creek as our road-way, and we were all quite willing that the foremost of those in the outset who proposed riding and tying should drive. This high point of land reached, and our stores safely packed away, after preparing our evening meal, our arrangements were made for the night hunt. It was said that bear and wolves and foxes inhabited the surrounding woods, which extended many miles in either direction, with only here and there a habitation on the lowland.

Our 56-pounder (which was a scale weight, having a hole drilled in it about eight inches in depth and one inch in diameter with a small hole drilled upon the top, near the butt, in which to place priming) was put in position on the brow of the hill, and loaded with blank shot; the purpose of this was that an early hour in the morning the firing should give notice to all the hunters the direction of the camp.

Soon after dark the dogs commenced their work, and not very long was it before their baying told that they were on the track of game; all night long this racing was continued and when the signal gun of the morning was fired, one by one, our party, tired and warm, and yet excited, returned to camp. Some had undoubtedly been on the waters of Archer's Fork; some on Cow Run; and others on the Little Muskingum. Our breakfast, served on a fallen log, consisted of a tin-cup each of strong, hot coffee, a slice of baker's bread, and some ham broiled on the embers of a hickory fire, was enlivened by the spirited accounts of each one, in detail speaking of his night's adventures. After these experiences were related, in a council held with our comrades, who were conversant with the territory, the conclusion was reached to partly retrace our steps, cross the Little Muskingum, making our way up to the mouth of Rocky Fork, a tributary of Fifteen Mile Creek. After reloading our wagon, and by vote selecting the driver—one who knew the country best—others were assigned to different duties for the day, such as hunting, fishing, and cooking. Before night, the signal gun brought us all into the new camp; after the enjoyment of a hearty meal, prepared by our cook and his assistants, the luxuries of which were fish from the mountain stream, squirrel and pheasants from the forests, and a cup each of fresh-made cider, from the press of our old friend, which one of our successful hunters had secured in his round for the day.

Our first movement after night-fall was to the near-by burning spring, very near to which in earlier days a company residing in Marietta had bored two wells, attempting to find salt water. (The date of this transaction was settled to the satisfaction of the writer in an interview with an old lady, the daughter of the contractor; an account of this interview will be given in the future, we here only stating that the attempt to get salt at this point was made in 1816.)

Leaving our burning spring camp, the whole party, with the dogs in the rear, made our way southward to the hill-top, between the waters of Fifteen Mile Creek and Moss Run.

From that high point we started our dogs, and we all, unsportsmanlike, scattered, each one to continue his night's adventures; caverns were explored; buffalo beats were examined; bear wallows were, by many of us, for the first time visited. The night, being bright moonlight, allowed careful investigation of all these spots. Being nearby the most experienced hunter of the crowd, the writer followed his footsteps, and soon found himself on a high point of land, from which could be witnessed the doings of the dogs and their game; this was exciting beyond all description.

As it neared daylight, our party were all called into camp and notified by our leader that the dogs were gathered near the mouth of a cavern, and the indications were that in that cavern would either be found a wolf or a bear, with her young. Around this spot we soon collected; finding here, as reported, all the hunting dogs, evidently much excited; very soon it would have been difficult to determine whether the hunters or dogs were more excited. It seemed pretty certain that a wild beast of some magnitude and fierceness was in the cavern. A council was held, and it was determined that the only way to accomplish the death of the animal would be by the crawling of one of the party into the cave; the question then was, who should attempt this supposed hazardous undertaking; we were not long in determining that point as one of our number bore the name of "the Celebrated Wolf Hunter of the Spelling Book."

Finding that the lot had fallen upon him, our hero soon prepared himself for the adventure; he tightened his belt, picked the flint of his gun, tied a long rope about his body, and had a few words of undertone conversation with his nearest friends; the clear understanding with those surrounding the entrance was that a certain movement of the rope should be the signal for drawing out the adventurer; scarcely had he disappeared from sight before the signal was violently given, and he was hastily drawn to the entrance; soon as he could control his voice, "Goshens," he exclaimed, "but she gave me a snorter." He had hardly got through with his words before there appeared from the same opening an animal about the size of a cat, who evidently resented the intrusion, and left with us all positive evidence of her presence and displeasure. We all breakfasted together; there was no use to divide, for all had been besprinkled with the same pungent odor. We broke camp and made for our homes, where each buried his garments until the kindly earth cleansed them of the offensive smell. We were descendants of Putnam, the old hunter of Pomfret; but after that misadventure were quite modest in laying claim to the honor.

THE PAST.

In the months just passed how sorrowful have been Death's doings among our dear friends and life-long associates! They have not only gone from our sight, but they have carried with them much knowledge of the past. Who is left to treat upon the themes and relate the incidents of events with accuracy, upon which they discoursed with familiarity? Alas, they are forever gone, and bore with them to the grave knowledge, of which we will now all be forever ignorant.

I have in mind many of whom I would write—they each deserve a chapter. I can but name them, as the chief object of this article is to forcibly set forth the danger of delay in rescuing what is left. Today I beg you, commence to put on paper what the old folks say of the past. Don't delay. They soon will have joined the majority who have left us.

We first name William D. Emerson, for 70 years a student, a lawyer by profession, most thoroughly acquainted with the history of our early lawyers and statesmen. Who that now lives has such knowledge?

Harlow Chapin, who had a thorough knowledge of our early Muskingum improvements. From whom now can such information be gained?

Racer, Edgerton, Putnam,—three of our old-time merchants. Who is left that can tell us of the business doings, hereabouts, from 1815 to 1840?

Henry Armstrong, the cattle buyer and butcher of long years ago. Now that he is gone, who can tell us of the cattle dealers and stock raisers of early years?

Rufus E. Hart—well posted was he in the bar and the bench, in this locality, for the last 50 years. Who that lives can communicate to us such knowledge now?

Jonathan Dye, like his father, was big-hearted and generous. It was said of the latter, while he was magistrate in Lawrence township, that he sold his favorite cow to meet the obligation of a debtor against whom there was a judgment on his docket in favor of an urgent creditor.

Jonathan Dye lived among us for 70 years, an observing man, and died, last year, possessed of much knowledge of men and things.

Dr. Seth Hart, of Harnar, that good old man whom everybody loved, had knowledge of the practice and success of all of his profession, for near a hundred years, hereabouts.

Who can tell us this history now?

Dr. Addy, an example of Christian character, most thoroughly posted in the history of his church, from the beginning until now, in the Northwest.

George Irish, identified with our business interests for many years; in later years a most extensive dealer in timber, under whose commands the giant forest trees have fallen; the best authority on timber and its growth.

Harvey Latin, the wheelhorse of the Democracy of the west side, of long ago, the contemporary of Brough, Joline, Flood, Wood, Humphreys, Skinner, Dickey and Ross. He died the other day. Who lives now to tell us of the doings and sayings of his party in olden times?

William H. Buell, the business man of broad ideas, grandson of Gen. Joseph Buell, had given much thought and study to the early history of the Northwest. To whom was this knowledge imparted?

Rufus P. Iams, recently reported as among the departed, was for long years a resident of this place. When quite young, he became a clerk for John Mills, and was for many years identified in his mercantile business, a portion of the time as partner. In very early life he attached himself to the Methodist Church. As teacher and superintendent he made himself very useful in the Sabbath-school. As a member of the official board, he was much loved and respected by his associates, made up of such men as Whitney, Crawford, Daniels, Hall, Protsman, Jennings and others. He dies far away from his old home and associates. No doubt a suitable stone will mark his grave. But better than on granite or glass tablets his record is on high. How very much it would interest the Methodist of the future to know what he has left unwritten.

But whilst I linger at the graves of these, my friends, I remember that woman, that was last at the cross and earliest at the grave, has been stricken by the shafts of death as well.

In Oak Grove Cemetery the upturned sod tells me that here lies Mrs. Abigail Hook, the wife of John Hook, Esq., and daughter of Mr. and Mrs. Joseph Kelly. At this home she was taught the ways of righteousness, and in early life learned to know the dear friends of her mother, Mrs. Curtis, Mrs. Whitney, Mrs. Crawford, the Methodist ministers and their wives and families. Mrs. Hook lived to be near 80 years of age; with a retentive memory, much did she know. But where is the record?

A few days since, beneath a spreading hemlock, in the Union township cemetery, there was laid to rest one aged and much beloved, Mrs. Helen Putnam Devol. In life an honor to both surnames. She knew very much of the past history of the Muskingum Valley. And it was her pleasure oftentimes to entertain her relatives and visitors with accounts of the earlier days of this region. Her's was a happy old age, and every hour she was imparting pleasing instruction to her children and grandchildren and scores of acquaintances who enjoyed being in her presence. But is there any record left of this long life of acquired knowledge?

But hark! What is that I hear? It is the slow tramp of the funeral procession, as they bear to the grave the remains of one who long years ago was a resident here. Mrs. Smith, who died on the last of the 14th day of this month, and at her request is buried in Oak Grove Cemetery, by the side of her husband, the former president of Marietta College, eloquent and learned. Mrs. Smith and her husband were attendants at the Congregational Church of this city, in the years when Deacon William R. Putnam, Deacon John Cotton, Deacon Anselm T. Nye, Dudley Woodbridge, Samuel Shipman, Daniel B. Bosworth were prominent. If she has left a record of those days it will but aid the present pastor in his untiring work of compiling a history of his church.

Reader, don't delay, but grasp the pen, and today commence to place upon paper what the old people say of the past.

THE FIRST SUNDAY SCHOOL.

Marietta, June 2, 1891.

My Father—As there probably will be considerable interest among the Sunday-school delegates assembled here this week from all parts of Ohio, in regard to Mrs. Nancy Frost, who was a member of the first Sunday-school ever held in the Northwest, I send you herewith an article written some time since, after a personal interview with her of several hours.

The statements therein made are interesting, containing the recollections of a person then over 100 years of age, and at this date, possessing most of her faculties unimpaired, although 106 years of age.

GEORGE M. WOODBRIDGE.

A GENUINE PIONEER.

117 Years Old—Hundred Years Old.

The most remarkable woman, in many respects, in the State of Ohio, is Mrs. Nancy Allison Frost, who lives a dozen miles from Marietta, upon the banks of the Muskingum River.

Mrs. Frost is remarkable on account of her age, having completed her first century several months ago. She is especially interesting, however, for the reason that her memory is something extraordinary, and that she has such an immense collection of facts connected with the early history of Ohio stored away in her recollection. It seems almost past belief that one can talk with a person who was born only one year after the Revolution was over, who was three years of age at the time the celebrated ordinance of 1787 was passed, five years old when our Constitution went into effect, and 15 years old at the time of the death of Washington.

Nancy Allison was born in Fayette County, Pennsylvania, October 22, 1784. She, with her father and his family, moved to Marietta in the fall of 1789, the year after the first settlement of Ohio at that point, and consequently she has been a dweller within the boundaries of the State almost from its beginning. Two years after the arrival of the family, the terrible Indian war—1791-1795—broke out, and these fearful years of anxiety and peril were passed by the residents of Marietta in the two forts they had built for their protection. The Allisons lived during this time in the celebrated Campus Martius. Of all those early pioneers who suffered and hoped together during those tedious years, Nancy Allison Frost is the last survivor, and it is thought that she is the only living person in Ohio who has any personal recollection of the Indian war. She remembers distinctly the consternation of the garrison upon the arrival of the news of the massacre of 14 persons at Big Bottom. Court was in session at Marietta at the time, and the feelings of the husbands and fathers, who had left unprotected wives and children in their little defenseless cabins, cannot be described.

Mrs. Frost speaks familiarly of Gen. Rufus Putnam and Maj. Anselm Tupper, the leaders of the 48 pioneers who made the great State of Ohio a possibility, and she saw them every day of those long years of incarceration in the fort. She speaks with special interest of Maj. Anselm Tupper, afterward commander of the garrison, but at this time the teacher for at least three years in the Campus Martius, and the first person to show the young idea how to shoot in the Northwest Territory. She talks in saddened tones, even yet, when she tells of the death of a little schoolmate, and how Major Tupper had helped herself and three other little girls pass long handkerchiefs under the box which contained their little playmate, and carry her, themselves, to the grave, followed by all the sorrowing inmates of the garrison.

She remembers well Arthur St. Clair, first governor of the Northwest Territory, and his beautiful daughter, Louisa, who at the time was 18 years' old, and the belle of the garrison. Full of health and animal spirits, ready to enjoy anything, a fine horseback rider, a beautiful skater, an excellent markswoman, is it any wonder that half the young men in the garrison were madly in love with the brilliant girl, who seemed formed for the life she led?

Mrs. Frost remembered Mr. and Mrs. Isaac Williams, and their pretty daughter, Drusilla, well. My readers may not recollect that this family, as early as 1786, were living in (West) Virginia immediately opposite Marietta. Nothing could exceed their kindness, Mrs. Frost said, to the Marietta pioneers. Isaac Williams, in "the starving year" of 1790, had a good crop of corn, for which he refused the offer, made by a speculator, of $2 a bushel, that he might sell it, at 50 cents a bushel, to each family, as they had need of it, as long as it lasted. After this was gone, though, the people had a weary time for months, some of them having to eat even nettle-tops, and the weed known as pigeon berry. Mrs. Williams showed her kind heart by the salves and lotions she made for the weary, bruised pioneers, and by the readiness with which she nursed the sick, and put in place the broken limbs of unfortunate woodsmen.

Mrs. Frost attended what was probably the first Sunday-school taught in the Northwest Territory. Mrs. Mary Lake, a most estimable, benevolent woman, was the instructor, and gathered every Sunday afternoon, 15 to 20 young people in her room at the garrison. Here she taught them the Westminster Catechism, the Apostles' Creed, the Lord's Prayer, and told her little listeners about John Rodgers and many a winning story about the Bible. Their accommodations were the simplest imaguable,—a chair, even, being quite a rarity in the Campus Martius, but Mrs. Frost doubts whether, with all the organs, and lesson leaves, and libraries and Christmas trees of the present day, there are more interesting schools now than this primitive one taught by good Mrs. Lake.

Mrs. Frost laughed as she told of a little playmate named Maria Green, who was the happy possessor of the only doll in the garrison. Mrs. Frost described this much-envied treasure as minutely as if she had seen it only yesterday, whereas 90 years have flown since she left the Campus Martius. In 1795 her family moved up on the Muskingum, almost opposite where the village of Lowell now stands. Five years after, when 16 years old, Nancy Allison married Stephen Frost, who lived upon the farm adjoining her father's, and this spot has been her home almost ever since.

In the course of nature one would think that Mrs. Frost's course must be nearly run, but her activity, both physical and mental, is something astonishing. To see a woman 100 years old shovel up and carry in a bucket of coal with entire ease to herself is certainly wonderful. She sews and reads with ease, and makes most of her clothing, her dresses included. She showed the writer, with great pride, the pretty white curtains at her bedroom windows, which she had made herself. She uses no spectacles, but has been enjoying her second sight for some years.

Mrs. Frost's only infirmity seems to be a slight deafness, but it is scarcely of enough consequence to be mentioned, as she hears readily all conversation directed to herself.

Upon the occasion of her 100th birthday she rode eight or ten miles to the house of a relative, and did not seem very much fatigued by the trip.

It is really beautiful to observe the relations existing between herself and her grandson's family, with whom she lives. Mrs. Frost told me of the loving, tender care with which the whole household treated her, and the family in her absence spoke of her with the utmost freedom. Religion, however, is the great abiding comfort of this remarkable woman and she told me that while she was willing to stay her allotted time on earth, she was ready whenever the summons came to go. As her grandfather Allison lived to the age of 104, Mrs. Frost may still have years of usefulness before her.

DEFENSE OF THE PIONEERS AND THEIR SUCCESSORS.

For years and down to the present, the writer has heard many things derogatory to the pioneers and their successors. At once to give the reader to understand what it means by this article, below will be found a sample of the innuendoes of an old and a later date. McMaster, in a recent work entitled "McMaster's History of the United States," Vol. 1, page 145, in speaking of the early comers here, says:

"Wheeling was a place of fifty log and frame houses, boasted of a stockade, and, in troubled times, of a garrison of one hundred and fifty troops.

"Below it, near the Muskingum, was Marietta. In the official language of the time it was described as being in the territory of the United States northwest of the river Ohio. But the phrase was too long for the boatmen and settlers, and as they expressed it, Marietta was on the Indian side of the Ohio. Two hundred wooden houses of boat planks, or of logs, made up the town.

"The inhabitants were lazy and given to drink, cultivated little land, and lived chiefly on venison, wild turkeys, and bread made of Indian corn. Food, therefore was scarce and dear; and it was always that the owner of a few bushels of 'red potatoes' or a half dozen barrels of flour could be induced to part with one even for money. Many a flat-boatman, who stopped at the place to buy food, went away disappointed."

We will now carefully examine Mr. McMaster's statements and his authority for them. The reader will keep in mind that this author says "The inhabitants were lazy and given to drink, cultivated little land, and lived chiefly on venison, wild turkeys, and bread made of Indian corn. Food was therefore scarce and dear; nor was it always that the owner of a few bushels of 'red potatoes' or a half dozen barrels of flour could be induced to part with one even for money. Many a flat-boatman who stopped at the place to buy food went away disappointed."

The inhabitants of Marietta had barely closed their trials and anxieties with the small-pox, when they were assailed by a more obstinate and unrelenting, if not more dangerous, enemy. It was a trial in which all, whether rich or poor, were more or less involved and that was a scarcity of wholesome food. It was as late as the fore part of June, 1789, before the inhabitants had finished fencing and planting the great corn-field on the plain. The increased number of horses and oxen had made it necessary to enclose the field with a fence, while the year before it had been without one. A brush fence from the Muskingum to Duck Creek, had afforded a sufficient range for the stock then in the country. A frost on the first of October had seared the corn, when it was not fairly out of that soft and succulent state, called the milk. It was gathered and put away, and supposed by many that when fairly dried it would make good bread, but when tried, it almost invariably produced sickness and vomiting; even the domestic animals could not eat it with safety. The effect was similar to that of a fungus grain, or "sick wheat," as it is generally called. Eatable corn rose from 50 cents to $1.50 and $2 a bushel; the poorest was $1.

By the middle of May, the scarcity was felt generally; there were but few cows in the country to afford milk; no oxen or cattle to spare for meat, and but very few hogs. The woods, which were full of game in 1788, were now nearly as bare of it as an old settled country—the Indians having killed or driven away nearly all the deer within 20 miles of Marietta. In the great scarcity it was wonderful how little there was of selfishness, and how generally kindness and good-feeling abounded; those who had more resources, lent or gave to those who had less, using at the same time the strictest economy themselves, that they might be more able to do so; occasionally a turkey or a piece of bear-meat was procured from the hunters which was put into the kettle and boiled up with hominy or coarse meal; those who had cows divided the milk with their neighbors, especially where there were children: sugar or molasses they had little of, as they had no kettles to boil the sap of the maple which grew in great abundance on the rich lands, and would have afforded a valuable source of nourishment in the general scarcity. The river furnished a tolerable supply of fish, and aided much in preventing starvation, especially in very poor families. Nettle-tops, and the tender shoots of pigeon berry (Phytolacca decandra) as soon as they appeared were gathered up and boiled with a little flour or meal and salt and eaten by many persons; potato tops were eaten in the same way. Salt was scarce, and sold in small parcels for 50 cents a quart. Spice bush and sassafras afforded an elementary drink in the place of tea and coffee.

The Ohio Company, with a liberality worthy of all praise, assisted many poor families with small loans of money, or the suffering would have been much greater. With this they could occasionally get provisions from boats descending the Ohio. Thus they struggled along until the young beans and early squashes appeared, when green corn and potatoes, which was considered a perfect relief, and finally the ripened corn, with a little wheat, ground in hand-mills, furnished bread that was thought a luxury. The matrons of the colony, in a little sober chitchat over a cup of spice-wood tea, without any sugar and very little milk, concluded if they lived ever to enjoy a supply of wholesome food for their children and selves, they would never complain of their fare be it ever so humble.

The reader will not wonder that food was scarce as claimed by the above writer, when he reads of the destitution of former years.

From the commencement of the settlement, the Sabbath was observed as a day of rest, and from, and after, 1789, regular religious services were kept up in the Northwest Block-house at the Campus Martius. After the war commenced, and large block-houses were built in the garrison at "The Point," religious worship was held there part of the time: Rev. Daniel Story officiated as clergyman. The law regulating the militia required a muster of the troops every Sabbath day at 10 o'clock a. m., when they were paraded by the beat of the drum, the roll-call, and their arms inspected, after which a procession was formed, headed by Colonel Sproat, with his drawn sword, the civil officers and the clergyman, with fife and drum, marched to the hall for divine service. All the New Englanders being versed in psalmody, there was no lack of good singing to aid in the solemnities of the day. On these occasions, nearly all of the population attended. The arms of the soldiers were setting by their side, or kept near them during the service, ready for use if need.

The latter part of September, on a Sabbath morning, Peter Neiswanger, one of the rangers, went up to visit a field of corn and potatoes he had cultivated on the east side of Duck Creek, near the mouth. He had some fat hogs in a pen, one of which he found killed, and a portion of the meat cut out and carried off. Several hills of potatoes had been dug, and in the loose earth he discovered fresh moccasin tracks, a proof that Indians had been there and done the mischief. He hurried back to the garrison at "the Point" and gave the alarm. It was in the midst of the forenoon service, when the inhabitants were generally assembled in the large block-house, listening to the sermon. The instant the word was heard "Indians in the vicinity," the drummer seized his drum, and rushing out at the door beat the long roll as the well-known signal for every man to hasten to his post. The place of worship, so quiet and calm a few moments before, was filled with confusion and alarm. The women caught up their little children, and hastened to their homes, and the place of prayer was abandoned for that day. Anxiety and fear for the fate of their brothers and husbands who had gone in pursuit of the dreaded Indians banished all holy thoughts, but the silent prayers for their safe return. A party was soon mustered, made up of five or six of the rangers, 10 volunteer citizens, and 12 United States soldiers from the company stationed at "the Point." The men went up in canoes to the mouth of Duck Creek, where they left their water craft. The more experienced rangers soon fell upon the trail, which they traced across the wide bottom to the Little Muskingum. At a point about half a mile below where Corner's Mill now stands, the Indians forded the creek.

In the above, the reader will see that from the difficulties and dangers of cultivating crops, that the scarcity of potatoes is easily accounted for as referred to by our quondam traveler. McMaster's authority for these declarations as he himself acknowledges, is based upon the statement found in the hurriedly written journal of two illiterate and irresponsible traveler, who touched the shores of Marietta during or soon after the Indian war. Their statements I give you as follows:

"Friday, November 6th, 1795. Nothing material occurred this day, except shooting eight or ten wild turkeys, killed by the boat's crew. There are still many fine tracts of land on both sides of the Ohio, between Wheeling and Marietta, where we arrived on Saturday at 12 o'clock. This town is situated on the Great Muskingum River, near 200 miles below Pittsburgh. It contains about two hundred wooden houses, and commands a delightful view up and down and across the Ohio. Here also is a stockade-garrison, where soldiers are kept to protect the inhabitants from the incursions of the Indians, who are very troublesome during the war, and stole a great number of horses from the settlers, which is the only reason why this town is not near so large as it otherwise would have been, as the land all about, and for a considerable distance is level and very rich. We could get no supply of provisions here, except a bushel of red potatoes, which a poor, starved-looking Frenchman spared us for eighteen pence sterling, which is very surprising and betrays an inscrutable indolence in the settlers, who chiefly live upon venison, wild turkeys, and bread made of Indian corn.

"November 7th. After quitting Marietta at 1 p. m. yesterday, we proceeded on to Belpre."

The reader of the above statement will notice that the writer was one short hour in Marietta—a stranger, and obtaining information from strangers, and recording his conclusions from what he heard in the grog-shop of Frenchman Thierry, which stood near the bank of the river. Also, not long ago, appeared in print, the following:

"The proverbial old fogies have been taking themselves to a better land quite rapidly in the last few years, and with their departure the city has fallen into the hands of modern hustlers who are giving Marietta new life and new tone."

These statements, and such as these in print and otherwise, have been so long allowed to go uncontradicted or unexplained, that the rising generation, as well as newcomers may be wrongly impressed. In this article it is proposed to examine the facts and the authorities upon which these statements are made.

First, then, in order to read our purpose at once, we will examine the facts connected with the lives of those entitled "Old fogies." My recollections may not serve me right, but I have endeavored to bring to mind names and deeds of those who have been called by Death from among us, in the few years immediately preceding the appearance of the above article, and I can but feel that the insinuations of the writer are very unjust and untrue. For reasons that will be obvious to the reader, I will avoid, for the most part, giving the names of those thus brought to mind, but will speak of the deeds of some whose lives were useful, and whose memories will be cherished. I can but name Capt. William Knox, who for 70 years lived among us, each year to honor his profession, and by strict integrity, untiring industry, and a comprehensive mind, greatly adding to the business of the place, and its reputation elsewhere.

Next to follow him, one who spent his money and time probably more than any other man living in Southern Ohio in battling slavery and its institutions. The grave, within these few years, has called to its embrace two honored and useful messengers of the Gospel, one of whom, more than 70 years ago, began his toilsome work. Another commenced life as a boy in a shipyard, lived in our midst to old age, and probably had as much to do with the improvements of our town for 25 years, as any man living. Another, who, by a life of great economy and constant industry, accumulated considerable property, gave to the cause of education and suffering humanity more than half the savings of his life.

There comes another—I wish I dare mention his name—a man of no pretensions, a mechanic of great merit, who, by his sober, toilsome life, set an example which I am glad to know is followed by his sons who live after him, whose homes, as well as his, indicate thrift and enterprise. I will speak of one other: much do I wish that he had continued to live but Death took him in the prime of life, in the midst of his usefulness. For over 20 years he had been a resident among us, and during the last 15 years of his life had paid out from $20,000 to $50,000 each year to the working men of the country, in conducting his business.

Were it not that a newspaper article must have its limits, the deeds and worth of others of our citizens, who have passed from life to death in the last few years, very properly could be spoken of. These men, and such as those described in the above article, controlled Marietta and its destinies, for at least its first 50 years, furnishing much of the means to the building of roads and bridges, school houses and churches, throughout the then sparsely settled country, beside the building in their own midst the Court House, Academy, a church to accommodate all the people (a building which still stands, a monument of the liberality and religious purposes of the early residents here). They lent pecuniary aid to those who cleared the ground, and fitted it for cultivation; they built rope-walks, and factories, and ships to navigate the ocean. Their enterprise was not bounded by the limits of State lines, but as far East as the Blue Ridge of the Alleghanies, and West as the Rockies, they pursued the purchase of peltries which were brought here, packed and shipped to foreign countries.

Neither were the women of that day idle, for we find that in the year 1808 there were possessed and used, in Washington County alone, over 1,000 spinning-wheels. The early women not only spun the early flax, and tow, and wool, but wove and made nearly all the garments worn by the men, women, and children of that day. Nor did they lack in enterprise, and the ability to accumulate. The writer has in mind the doings of one woman who, in 1789, landed here with her family from a canoe, in which she and they had navigated the Ohio. Soon engaging in business, she aided her husband in paying the debts which he had left behind. She lived and prospered until the year 1817, when, as the records of the Court House will show, she distributed among her children property worth $17,000.

DEFENSE OF THE PIONEERS AND THEIR SUCCESSORS.

(Second Article.)

The array of testimony to controvert the statements of McMaster made upon the authority of his one-hour visitor, is so voluminous, and of so high a character, we are at much loss to know which to select; but in order to complete our work, we are compelled to leave unused much material of this character and be content with but a few of these testimonials.

George Washington wrote from Mount Vernon, on the 19th of June, 1788, to Richard Henderson, an inquirer in regard to Western lands, the following eulogium of the Ohio Company's settlement: "No colony in America was ever settled under such favorable auspices as that which has just commenced at the mouth of the Muskingum. Information, property strength will be its characteristics. I know many of the settlers personally, and there never were men better calculated to promote the welfare of such a community. If I was a young man, just preparing to begin the world, or, if in advanced life and had a family to make a provision for, I know of no country where I should rather fix my habitation than in some part of the region for which the writer of the queries seems to have a predilection."

In speaking of Marietta, in 1795, Robert Schultz, an extensive traveler and intelligent man, said, "Her inhabitants are sober, honest, religious, and industrious, while dissipation and irrational amusements are not known in her friendly circle."

Williams, the historian, says: "Morally, Marietta was, for a pioneer settlement, far in advance of any other in the West. The people of Marietta, as a rule, were New Englanders, and fully abreast with the New Englanders' sentiment of the times."

Pages of your paper might be filled with testimonials such as these but forbearance sometimes is a virtue. For the first fifty years of its existence, Marietta had to contend with many adverse circumstances. The Indian war continuing almost five years, the many trials to which the inhabitants were subjected, several years of marked, malignant sickness, and other causes too numerous to mention in an article such as this, much retarded the onward march of improvement, and increased population. During many of those years the men of the town were drawn upon heavily to aid improvements: roads had to be made, bridges built, school houses and churches erected, and in addition to all this the settlers upon farm lands had to be aided. During all those years from $30,000 to $50,000 of credit annually extended by the business men of Marietta to the cultivators of the soil. Your readers may ask how was this? In these days of "pay as you go" it may seem almost incredible to be believed that nearly all the business of the country, in early times, was transacted by barter or on credit. Almost the first act of the early settler after he had selected a piece of land on which to dwell, upon which he had made a small payment, was to arrange for a credit with the merchants. The laborer who had helped to clear his land, build his fences, erect his log cabin in which to dwell, was to be paid in whole or in part in store goods. Perhaps it here should be said, that the early merchant kept in their early store-houses almost everything. They sold fish-hooks, pen-knives, bar-iron, iron kettles, bake-ovens, shovels and tongs, and-irons, plows, gun-flints, powder, shot and lead, salts, British oil, wool hats, country-made shoes, ax-handles, hoes, hatchets, hammers, saws, whip-saws, boat-cables, groceries of every kind, drugs, medicines, meats of all descriptions, butter, eggs, and lard, as well as every variety of dry goods.

Thus, it may be seen, that with a store order could be obtained all the necessities of life. Accounts thus contracted, sometimes small, but more generally large, were for the most part closed at the end of the year. The debtor received credit for the bear, wolf, or deer skins which he may have delivered, and the ginseng, snakeroot, hay, country linen or jeans, which the family may have supplied the merchant with. Notes given for balances, thus contracted, at times might remain on file for years. Don't suppose for a moment that transactions of this kind were only of advantage to the debtor; on the contrary, the creditor was becoming more and more independent each year as the records of the Marietta merchants will show, their Eastern creditors, not losing a dollar in the first 50 years of the settlement. I must here be allowed to say that in these latter years the tables have been turned; farmers being the money-lenders, the business men advantaged thereby.

But I must hasten on and briefly speak of the educational history of this region of country, in which the citizens of this town bore a leading as well as a prominent part. The celebrated ordinance of 1787 paved the way for the colonization of the Northwest Territory.

The sale of a large tract of land to the Ohio Company of Associates naturally followed. The veterans of the Revolution were anxiously waiting an opportunity to take possession of the promised bounty land. When Gen. Rufus Putnam, with the first New England emigrants to Ohio, landed at the mouth of the Muskingum River, he carried in his pocket a commission from the national government "to establish an University" in this wilderness. The contract between the Associates and the government contained a clause reserving two townships of land as an endowment for an institution of that sort. If Harvard is justified as fixing as its birth-year the date when it received John Harvard's library, Ohio University can claim 1787 as its natal year.

Little progress was made in the enterprise until after the Indian war, but as early as 1795 the townships of Athens and Alexander, Athens County, had been named the university townships. General Putnam remained the man in authority among the colonists. As surveyor-general, he usually led all reconnoitering expeditions.

The Ohio University was the first institution of its kind in the Northwest, but it long maintained supremacy over the colleges founded at a later date. For the first 30 years in its history, a large majority of its trustees were Marietta men, notably: Judge Elijah Backus, Gen. Rufus Putnam, Judge Dudley Woodbridge, Rev. Daniel Story, Dr. S. P. Hildreth, Joseph Buell, Gov. R. J. Meigs, and Benjamin Ives Gilman. General Putnam was well known as the champion of the institution, and with others above named contributed time and money to the furthering of the cause of the institution. It may with truth be said that this institution was cared for and fostered by Marietta men. Here was educated Thomas Ewing, one among America's greatest statesmen. John Brough was for a time a student at this university; afterward an orator of great power and Governor of the State of Ohio, Rev. Joseph M. Trimble received his degree as B. A. in this institution, became financial secretary and collector of furs of Delaware College, which institution now numbers 1,200 students. Edmund Schou, one of the most eloquent of pulpit orators, was of the graduating class of 1827. He soon took hold of Augusta College,* which under his individual management soon arose from the ashes to bless the world. His eloquence gave him access to the pulpits of all denominations. Here also was educated Bishop Edward R. Ames, the oft-called-in advisor and confidential friend of the lamented Lincoln. This institution gave training to some of the best pulpit orators. Richmond, Virginia, ever felt proud of the lamented Hogue. Pittsburg, Columbus, Cincinnati, Louisville, Nashville, as also many other cities were blest with the intellectual services of the graduates of this institution. Today, at the head of the Ohio State University, is one who claims that institution as his alma mater. I might go on enumerating college presidents, professors and distinguished divines who, under instructions received, went forth to bless the world, and add an armament to this institution, but I forbear.

Next we come to our own academy, established in 1800, employing the most competent teachers from the beginning. The oft-repeated history of Marietta College I do not propose to enlarge upon, but I do propose to speak of the liberality of two men whose acts in connection with this institution should be held in lasting remembrance. I refer to the oft-repeated munificent gifts of Douglas Putnam, Esq., and of Col. John Mills. I can in no way find out the exact sums thus contributed by each, but this I know full well,—but for the liberal gifts of these gentlemen, the success of the institution would not have been assured. The sums contributed by these parties I have unsuccessfully attempted to ascertain. When approached upon the subject Mr. Putnam, who was probably the largest contributor, courteously evaded an answer, but I think it may safely be said that his contributions for this laudable purpose exceeded $50,000. As truthfully* may it be said that the contributions of Colonel Mills exceeded the earnings of twenty of the most prosperous years of his successful business life. The priceless value of this institution has recently been greatly enhanced by the liberal and large acts of its Board of Trustees, by including within their domain an institution in which to educate the daughters of the land.

DEFENSE OF THE PIONEERS AND THEIR SUCCESSORS.

(Third Article.)

In continuation of the remarks on education as found in the last article, should be added a brief history of the common schools of the town, which first were confined to three rooms and as many teachers; the rooms now occupied for the purpose numbering 21, with 23 teachers.

In looking back, it occurs to the writer that the attacks of McMaster and others have been fully met, and without going into a detailed history, will enumerate some of the evidences of enterprise, ability and resolve, which occur to me as I write, without paying special attention to chronology.

The first settlers here were chiefly of New England origin. They knew what slavery was, as its blighting effects had been seen by them in their own midst, and the severance of families which certainly followed its diffusion was not unknown to them. Most of them had been soldiers for freedom from a foreign yoke, and to this new world they came to enjoy the largest freedom. The sixth article of the ordinance of 1787 was their "Day Star," and its recognition they had resolved upon. In support of this inalienable right, they had determined to fight for every inch of ground, every blade of grass, and if need be that the last intrenchment of constitutional liberty should be their graves. No other resolves had a higher seal in their hearts than that the largest liberty should be the birthright of every dweller. Manifestly was their purpose developed when called on to elect delegates for the fortifications of the first State Constitution. Those who were chosen to represent this population, strongly backed by others of like opinions, placed in that first declaration of sentiment those words which I pray God may ever govern our population, the substance of which was that neither slavery nor involuntary servitude should ever be known to our people.

The boldness and firmness of our little band impressed all and soon a barrier like the Rock of Gibraltar extended along the border, saying to slavery, "Thus far shalt thou come, but no farther."

A most interesting history of this whole subject might be written, but this is not the place for it; suffice it to say, the laws of our fathers never enslaved one human being.

I may here add, what I believe to be true, that the firm anti-slavery stand taken by the handful of pioneers, shaped the destiny of the nation.

Churches of all denominations and creeds soon abounded, and every man had the right to worship under his own "vine and fig tree," with none to make him afraid.

Did it show lack of enterprise, when in the early years of the settlements, a road was surveyed and cut through the forests to the seaboard, and at a subsequent date, before there was a mile of railroad in the States, to raise the money for and complete the survey of a route from the mouth of the Muskingum across the Allegheny Mountains? (See papers in the hands of Edward M. Booth, Esq., Citizens National Bank.)

In later years go to the regions of Northern Michigan, and find there conducting the exploration of the copper mines, bringing to its stockholders untold wealth, a Marietta man.

Go to the Pacific Coast, and find there a graduate of our shipyards, having laid down his adze here, the widely-known and able conductor of the then largest steam navigation company in California. This is Capt. James Whitney, a Marietta man.

A recent map of our city and surroundings speaks of six railroads centering here. Who projected, who built them?

After the projection and partial completion of the Marietta & Cincinnati Railroad, and home funds were exhausted, and the most hopeful of its friends almost hopeless, we see in the city of Berlin a man who in full confidence of the value of the bonds which he proposes to sell, satisfying the money lenders of Europe of the value of the offered security, bringing back to this country millions of dollars, which enabled the directors to tunnel the hills and trestle the gaps, and lay the rails, and thus complete an enterprise, which has given us connection with the outer world. This man was no other than Noah L. Wilson, who spent most of his days in the midst of us.

General Warner, it is admitted on all hands, I believe, gave us the Cleveland & Marietta Railroad, the value of which to our city and county cannot be estimated. This railroad supplanted to a great degree another enterprise, which has not by any means lost its value to the country through which it passes, and the business prosperity of our city. This road was projected and built, and called the Marietta & Duck Creek Plank Road. John O. Cram, one of the live men of Marietta, was the father of this enterprise.

Today we find ourselves connected with the North and West by the Toledo & Ohio Central Extension, an enterprise bringing deservedly much credit to our fellow citizen, T. D. Dale, for its construction and completion. It is said that this road brings more trade to Marietta than any other.

An end I must reach, fully convinced that a volume could be written filled with the narration of commendable acts of those who lived before us. I shall necessarily pass over much of the history of the past.

The building and conduction of our manufacturing establishments, notably the chair factory, which, in the past, as I am creditably informed, fed and clothed, and gave good homes to 1,500 souls. Grafton, Mills and Stanley should write this history.

William L. Rolston, Esq., better than any one I know, can give a history of other years; the tannery, where hundreds of thousands of dollars were probably used and many hands employed. He also can tell you, better than anyone living, of the woolen factory, where much real capital was lost in an attempt to build up the manufacturing interests of Marietta.

In this connection, allow me to say that A. T. Nye should write up the history of iron manufacturing in this region. I know of no one so competent to do it.

Wonder not that I have come to the front in speaking of the deeds of those who have lived and who are no more.

In my boyhood days I used to look with veneration upon the faces and forms of those who planted our institutions here; their names were household words, their deeds were recorded in memory; their children were my playmates and schoolmates and after companions. I feel exultant to have had such a companionship.

CHAPTER XXIV.

COMMERCIAL DEVELOPMENT OF MARIETTA IN THE PAST TWO DECADES.

COMMERCIAL GROWTH PRIOR TO 1880.

Prior to 1880 the commercial growth and industrial development of Marietta, while maintaining a gradual and unbroken rate of progress during the century which the city was even then rounding out, had yet been along such conservative and undemonstrative lines that the strenuous business world was prone to accord her a much less important place than she in reality occupied. The historical significance of the founding of the settlement by the sturdy empire-builders from New England, the enduring works of a prehistoric and little-understood race which had obligingly rendered itself extinct so as to offer no impediment to the onward rush of civilization, the high moral and intellectual plane of the people who had come after them, with the best of schools and churches and colleges—the fame of these had gone abroad and given to Marietta a peculiar and not unpleasant niche in the mind of the outside world.

As an industrial center, however, the city had fallen short of others which had had a later and less favorable start, although it already contained many valuable and prosperous manufactories to supply the bone and sinew of business activity. The mistaken impression that Marietta was a city of no commercial importance was most largely due, probably, to the erroneous idea, all too prevalent about that time, that only "boom" towns, the mushroom communities which were springing up in a night throughout all the West, and toppling to disaster almost as speedily, were to be placed in the catalogue which as a whole constituted the popular idea of American progress. The error soon became apparent, however, and the solid, substantial, conservative work of preceding generations of careful and thrifty business men was seen to be the only safe and sure foundation upon which to build an edifice of progress that would endure. It was then that Marietta forged to the front with accelerated pace and assumed her proper place in industrial circles.

THE AWAKENING.

The people of the city are pleased to entertain the sentiment that, like a "Sleeping Beauty," after a century of repose, gathering strength and vitality for the future, she awoke suddenly in the full prime of her existence, garbed by nature in a thousand beauties, strong, calm, and confident of her destiny.

Neither is this figurative illustration un-mixed with fact. Undoubtedly the most important incident of the decade from 1880 to 1890 was the celebration of the city's centennial anniversary in the year 1888. On April 7th, of that year, exercises were held commemorating the settlement of the Northwest Territory, at which addresses of world-wide interest were delivered by numerous orators of national reputation. Again, on July 15th to 19th of the same year, was held a second celebration commemorative of the establishment of civil government. Numbers of the country's most famous men were present on this date, also, and for a week Marietta was crowded with thousands of distinguished visitors from every section. It was upon this occasion that the city awoke to her own importance, and here that the outside world first gained a true impression of her beauty, her commercial capabilities, her great natural advantages and her certain prospect for a noteworthy future.

In 1880 the population of Marietta proper was 5,444, and of Harmar, the neighboring village on the western bank of the Muskingum, 1,571,—a total for the two municipalities, which have since become one, of 7,015. The early "eighties" were not distinguished by any unusual features of growth, the city having in fact been severely handicapped by two disastrous floods in 1883 and 1884. On February 9th of the latter year the water reached a stage of 52 feet six inches, the highest ever known. Following the centennial celebration, a very perceptible growth of population and increased activity in business circles was noted, and thus we find the commercial awakening of the city practically coincident with the close of the first 100 years of existence and the start upon a new century.

ANNEXATION OF HARMAR.

On May 14, 1890, the annexation of the village of Harmar was accomplished after a period of enthusiastic agitation on the part of the citizens of both towns, and since that time the portion annexed has been designated West Marietta, constituting two of the six wards of the city.

WATER WORKS.

The first of the more important steps toward modern municipal improvement was taken in 1891, when the system of public water works was put in operation on September 1st. This improvement came primarily as a result of a universal demand for better fire protection, following a number of costly conflagrations which threatened the entire business district. The great utility of the system for supplying water to private consumers was at once recognized, and the plant was improved to meet the demands made upon it by the general public. New and larger pumps and machinery have been added, many miles of additional mains laid and the service extended until it covers practically every portion of the city and its flourishing suburbs. In 1902 the demand has so increased that improvements are under way which contemplate the erection of large settling reservoirs to provide purer water and a great increase in the supply. The money is appropriated for these extensions which will be made during the next year.

PAID FIRE DEPARTMENT.

Following the water works came the paid fire department, which on December 1, 1894, supplanted the old volunteer department that had been in existence for 40 years. Two splendidly organized and completely equipped departments, one on the east side, and the other on the west side of the Muskingum River, now give the city almost perfect protection against the destroying element.

ELECTRIC LIGHT PLANT.

All through the early "nineties" the city was busy with municipal improvements. Starting with the installation of an electric street lighting plant of small capacity, which was placed in operation July 10, 1889, the service has been enlarged to include incandescent lighting of the city building and to furnish 200 arc lamps for street purposes. The plant now occupies a fine new building at the corner of Front and Butler streets, completed in 1901.

STREET PAVING AND SANITARY SEWERS.

The initial work toward the paving of the streets, begun in 1892, was the improvement of Greene, Front and Putnam streets, from what is now the Norwood Hotel to the Court House. The transformation of these thoroughfares was so great that the work was pushed rapidly forward until now the main arteries of travel are all smoothly paved with vitrified brick, and many cross streets as well.

Simultaneously with street paving arose a demand for sanitary sewers and this improvement also is now practically complete, covering every part of the city.

ELECTRIC STREET RAILWAY.

The spirit of progress and improvement, which had taken hold of official Marietta, at once had its effect on private interests and expansion became the watchword in almost every line of business. One of the first and most important public utilities to be established by private capital was the electric street railway, superseding the old horse cars, which struggled feebly for a few years and then gave way to the handsomer, swifter moving, profit-paying cars propelled by electricity, the motive power of the age in street transportation. A company of local capitalists, imbued with faith in the future of Marietta, and under the leadership of Nelson Moore, secured from the City Council in April, 1896, a franchise for the use and occupation of the streets for an electric railway. The construction and equipment of the plant was undertaken without delay and, contrary to the predictions of many, the company was a paying institution from the start. Extensions of the road have been continuously made until now it reaches every portion of the city and gives an excellent service. Early in 1902 a consolidation was effected with a company owning and operating the electric line at Parkersburg, and the new inter-urban line connecting Parkersburg and Marietta, and an organization was accomplished under the name of the Parkersburg, Marietta & Inter-Urban Railway Company. This consolidation results in giving to the two cities local transportation facilities of great convenience and commercial value.

TELEPHONE COMPANIES.

The Bell Telephone, which was introduced into Marietta in 1886, now occupies its own fine brick building on Putnam street, with practically all its wires in the more thickly settled parts of the city under ground. Its subscribers are supplied with fine long-distance instruments and the best service of which the company is capable. In 1900 the Marietta Telephone Company was organized and it also has an excellent underground service, with long distance connections throughout the county and State.

RAILROADS.

In railroad facilities Marietta has not been as fortunate as many of her neighboring cities, being denied the advantages of location upon trunk lines, but her commercial importance has gradually compelled recognition from railroad corporations until now she has four lines running directly into the city, with another passing on the opposite side of the Ohio River.

In 1880 the Marietta & Cincinnati and the Cleveland & Marietta were the only lines entering the city. Subsequently the Zanesville & Ohio River road was built through the Muskingum Valley, and made its entrance into Marietta July 1, 1888. This road follows the west bank of the river for the entire distance of 75 miles from Marietta to Zanesville. It was built largely by the efforts of the people along the beautiful valley, who had tired of the slow-going steamboats for passenger transportation, and who assisted the promoters with large subscriptions of money and rights of way.

As an independent line the road had numerous vicissitudes, and was finally merged into the Ohio & Little Kanawha. Its troubles ended in 1902, however, when it was purchased outright by the Baltimore & Ohio and made a part of the Newark Division.

In 1884 the Toledo & Ohio Central Extension road was conceived by local capitalists and carried to a conclusion so successful that it is now looked upon as perhaps the most valuable local line entering the city, operating 53 miles of track. It connects with the Toledo & Ohio Central at Palos and offers excellent connections north and west. It is now named the Marietta, Columbus & Cleveland and is under the most able management in its history.

Although no part of it is in Ohio, the completion of the Ohio River road from Wheeling to Kenova was of great value to Marietta, the road passing through Williams-town, a thriving village on the West Virginia side of the river, opposite this city.

In the railroad history of Marietta there is no more important undertaking than the movement for a union station, which was conceived by T. D. Dale, a local railroad man, in 1889, and by him pushed through to a successful termination, with the aid of outside capitalists. Up to the year mentioned the city was practically without depot accommodations, each road running into a little platform and frame building of its own, and the entire lack of conveniences for the traveling public was a familiar source of jest. Through the patient efforts of Mr. Dale, however, the Marietta Railway Company was organized and gave to the city the handsome union station which is a source of pride to the citizens, and the erection of which resulted in filling a large area of low and valueless land and greatly improving the business section. More and more of this low ground, which originally was under water during every slight freshet, is being filled by the railroads as they need it for extending their yards, and eventually it will all be brought to the general level of the main streets.

NATURAL GAS.

Since 1893 Marietta has been a "natural gas town," having been generously supplied with this valuable fluid for both fuel and lights. The River Gas Company's mains cover the entire city like a network and the use of gas is practically universal. This fact has added much to the desirability of the city for manufacturing and also renders it a cleaner and more healthful residence locality.

INCREASED ACTIVITY IN THE OIL INDUSTRY.

The period from 1890 to 1895—the first half of the closing decade of the 19th century—was not marked by the unprecedented growth that came later, but was almost exclusively devoted to general public improvements which attracted outside capital and gave to the people a spirit of enterprise that made certain the newer and greater Marietta of today. About the years 1895 and 1896 the oil business, which had been almost at a standstill, suddenly developed tremendous activity, chiefly due to a rising market, and brought about an unparalleled era of "good times" in every line of trade and manufacture. Capital flowed in for the purpose of drilling the rich territory on every hand and farms that had hitherto been considered almost worthless speedily enriched the operators and farmers alike. This city, as the headquarters of the Buckeye and Eureka Pipe Line companies, the Joseph Seep Purchasing Agency, and kindred branches of the Standard Oil Company, became the real center of the development known as "The Southwest," and enjoyed a season of prosperity that at last placed it in the very front rank of commercial and industrial affairs. The development of the oil fields brought directly the necessary large depots of supplies for the work, the manufactories of drilling tools, engines, boilers and glycerine for liberating the greasy fluid from its stone-locked prison in the bowels of the earth, and the thousands of men engaged in the business found in Marietta an ideal spot in which to live and educate their children. Other influences were also at work in the growth of the city, but to the oil development more than any other is undoubtedly due her continued prosperity at a time when other towns felt general depression in business affairs.

BUILDING OPERATIONS ENLIVENED.

Handsome residences sprang up like magic at the rate of three hundred or four hundred a year; costly and elegant business blocks and office buildings replaced the most old-fashioned frame structures that for years had been landmarks along the business streets; elegant new school houses arose as monuments to the spirit of progress and rapid increase of population. The prices of real estate advanced steadily, pride grew in the hearts of the people, and all at once, as it seemed, every avenue of trade and traffic became alive with the hustle and bustle of modern business life.

GROWTH IN THE CITY'S BUSINESS.

To the solid old manufacturing establishments and business houses, every one of which had felt the impetus of the new conditions and expanded with the city, were added many others to swell the volume of business, supply work for the laboring man and trade for the merchant. Iron and glass industries were added to the diversity of lines of wood-working which had long been profitably followed and the manufacturing interests soon became predominant. The financial institutions, the banks and building associations, grew at a phenomenal rate and in a few years the century-old town, once known principally because of its historic associations and its splendid college, was heralded far and wide as one of the most important business centers in the Middle West.

SUBURBS.

The rapid influx of new people caused a congestion of population to such an extent that additional room became necessary, and numerous beautiful suburban tracts were laid out into lots and homes erected upon them. Most prominent among these are Norwood, Fairview Heights, and the Rathbone Addition. The suburb of Norwood lies to the east of the city and already has more than 1,000 inhabitants, all occupying new and handsome residences, where in 1896 were only pasture fields and farm lands. Here is located the new plant of the Marietta street railway, which was compelled by its growth to remove from its original quarters on Second street. Numerous new industries are located in Norwood, which is destined to become one of the principal sections of the city.

Fairview Heights is located on the plain at the top of the high hill which rises abruptly from the west bank of the Muskingum River, and contains many elegant and costly homes. The scenic outlook from the brow of the hill, showing the beauties of the Ohio and Muskingum valleys, is one of the most magnificent in Ohio, and has been a powerful factor in the rapid development of Fairview Heights. Fine new public school buildings are already under way in both Norwood and Fairview Heights.

On the easterly side of the Muskingum, just above the city, are being built many fine houses for the occupancy of professional and business men and the locality, known as the Rathbone Addition, is one of the most delightful residence spots in the valley.

NEW PUBLIC BUILDINGS.

In 1898 the Marietta Board of Trade, an organization which has had much to do with the progress of the city since its inception in 1887, decided to institute a movement for the erection of a new Court House, the old structure having outlived its usefulness, and being in constant danger, with its valuable records, of destruction by fire. A campaign of education was undertaken and after a vigorous and enthusiastic canvass the proposition carried by popular vote. The contract for the new building was let in August, 1900, and it was completed in 1902. This Court House is said to be one of the handsomest in Ohio, and its fourth story contains a modern sanitary jail, doing away with a separate building for keeping prisoners.

Other notable public buildings erected during this period were the High School building and Marion school, built in 1900-1901. In 1901 the old bridge across the Muskingum River at the foot of Putnam street was replaced with a fine steel structure, provided with street railway tracks.

A significant feature of the general prosperity since 1896 has been the interest in religious affairs. Many fine new church edifices have been erected and others are provided for and will be built in the near future.

BRIDGE ACROSS THE OHIO.

In 1901 the City Council granted a franchise for the erection of a bridge across the Ohio River, and at this date the substructure is completed and the contract for the superstructure let. The promoters of the enterprise comprise the Ohio River Bridge and Ferry Company. Upon the completion of the structure, which will be noted for having the longest channel span of any truss bridge over the Ohio—650 feet—the electric lines will connect Marietta and Parkersburg under one management.

NEW PROJECTS.

An electric line is also projected from Marietta to Newport, a village 15 miles east, and will pass through an exceptionally rich farming country. Many projects for new manufacturing industries are already on foot and in general the industrial and commercial outlook for the city is brighter at the present moment than at any time in its exceedingly interesting history.

IMPROVEMENT OF THE OHIO.

The stupendous scheme of improving the Ohio River from Pittsburgh to Cairo, by a system of locks and movable dams, upon which the United States government is now engaged, will be of great advantage to Marietta. The location of Dam No. 18 about seven miles below the city, will give a splendid harbor, with navigable water in the Ohio at all seasons of the year. The appropriation has been made for this dam and the preliminary work done and it will be one of the first to be completed. With the Muskingum River, already improved under government control as far north as Zanesville, and the probability of a still further extension of this beautiful and useful waterway, the improvement of the Ohio will assure to the city for all time to come a perfect system of river transportation and a safe defense against railroad discrimination.

Ohio had been settled 24 years when the war with Great Britain broke out. Some progress had been made in subduing the wilderness, numerous settlements had been formed, new counties organized, and the census of 1810 shows that, with an area of four thousand square miles, she had at that time but 230,769 inhabitants, and Washington County, by the same census, 5,991. A large part of the State was still in its natural condition, and part of it held by tribes of Indians. The settled portion was all southeast of a line drawn from Cleveland in a southwesterly direction. It was through this wild country that the soldiers of 1812 marched to the falls of the Ohio, at Louisville; and the gratitude of the country is due to them not so much for the amount of the fighting done as for the hardships endured in traversing these pathless forests and holding important posts on the far frontier. In those days the facilities for travel were limited, horses and wagons were scarce, while clothing and all the equipments of an army were difficult to provide so far from the base of supply, and much of it, when obtained, was not suitable for the kind of service demanded—that of fighting Indians, marching through dense forests, tangled thickets and extended swamps.

The people of the Northwest Territory had always been accustomed to the maintenance of a war-like attitude. The young State of Ohio had a well-organized militia, and the service of a militiaman in those days meant something. They had, from 1790 to 1795, a fierce war with a powerful combination of Indians, including the Miamis, Wyandots, Delawares, Pottawatomies, Shawnees, Chippewas, Ottawas and other tribes of the Territory, all under the great Miami chief, Michikiniqua, whose warcry was, "Drive the white man east of the Ohio." Gen. Anthony Wayne, August 20, 1794, had totally defeated them on the Miami; and since the treaty with them at Greenville, August 3, 1795, the Indians had not molested the settlements until the beginning of the war we are now discussing.

From 1798 to 1800 the war with France occurred. From 1801 to 1805 the war with the pirates of Tripoli was waged. Thus had the new generation grown up, and the new settlements been formed almost under the shadow of the sword and scalping-knife; and the population, accustomed to rely on the fruits of the chase as well as agriculture and other pursuits, was largely made up of hardy hunters, good woodsmen, and men who had made a successful fight against the ruder forces of nature.

CAUSE OF THE WAR.

The war of 1812, as far as this country was concerned, was fully justified. The mother country had acknowledged our independence, but would not accord us the privileges of freedom. She had impressed our seamen, searched our ships on the high seas, and made almost innumerable aggressions on our commerce, and last, but not least, had incited the Indians on the frontier to renew their savage hostilities, and for these causes war was declared June 18, 1812.

ATTITUDE OF THE FEDERALISTS TO THE WAR.

President Madison in his proclamation of war, dated June 19, 1812, urges all citizens of the republic to sustain the administration in the impending struggle. One would suppose that such an appeal was superfluous, but it had a meaning at that time which we can the better understand by consulting the political history of the day. Thomas Jefferson had already founded the Democratic party by which Madison had been elected. It was the war party. The Federalists were opposed to the war, in this much at least, that they believed that the object sought could be accomplished by negotiation without a resort to arms. The war party, however, carried the day, and the verdict of history is that they were right. This feeling of opposition was well developed in Washington County. It was, however, more of a non-interest than opposition.

SITUATION IN WASHINGTON COUNTY.

In the spring of 1878, A. T. Nye, Sr., of Marietta, received several letters from old citizens of the county, written in response to inquiries made by Mr. Nye in regard to the War of 1812, which we give as the best statement readily obtainable of the situation in this county in those days. John Stone, Esq., of Belpre, wrote as follows:

The patriotism of Belpre did not prompt her citizens to deeds of peril on the Canada lines. The people believed the government could have made a treaty if it had taken the right course. The Berlin and Milan decrees of Napoleon were as obnoxious as the British orders in council, and to declare war against one government and not the other was to discriminate. If war was the remedy to maintain our rights, we were in every way unprepared for it.

The blundering management of the war in the northwest gave cause for the severest criticism, and perhaps gave rise to the idea of the necessity of a Silver Grey organization. Colonel Nathaniel Cushing had command of a company of Silver Greys, whose valor had been tried in their youth, who had seen Indians since, heard the war whoop and helped to bury the scalped dead, but the men, who threw up their caps for the War of 1812 looked upon these old soldiers as Tories, and sometimes called them so. Perhaps I might mention some circumstances to show who they were, how well they bore the appellation, not accepted it, and how they stood when a Tory was an enemy to his country. There was some slipping away from the legal call of the militia officers, but enough were found to fill the drafts as they occurred. All who went into the service were given honorable discharges. There were a great many sick and ailing when an order for draft was announced, so much so that old Mr. Allen, who did the ferrying at the mouth of the Little Hocking, and who was commonly known as "Old Charon," said: "Nearly all the drafted men profaned themselves sick."

Edmund B. Dana and Bial Stedman were captains in the regiment of Washington County militia as then organized. They were citizens of Belpre, and Belpre at that time contained double the territory it does now. The bounds of military companies were fixed by regimental boards of officers. Hence Captain Dana's company, though called a Belpre company, extended into Warren, while Captain Stedman's company was all in Belpre, and within the bounds of these two companies were formed the Silver Greys. I am not aware that either Capt. E. B. Dana or Capt. Bial Stedman performed any other service than to call out the requisition made on their companies and other duties connected with that service. I was a corporal in Captain Dana's company, and performed the duty of notifying the drafted men in the draft of 1813. It was the duty of commanders of companies when they received a requisition to draft the number of men called for and forward them to the place of rendezvous; they were not authorized to use compulsion. If the drafted man did not go or furnish a substitute he was subject to a fine. Officers were detailed in the order of the dates of their commissions, and took with them their non-commissioned officers, governed by a rule fixed by law. A suit grew out of the drafting of an apprentice who never returned to service, in which case the aggrieved master, a strong advocate of the war, sought his remedy in court against the captain, and paid the costs in Goodno vs. Bial Stedman, on appeal from William Browning's docket; whether he cursed the war I don't know, but have no doubt he cursed his luck and the captain, too.

Omitting all dates, Quartermaster or Contractor Citing performed a large number of his duties in Belpre and vicinity, and forwarded them to headquarters under his nephew, W. P. Putnam, wagonmaster, Absalom Misner, Major Reed, and Cummings Porter, teamsters, which duties they performed in a satisfactory manner and were honorably discharged.

The drafted men who served were Elam Frost, Nehemiah Morse, Lemuel Cooper, Samuel Barkley. The men who hired substitutes were Jervis Burroughs, William Burroughs, and I think George Dana and Joseph Dilley. The substitutes were Joel Bennett, Curtis and Himman. Pardon Cook served in the company commanded by Capt. Charles Devol; Barkley and others from Belpre were in Capt. John Thorniley's company; Captain Dana's company extended into Warren and Cooper may have been a citizen of that township at the time.

To confirm the statement that Belpre folks were called Tories a drafted man says, "When spoken to I was always called Tory except at roll call."

James Lawton, of Barlow, responded as follows:

In regard to the War of 1812, a large class of the then voters thought it unnecessary and impolitic. My father and most of his neighbors took that view of it. Of course, we rejoiced at our victories, but farther than that took but little interest in it. Doubtless the case was very different in some quarters, and many prominent citizens participated in it, but with comparatively few exceptions it was not the case here.

Joel Denning's letter was in substance as follows:

I can recollect many events of the War of 1812. There were a number of young men went from Waterford into the service, Elias Wolcott, Lorey Ford, Elisha Mallory, Norman Hart, Benedict Hutchins, Duty Green, David Deming, William Henry, Alexander Walker, Neal Walker, who all lived to return except N. H. H.

WHY THE DRAFT WAS RESORTED TO.

In the summer or early fall of 1812 Gen. Edward W. Tupper came to Marietta to recruit a force of volunteers for the war. A consultation was held between leading men as to the propriety of raising men in this manner, and it was decided to resort to the draft. Caleb Emerson, in the Western Spectator, of which he was the editor in 1812, says that it was feared that the volunteers would be from the ranks of the Democratic party, which was strongly in favor of the war, and thus the chances of success at the approaching October election would be endangered, whereas, if the draft was resorted to, men of both parties would be taken. The result was that the young men, and others without families, who could conveniently go, were not afforded a chance to volunteer, but men with families to support, and others who were not well suited for soldiers, were forced into the service. General Tupper left without any recruits.

From the military papers of Capt. Rotheus Hayward, late of Waterford township, furnished by Rotheus Hayward, it appears that on February 15, 1814, he was ordered to furnish men for the service. Thereupon Corporal John Craft was given a list of 13 members of Captain Hayward's company, with orders to "begin at the first and proceed down the list until he found two men who were willing to serve, and warn them to appear at Anthony McCandish's in Waterford, on Wednesday, February 23, 1814, armed and equipped as the law directs, to march on a tour of duty, to rendezvous at Franklinton, in this State." The men who were willing to go were Edward Miller and William Prewitt.

The attempt, however, to class the Federalists with the Tories was a failure, for many of them were Revolutionary soldiers, and the whole tenor of their lives amply disproved the charge. We are inclined to believe that it was merely a campaign epithet used to help James Madison to his second term in the White House. The War of 1812 really began the year previous, although no formal declaration was made; it was the same conflict, and many Indians that fought at Tippecanoe in 1811 doubtless fought with Tecumseh and General Brock the year following.

BATTLE OF TIPPECANOE.

An early intimation of the pending war was afforded the citizens of Washington County by the landing, at Marietta, of the old Fourth Regiment United States Infantry, commanded by Colonel Boyd, during the summer of 1811. They were mostly from New Hampshire and Massachusetts, a fine looking and intelligent body of men, who were destined to see hard service. They passed on their way to join Gen. William Henry Harrison at Vincennes, where they were met by several regiments of mounted volunteers from Kentucky. General Harrison, with this force, moved on up the line of the Wabash, and on November 7, 1811, at Tippecanoe Creek, Indiana, met and defeated the Indians under the Prophet, brother of Tecumseh. The Indians lost 170 killed and 100 wounded; the Americans 62 killed, and 126 wounded. The Fourth United States Infantry lost heavily in this battle. Capt. Robert C. Barton, a Washington County man, commanded a company, and General Harrison, in his report of the battle, mentioned Captain Barton for his gallant conduct. The Fourth United States Infantry were stationed at Fort Harrison and Vincennes during the winter, and in May, 1812, marched to Urbana, Ohio, and joined the Northwestern army.

The certainty of war with Great Britain prompted the government, in the winter of 1811-12, to call for three regiments from Ohio to serve in the Northwest; the plan being to move this force early in the spring and occupy Detroit, which, in event of a war, would be an important strategic point in movements against Canada.

EXPEDITION OF GENERAL HULL.

Brig. Gen. William Hull was at that time Governor of the Territory of Michigan, and early in May he arrived with his staff from Washington City, and assumed command of the Northwestern Army. General Hull had seen service in the Revolutionary War, and under Gen. Anthony Wayne, at the storming of Stony Point, had distinguished himself, but he had lost his youthful vigor, and lacked the inspiring presence of "Mad Anthony" to urge him on to deeds of valor, as the sequel will show. The three regiments asked from Ohio were promptly furnished. They were the First, Second and Third Regiments of Ohio Volunteers, commanded respectively by Col. Duncan McArthur, of Ross County; Col. James Findlay, from the western part of the State, and Col. Lewis Cass, from Muskingum County. Colonel Cass gathered a few companies at Zanesville in May, 1812, and proceeded thence down the Muskingum to Marietta, where he was joined by Capt. John Sharp, with the Washington County company. Colonel Cass arrived at Marietta May 25th, and was received amid the firing of cannon and other public demonstrations. On the next day he departed for Cincinnati, his men numbering 250 in all, traveling in keel boats. On their arrival at Cincinnati they were joined by 200 more men. From there they marched to Dayton.

After obtaining the consent of the Indian tribes through whose country the expedition was to march, General Hull moved forward through the pathless forests, the unbroken wilds of Ohio to the foot of the Maumee rapids, where he arrived June 30, 1812, and by July 4th the Fourth United States Infantry took possession of Fort Detroit. The other regiments, coming up, encamped around the fort.

A sufficient number of bateaux (a boat somewhat larger than a skiff) having been procured, the expedition by July 9th, was ready to cross the Detroit River and invade Canada. They accordingly moved up the river on that day in the following order: first, the Fourth United States Infantry, Lieut. Col. James Miller; second, the First Regiment Ohio Volunteers, Col. Duncan McArthur; third, the Second Regiment Ohio Volunteers, Col. James Findlay; fourth, the Third Ohio Regiment Volunteers, Col. Lewis Cass. Thus the Third Regiment became the right wing of the army. Arriving at the point selected for the crossing they entered the bateaux at daylight, and launched out upon the broad river in perfect alignment, the right a little in advance. They reached the other shore in due time, formed on the bank, but were not attacked as they expected. Marching down to Sandwich, opposite the fort, they encamped. A reconnaissance in force was soon made, in the direction of Malden, by Colonels McArthur and Cass, capturing a battery over the Canada River, four miles above Malden. Several other reconnaissances were undertaken which developed the fact that the enemy were weak and disposed to avoid an engagement.

SURRENDER OF HULL.

General Hull, for some reason best known to himself, on the 7th of August ordered the whole force to recross the river and occupy their old position, which movement was effected without molestation and the invasion of Canada ended. The enemy now crossed opposite Malden and interrupted communications with Ohio. On the 9th of August a strong detachment was sent down to drive them back. Here was fought the battle of Brownston, in which the national army lost 68 men. The enemy was defeated, driven back to Canada and communications with Ohio restored.

The officers commanding the troops under General Hull now discovered that something was wrong at headquarters; that the old general was either a coward or a traitor, and giving matters their most charitable construction, it was thought he ought to be deposed from command.

An effort to accomplish this change was started, all the officers signing a petition, their names being arranged in a circle so that no one came first. The design was to place one of the Ohio colonels in command, but nothing came of it.

On August 15th the British opened on Fort Detroit, from a battery located on the opposite shore, which could not possibly have dislodged the garrison at Fort Detroit without a heavy supporting force which the British did not have. This fort had been designed and laid out by army engineers, and was—what it was intended to be—a very formidable work; heavily armed, and surrounded by the forests, across which an enemy would have to approach without cover, a circumstance which, in event of attack, would have deprived General Brock of the aid of 600 Indians under Tecumseh, who would never have approached the fort across the open plain in the face of the artillery on the bastions and curtain walls of this formidable fortress. The total effective force of General Hull was 2,300 officers and men, well supplied with artillery, independent of the guns in advanced batteries.*

The force of Brock consisted of 230 British regulars, 400 Canadian militia, and the 600 Indians above mentioned, to which was attached a battery of three six-pound and two three-pound guns. Besides this there were in Fort Detroit ammunition, arms and equipments in abundance.

General Brock, with his forces, crossed below Detroit on the morning of August 16, 1812, before dawn and marched up to within a mile of the fort and sent Tecumseh with his Indians by a detour around to the west side, keeping them concealed in the woods. Brock promptly sent in his demand for a surrender, which General Hull accepted, and the Northwestern Army was no more.

This army was composed of brave men who were anxious for a fight, yet their reputation and opportunity for distinction were thus basely compromised and surrendered by General Hull without cause or justification.

General Hull was afterward tried by court-martial and sentenced to be shot, but was spared on account of former services.

CALL FOR TROOPS.

The government, during General Hull's operations at Detroit, had called for additional

The guns surrendered by Hull were as follows:
Iron—seven twenty-four-pounders, in water battery; two twenty-four-pounders, on new field carriages; eight twelve-pounders, in and around fort; five nine-pounders, in and around fort; three six-pounders, in and around fort; one three-pounder, in and around fort.
Brass—three six-pounders, at fort; two four-pounders, at fort; one three-pounder, at fort; one eight-inch howitzer, at fort; one five and one-half inch howitzer, at fort; one mortar; total, thirty-eight pieces.

troops from Ohio to support him. These were collected at Urbana by Governor Meigs, and among them was the Second Brigade of Ohio militia, commanded by Gen. Edward W. Tupper, with Horace Nye as brigade major, both citizens of Washington County. The brigade consisted of one regiment from the eastern part of the State, commanded by Col. Charles Miller, of Coshocton; one regiment from Gallia and Athens, the county below, commanded by Col. Robert Safford, of Gallia; and a battalion under command of Major James Gallo-way, of Xenia, with two companies of scouts of about 25 men each—one commanded by Capt. Thomas Hinckson, the other by Captain Wood. The whole effective force was about 1,000 until subsequently reduced by sickness.

EXPEDITION OF GENERAL TUPPER.

At the rapids of the Maumee there had been planted some 300 acres of corn, in clearings made at that point. About October 30, 1812, General Tupper, being informed of the above fact, through his scouts sent out from Fort McArthur, and having also learned through an Indian interpreter captured by the same scouts, that there was an expedition of some 30 British and 500 Indians on the way to secure this corn for the Indians to live on during the winter, he at once resolved to defeat them in their undertaking. A courier was sent to General Winchester, who was lying within 40 miles of the cornfields with 3,000 men, in order that the general might be on the alert to either drive the enemy back or cut off his retreat. Meanwhile General Tupper determined to proceed at once to the rapids with what force he had—some 600 effective combatants, with a six-pound gun drawn by six horses. The field-piece was, however, abandoned the second day out from camp, and the carriage broken up; this was about the 8th of November. General Winchester had been notified of the departure of the expedition, its object, and the length of time the subsistence taken would enable them to stay away from the base of supplies.

When General Tupper arrived at the rapids, he found the Maumee so swollen that it was impossible to cross. The scouts reported the enemy on the opposite side, some distance from the rapids, and as yet unaware of the approach of Tupper and his command. After an unsuccessful attempt to cross with his force, he marched down the river until opposite the Indian camp, still undiscovered. Captain Hinckson, however, with nine of his scouts, came onto three Indians, who had crossed to the corn-fields. Shots were exchanged, killing one Indian and wounding another. The whole Indian encampment was aroused and agitated at once, like a hive of bees that had been disturbed. They dashed up the river to the ford, but upon their arrival there found Tupper and his men ready for them. This was not what they expected, and they immediately resorted to their usual Indian strategy of picking off the stragglers. After several hours of desultory firing, the Indians were driven back at every approach and many of them killed in the water while attempting to recross. They seemed to have quite a number of horses and used them to ferry the warriors over. These horses were afterward ascertained to be the same captured from General Hull at Detroit. The rations of the command being exhausted, they fell back slowly to Fort Findlay, on the river Auglaize. The Indians did not attempt to follow.

Had General Winchester co-operated with General Tupper there is no doubt that the whole detachment of British and Indians would have been either captured or so punished that the subsequent disaster at the river Raisin would not have occurred.* The motive of General Winchester in not seconding this movement was a desire to thwart the plans of General Harrison; at least this is the construction given to his actions by cotemporary writers.

*General Harrison's order to General Tupper is dated October 4, 1812, and the report of the expedition October 12th, showing that they were out some seven or eight days. The object was partly a reconnaissance in force and partly to surprise any force of the enemy that might have been in the vicinity of the rapids.

The winter of 1812-13 was a very severe one, and the troops on the frontier suffered greatly, especially from lack of sufficient clothing. The time of most of the brigade was out by the last of February, 1813, and General Tupper and his staff, with the men whose time had expired, were discharged and returned home.

COMPANIES FROM WASHINGTON COUNTY.

During the War of 1812 Washington County furnished seven companies, some volunteers, some militia, some regulars, to-wit: Captain Sharp, already mentioned as being in the Third Regiment, Ohio Volunteers, so basely surrendered by Hull at Detroit. Capt. Timothy Buell, who went out in May and also in August, 1813. The latter were mounted volunteers. They went to Zanesville; from there to Franklinton, a post situated opposite what has since become Columbus. They went from there to Mansfield, when the emergency at Fort Meigs being over, they returned home.

Captain John Thorniley's company was made up by draft. They were in the infantry, and formed part of the First Regiment of Ohio militia, and were called out in the fall of 1813, and their term of service expired March 13, 1814, which term included seven days for returning home, 140 miles. The company was stationed at Fort Stephenson most of the time of their term of service.

Capt. Charles Devol's company of dragoons was called out October 20, 1812. They reported for duty, but not being needed were ordered to hold themselves in readiness to march on short notice, which they did until the emergency was over.

Capt. James Flagg's company were drafted men called out on the same day as Captain Devol's.

The outfit of the company receipts for October 20, 1812, was as follows:

Fifty arms and bayonets; fifty cartridge boxes; one wagon, four sets of horse gear; four harnesses; two tents, two bags, six axes; and at Zanesville they received two more tents, eight pots, two kettles and powder and ball.

In this connection it is curious to note what one ration for a soldier was, to-wit: "One and one-fourth pounds beef, or four and three-fourth pounds salted pork, eighteen ounces of bread or flour, one gill of rum, whiskey or brandy, and at the rate of two quarts of salt, four quarts vinegar, four pounds soap and one pound and a half of candles to every hundred rations;" also what the uniform of a soldier of 1812 was, to-wit: The regulation coat was a "swallow tail," made of dark blue cloth, faced and trimmed with buff, buttons of white metal, with "U. S. A." on them. The hat was a tall bell-crowned affair, with no brim except a small visor in front. To this costume was added the "stock" for the neck, of polished leather, wide enough to fit up snug under the chin.

Capt. Alexander Hill's company was recruited principally in Washington County for the regular army in the summer of 1813, and was part of the Nineteenth United States Infantry. Captain Hill was, in the fall of 1813, ordered by Col. George Paul, commanding the regiment and having charge of the recruiting station of Zanesville, to report at that place. Captain Hill after his arrival at Zanesville was ordered to Detroit, arriving there after the battle of the Thames. The company was next ordered back to Zanesville by Colonel Paul, soon after arriving there. Captain Hill was placed in command of a battalion of the Ninth Infantry and ordered to report at Fort Erie, in Canada, near the head of the Niagara River, where he arrived before the battle at that place in 1814.

SIEGE AT FORT ERIE.

On July 31st the British, under General Drummond, appeared before Fort Erie with about 4,500 men and laid siege. The garrison now began a vigorous use of spades, perfecting the works which were quadrangular in shape. They also constructed some advanced works, in which were placed guns with proper infantry supports. On August 2d the firing from the opposing batteries began, which continued until August 15th. General Gaines, having arrived a few days before, was in command at the fort at this time, and on the 14th had discovered signs of a new movement in the enemy's camp. He accordingly put his forces in best shape possible for an attack and awaited developments. About two o'clock in the morning, August 14th, the enemy, under Lieutenant-colonel Fisher, 1,300 strong, attacked the left, when the Twenty-first Regiment, under command of Major Wood, and Towson's battery, repulsed them and fell back. The firing had scarcely subsided on the left when Lieutenant-colonel Drummond and Colonel Scott, with 1,500 picked men, moved up to the assault on the right. The night was exceedingly dark, but by the commands of the enemy's officers two columns were discovered approaching. Boughton and Harding's volunteers and the Ninth United States Infantry were manning the works on the right, but owing to the unfinished condition of an advanced bastion the enemy carried it and turned the guns on the defenders of the fort. The battle now raged furiously, but by renewed exertion the enemy was driven back and Colonel Scott and Lieutenant-colonel Drummond, the leaders of the assault, killed, but the British still held the captured bastion. The passage from this bastion to the body of the fort was in a great measure closed by the position of the block-house there located. This, though in a ruinous condition at the time, had been occupied the evening before by Lieutenant-colonel Trimble with a detachment of the Nineteenth Infantry, including Captain Alexander Hill's company, whose well-directed fire, at the same time that it galled the enemy severely in the bastion, had completely defeated every attempt he made to penetrate farther.

The column of Colonel Scott being now routed, the guns of the Douglass battery were so directed as to cut off all communication between the contested bastion and the enemy's reserve—and a party of desperate fellows were about to rush in and finish the work, when a spark being communicated by some means to an ammunition chest under the platform, the bastion with those who occupied it were blown into the air together."

The enemy's loss and that of the National forces in this engagement were estimated at the time as follows: British, 200 killed and wounded and 200 prisoners; United States troops, three officers and eight to 10 killed and 15 to 20 wounded.

The British now waited re-enforcements, and soon received two full regiments, established a new battery, and recommenced the cannonade. This state of things continued until September 17th, when a counter assault was undertaken in two columns, commanded respectively by Generals Porter and Miller. This sortie was well conducted and successful in driving the enemy from his entrenchments. The victorious columns, satisfied with having beaten the enemy in his chosen position, returned within the works of Fort Erie, and four days afterward the British broke camp, and retired rapidly down the river, thus ending a siege of 51 days.

PERRY'S VICTORY.

The victory of Commodore Perry near Put-in-Bay Island, Lake Erie, September 10, 1813, relieved the whole Northwest Territory of the presence of hostile forces. The British and Indians retired to Canada, abandoned Detroit, and but for the urgent demands of Tecumseh would have abandoned the whole of Lower Canada. Tecumseh, however, insisted upon a vigorous resistance to the advance of General Harrison, who pressed close on the retreating enemy.

PROCTOR AND TECUMSEH DEFEATED BY HARRISON.

On October 5, 1813, with what forces the combined efforts of Tecumseh and General Proctor could muster, battle was offered at the Moravian town on the River Thames. General Harrison engaged the enemy with a fine body of Kentucky mounted riflemen who carried confusion and destruction into the ranks. of the British, but met with a vigorous resistance from the Indian. The Kentuckians, however, attacked them vigorously, and after a desperate resistance defeated and routed them, killing their celebrated chief, Tecumseh. The theatre of war was from this time on transferred to Niagara frontier and the East, and continued with uniform success to the American arms both on land and sea. The sharpest fighting, however, of the War of 1812, was done on the ocean, and the people of the United States can always refer with pride to that series of brilliant victories won by American seamen, who seemed sent by an avenging Nemesis to redress the long standing grievances and punish Great Britain for her wrong and oppression.

BATTLE OF NEW ORLEANS AND TREATY OF PEACE.

The battle of New Orleans was fought January 8, 1815, 15 days after the treaty of peace was signed at Ghent, the news not arriving until after the battle, presenting one of the anomalies of history, a thing that could not happen at the present day with our great facilities for transmitting information. The Senate confirmed the treaty of Ghent, February 17, 1815, and President Madison made proclamation of the fact the following day.

We have said nothing of many important conflicts of the War of 1812, as the scope of this sketch was to give only that part in which the troops from Washington County figured; and considering the population of the county at that time, we may say that she did her part nobly and would have done much more had the occasion required.

BIOGRAPHICAL SKETCHES OF OFFICERS.

GEN. EDWARD W. TUPPER, son of Gen. Benjamin Tupper, an officer in the Revolutionary Army, was born in Chesterfield, Hampshire County, Massachusetts, in 1771. His father was an officer of the Revolution, from the commencement of the war, in 1775, until its close, in 1788. The subject of this sketch was, at the opening of this war, only four years old. His father, with several other families, came to Marietta in August, 1788. These were among the first families who came to Marietta. Edward W. Tupper was then 17 years of age. He was in the Campus Martius during the Indian war, and began his business life at its close.

At the organization of the State government in 1803, he was appointed clerk of the Court of Common Pleas, and of the Supreme Court, for Washington County, which offices he continued to hold until he left Marietta. At an early period, he opened a store for the sale of general merchandise, at the corner of Second and Putnam streets, Marietta. In 1802 he established a shipyard at the foot of Putnam street, and built the brig "Orlando."

This vessel went out under command of Capt. Matthew Miner, with Anselm Tupper for second officer, in 1804. The "Orlando" was at New Orleans July 4, 1804, at the time of the first celebration of that day after Louisiana was ceded to the United States. She made her first voyage to the Mediterranean and to the Black Sea, as far as Trieste on the latter.

In 1807 Edward Tupper built two gun-boats, under contract with the United States government.

In 1803 he built the house well known as the residence of the late Nahum Ward, and, since that, of his son, William S. Ward. This property he held until after he left Marietta, and sold it to Mr. Ward. It was occupied for some years, by Gen. Joseph Wilcox and his family.

On the 3rd of May, 1804, Mr. Tupper married Mrs. Bethia S. Putnam, widow of Dr. William Pitt Putnam—who was a brother of the late David Putnam, of Harmar. The house built by him, in 1803, was their residence while they remained in Marietta. In 1809 or 1810, he removed to Gallipolis. He was one of the most prominent and useful men of the place, and he had few superiors in Southeastern Ohio. He represented Gallia County in the Legislature for several terms. Some time, before leaving Marietta, he had been elected to the office of brigadier-general of militia, of the counties of Washington, Athens, and Gallia.

Soon after the commencement of the War of 1812, Governor Meigs made a requisition for a brigade to be raised in this division, composed of counties along the southern and western portion of the State. This brigade was organized at Urbana in August, 1812, and the command of it was assigned to General Tupper—he being the oldest brigadier-general in the division. The surrender of the army under Hull prevented this brigade from advancing beyond McArthur's block-house, where they went into camp, and where they remained for a considerable part of the following winter. In January, 1813, General Tupper learned that the British and Indians were collecting their forces at the foot of the rapids of the Maumee, to carry away a quantity of corn which had been left standing during the winter. He immediately made preparations for driving them away. Many of his men were unfit for duty, but he called for volunteers from among those fit for service to go on the expedition to the rapids. About 600 responded, and a forced march of several days was made to the Maumee, through the Black Swamp, then frozen over. On arriving at the rapids, the river was found to be so high that it was not possible to get the troops over in condition to make an attack. Only about two companies passed over, and these found their ammunition so wet that they had to withdraw. It became necessary, therefore, for the troops to fall back a short distance, for the purpose of drying their clothes and their ammunition. Next morning, however, all were fit for active duty; meantime, the Indians, having learned of the approach of our troops, marched up towards the rapids, on horseback, for the purpose of making an attack. They attempted to cross the river with a large force, but were driven back by our troops with considerable loss. The British and Indians retreated, and abandoned the corn, which was afterward used by General Harrison's army. Our troops lost no men, but some few stragglers from the ranks, who were killed by Indians. None of the troops of this brigade were from Washington County, except Horace Nye, brigade major. They returned to Camp McArthur after an absence of four days. In February, 1813, the brigade was advanced to Fort Meigs, where it was under command of General Harrison. About the first of March, 1813, their term expired, and they were mustered out of service. In September, 1813, General Tupper, then senior brigadier general, organized a regiment of drafted men at Zanesville, which went out under command of Colonel Bay, of Guernsey County. One company of this regiment was from Washington County, and was commanded by Capt. John Thorniley.

After the war General Tupper continued to reside at Gallipolis until his death in September, 1823. Mrs. Tupper died in 1858.

CAPT. JOHN SHARP, was born in 1771, at a place in Pennsylvania, then known as the "Burnt Cabins." He came to Washington County about the year 1800, settled on the Little Muskingum, in Lawrence township, near where the townships of Marietta, Newport, and Lawrence, have their corner.

He was of large stature and inclined to corpulency, and was a man of force and influence in the affairs of Washington County, in his time. When the call for volunteers came in the spring of 1812, Captain Sharp raised a company and joined Colonel Cass' regiment when he passed from Zanesville down the Muskingum and Ohio to Cincinnati. The troops lay over at Marietta one day, were received by the citizens with an artillery salute and other demonstrations of public approval. They took on board Captain Sharp's company, and on April 25, 1812, proceeded on to Cincinnati. They were transported in keel-boats. This regiment was the Third Ohio Volunteer Infantry, Army of Ohio.

After participating in the hardships and fatigues of the march to the rapids of the Maumee, Captain Sharp was there detailed, for what purpose is not known, probably to command the escort, to go on board a schooner laden with the sick, baggage of the officers and army stores of General Hull's army. The schooner was accompanied by a boat also loaded with army stores. This was to facilitate the march of the army, which was hastening forward to occupy Detroit. Dr. James Reynolds, surgeon's mate of the Army of Ohio, was in charge of the schooner and boat, but took up his quarters on the boat. They sailed July 1, 1812, from the mouth of the Maumee for Detroit, but in passing Malden the schooner was captured by the British, with all on board, including Capt. John Sharp, Lewis Dent, paymaster, a lieutenant of the Fourth United States Infantry, and about 50 soldiers. The boat escaped. They were afterward exchanged, and Captain Sharp arrived home soon after the surrender of Hull, and it may be said of this affair of the schooner that it saved the officers and men on board the disgrace of being surrendered by General Hull.

Captain Sharp was chosen Senator from Washington County for 1808, Representative for 1814, Senator again for 1815 and 1816. He was for some years one of the judges of the county court. He died very suddenly in 1823.

A sketch of Capt. James Flagg may be found in the biographical department of this work, under the head of "The Corner Family."

CAPT. JOHN THORNILEY was born in England, July 17, 1781, and came to this country April, 1795. The means of conveyance were at that early day limited, especially through the western wilds and over the Alleghanies. He, with his father and the family, walked to Pittsburgh, Pennsylvania, where they built boats, and came down the Ohio River to Marietta, after being six months on the way. They settled near the Little Muskingum in Marietta township of this county. When the war with Great Britain broke out in 1812, Captain Thorniley commanded a company of militia, and was assigned to the command of a company of drafted men, called out in the fall of 1813. His company was in the second battalion of the First Regiment of the First Brigade, Third Division Ohio, militia, and was stationed at Fort Stephenson, Captain Thorniley, commandant, Lower Sandusky.

Captain Thorniley was married July 12, 1810, to Mary Compton. He died August, 1844. The names of his children are as follows: William, Mary, Ann, Thomas, John, James, George, Caleb, Elizabeth, Harriet, and Adaline Thorniley.

CAPT. ALEXANDER HILL was of Scotch-Irish descent, and was born February 28, 1777, in County Antrim, Ireland, near Belfast, and landed at Philadelphia in 1784. His parents were strict Scotch Presbyterians, and Captain Hill doubtless owed much of his success in life to the wholesome training of his youth. Force of circumstances put him in the way of learning the cabinetmaker's trade, though his tastes strongly impelled him to a seafaring life.

Captain Hill started from Pittsburgh with an English emigrant named Alcock, in canoes lashed together, expecting to have gone to New Orleans and shipped as a sailor at that point, but on arriving at Marietta, in 1798, he found it inadvisable to proceed further without more money than he possessed. He, therefore, plied his trade at Marietta, and soon found that the demand for furniture to supply the new settlers was increasing, and offering opportunities for active and profitable business in that line. He established the first furniture factory in that county, and the cabinetmaker of those days was also the undertaker; and Captain Hill constructed the first coffin that was placed in Mound Cemetery.

Captain Hill was married in 1801 to Sarah Foster, daughter of Ephraim Foster, a Revolutionary soldier.

Captain Hill now became prosperous, and the idea of going to sea was abandoned. He was accustomed to load a boat (one of the old-time "broad-horns") every year with furniture for the Southern market, generally going to New Orleans, and either walking back or going around by sea to Philadelphia, and thence across the mountains in a wagon train. On one of these trips south the broad-horn had just reached New Madrid, Missouri, at the time of the great earthquake, which occurred in that country in 1811, and it was with much difficulty that the boat was rescued from destruction.

At the breaking out of the war with Great Britain, Captain Hill was a major in the State militia. In the spring of 1813 he received a commission as captain in the Twenty-seventh United States Infantry, and on April 22, 1813, he advertised for recruits in the counties of Washington, Athens, and Gallia. He was ordered with his men to Zanesville, and the Twenty-sixth and Twenty-seventh regiments were consolidated, and the Nineteenth United States infantry formed out of the two.

Captain Hill, in the fall of 1813, was ordered to Detroit, and is said to have been placed in command of Malden. He was ordered from there to Zanesville, and from there to Fort Erie. He took part in the battle and siege of that fort, his company being stationed on the right in a block-house, from which they maintained a destructive fire on the enemy, who had captured an outlying work, but could not hold it. The battalion of the Nineteenth infantry, in this battle, was commanded by Major Trimble, and the garrison and post by General Gaines.

Soon after his return from the war, Captain Hill was summoned to New York to attend a court-martial. Meeting General Gaines there, he asked the general what he thought of the conduct of his men, seeing that it was the first time many of them had been in battle. "Why, sir," said General Gaines, "I could not have expected better service from veterans."

Upon his return from the war, his term of enlistment being for one year, he opened a tavern in Marietta, under the "Sign of the Swan." Captain Hill was elected sheriff of Washington County as the successor of Captain Buell in 1815.

Captain Hill kept tavern until 1827, when, owing to the prevalence of the use of spirituous liquor and necessity almost of keeping a bar if he kept hotel, he decided rather than do it to quit, and accordingly, with his own hand, sawed down his sign-post and closed the tavern. His Scotch Presbyterian training was stronger than the greed for gain. The furniture business was not neglected during these years, but kept up, and when the market would justify it, a boat was loaded for the south, and the outcome was uniformly profitable until the fall of 1836, when he entered into a contract with the State to build the dam and one-half the canal at Lowell, the State being engaged at that time in providing slack-water navigation for the Muskingum River, but Captain Hill died in February, 1841, before the work was completed, leaving his heirs to finish the contract, the consideration of which was $85,000. This money enabled the heirs to settle the estate and pay the debts of Captain Hill, who had become somewhat embarrassed financially.

Captain Hill was of temperate and exemplary habits, and considering the extent and character of his public services, had very few enemies. He had seven sons and two daughters; one son and daughter died in childhood. Ephraim Hill died of the prevailing fever in 1823, aged nineteen years. The remaining children all grew up to mature age. They were John, Hugh, Jessie, Hiram A., Daniel Y., and Eliza Hill.

Eliza Hill was married to Spencer T. Bukey, June, 1835. He was a son of Hezekiah Bukey, a pioneer who settled on and owned a tract of land in Virginia, nearly opposite to Marietta. The children of Spencer T. Bukey were Van H., Alexander H., John, Joseph T., and Sarah Bukey.

Wallace Hill, son of John Hill, was lieutenant of Company B. Eighteenth Ohio Volunteer militia, for the three months' service, April, 1861. Alexander H. Bukey, son of Spencer T. Bukey, was a private in the same company; also served as commandant of a gun in Buell's battery during the war. Subsequently Wallace Hill was lieutenant in Company C, First West Virginia Light Artillery, familiarly known as Buell's Pierpoint battery, commanded by Capt. Frank Buell, and after the death of Capt. Frank Buell, at the battle of Freeman's Ford, August 22, 1862, Wallace Hill became captain of the battery, and so continued during the remainder of the war.

Frank Hill, son of Hiram A. Hill, born 1847, was appointed third sergeant of Company A, One Hundred and Forty-eighth Ohio National Guards, Samuel S. Knowles, captain, and on July 23, 1864, was appointed commissary sergeant of the regiment.

Ephraim A. Hill, son of Daniel Y. Hill, served three months in Company A, Eighty-seventh Ohio Volunteer Infantry, and returning enlisted in Battery K, Second Ohio Heavy Artillery, and served until April 15, 1865, when he died at Knoxville, Tennessee.

Alexander Hill, son of John Hill, served in the same company Van H. Bukey enlisted in—the Eleventh West Virginia Infantry—October 16, 1861; was commissioned first lieutenant February, 1862; captain August, 1862; major March, 1863; lieutenant colonel August, 1863, colonel November, 1864; brigadier general, by brevet, May, 1865.

John Bukey enlisted in Company D. Eleventh West Virginia Infantry, and was promoted from sergeant, orderly, second lieutenant, to first lieutenant in January, 1865.

Joseph T. Bukey enlisted as a musician in Company D. Eleventh West Virginia Infantry, and was afterward drum major of the regiment. In 1866 he enlisted for three years in Company A, First United States dragoons; served his term on the Pacific slope, and then re-enlisted in the Twenty-second United States Infantry, and was accidentally drowned at Sitka, Alaska, May 12, 1872.

CAPT. TIMOTHY BUELL was born October 18, 1768, at Killingworth, now Clinton, Connecticut, son of David Buell, of same place, came to Ohio June 15, 1789, and settled at Cincinnati, Ohio, where he is said to have built the first brick house in that city. Wishing to live near his friends and relatives, who had settled in Washington County, he returned to Marietta. When the conspiracy of Aaron Burr began to attract public attention, in 1806, the President of the United States sent out a confidential agent to Marietta to ascertain the true situation and relations between Burr, Blennerhassett, and the expedition then being fitted out. This agent became convinced, from what he saw, that the enterprise of Burr and Blennerhassett, if not treasonable, was at least alarming. He therefore went to Chillicothe, and laid the matter before the Ohio Legislature, then in session; and on the 2nd of December procured an act to be passed, "authorizing the Governor to call out the militia on his warrant to any sheriff or militia officer, with power to arrest boats on the Ohio River, or men supposed to be engaged in this expedition, who might be held to bail in the sum of fifty thousand dollars, or imprisoned, and the boats confiscated." Under this act a company of militia was called out, with orders to capture and detain the boats (which were being built about six miles above Marietta, on the Muskingum), and the provisions, with all others descending the Ohio under suspicious circumstances. This force was placed under command of Capt. Timothy Buell. One six-pound gun was placed in a battery on the river bank at Marietta, and pickets disposed at proper places along the shores to watch the river and give the alarm if any persons attempted to pass with the suspected boats. The dispositions of Captain Buell resulted in the capture of all but one of Mr. Blennerhassett's boats, which escaped during a very dark night.

After General Hull's surrender, the British and Indians began to move southward from Detroit and infest the territory opened up by their victory, and in the spring of 1813 they gathered in force and laid siege to Fort Meigs, situated at the rapids of the Maumee. General Harrison immediately made a requisition on Ohio for troops, and Governor Meigs called for mounted volunteers to hasten to the relief of the beleaguered garrison. Captain Buell immediately raised a company of mounted men, and on May 12, 1813, left Marietta for the rapids. Capt. Robert C. Barton, who was highly spoken of in the battle of Tippecanoe, was lieutenant, and Manly Morse, ensign. After being some days on the march, they were met with instructions to return, as the enemy had retreated. Over 4,000 mounted men, in Ohio, turned out under this call, and all but a few were sent back. Governor Meigs arrived at his home in Marietta (the same now owned by Hon. M. D. Follett) about the last of May, and Captain Buell, on arriving at Marietta, drew up his men in front of the Governor's house and tendered their services for any expedition he might direct. The Governor responded in very complimentary terms to their promptness and patriotism in going to the relief of Fort Meigs. He observed that he was the more gratified at their demonstration of zeal in their country's cause, as it was the first specimen of public military spirit which had been exhibited in the county of Washington since the commencement of the war. That henceforth he augured a revival of a redeeming spirit of military energy worthy of the county which bears the name of the illustrious Father of his Country. To those gentlemen who had aided the company in equipments he returned his sincerest thanks. Of those who had endeavored to discountenance the expedition, he observed that such merited what they must eventually receive, the contempt of all honorable men. The company was then honorably discharged.

On August 1, 1813, to meet a similar emergency at Fort Meigs, the mounted volunteers were again called upon, and they responded with the same readiness. Captain Buell gathered another company and went to the front, but before they had arrived at the scene of action the British and Indians had fled, and an order from General Harrison gave them his thanks and an "honorable discharge." This was the last demonstration of the British and their allies in the northwest. The victory of Commodore Perry, in September, 1813, compelled them to retire to Canada.

Capt. Timothy Buell and Alexander McConnel were elected to represent the district composed of Morgan and Washington counties in the Nineteenth General Assembly, 1820, and Captain Buell and William M. Dawes to represent the same district in the Twentieth General Assembly. Captain Buell was sheriff of the county for several years, being succeeded in that office by Capt. Alexander Hill, in 1815. He was also a magistrate for many years. Died February 6, 1837.

Captain Buell was a brother of Gen. Joseph Buell, and grandfather, on the maternal side, of Maj.-Gen. Don Carlos Buell. His children were: Eliza Buell, born at Marietta August 22, 1798, died August 3, 1823; Joseph H. Buell, born October 20, 1812; William Plummer Buell, born June 18, 1815; Milo M. Buell, born September 18, 1817; Hiram B.

Buell, born in 1824; George D. Buell, born in 1826; and Columbia Buell born in 1828. Of these, Eliza married Hon. Salmon D. Buell, April 9, 1816, who was the son of Hon. Salmon Buell, of Ithica, New York. Their children were: Gen. Don Carlos Buell born near Marietta, March 23, 1818; Sally M. Buell, born near Marietta February 26, 1820; and Aurelia A. Buell, born near Marietta, February 27, 1822, wife of Hon. William F. Curtis, of Marietta.

LIEUT. TIMOTHY E. DANIELSON. There is a degree of sadness connected with the life of this young officer who came to Marietta about the year 1804, from Brimfield, Connecticut. His father was Gen. Timothy Danielson, of Union, Connecticut, who died in 1791. The widow (his mother), Eliza Danielson, married Hon. William Eaton, of Brimfield, Connecticut, August 21, 1792.

Mr. Eaton had been for many years connected with the diplomatic service of the United States, and stationed in the Barbary States.

Upon his return to this country, in 1803, he had promised young Timothy a position in his suite when he should return. Mr. Eaton however, changed his mind, and took out a younger brother, E. E. Danielson.*

This was a great disappointment to Timothy E. Danielson, and he left home for the West, arriving at Marietta shortly after the departure of his stepfather in 1804.

Great care and attention had been given to the education of the children of Mrs. Danielson, both by General Danielson and Mr. Eaton, and young Danielson turned his training to account by teaching school in Marietta for several years.

At the opening of the War of 1812, Danielson was commissioned as lieutenant in the regular army, and July 29, 1812, he advertised for recruits—headquarters at Marietta. The recruits were taken for either three or five years. With what men he could raise he left for the front, and entered the Seventeenth United States Infantry. He was taken with malarial fever, and died December 21, 1812, at Fort Winchester.

Caleb Emerson was appointed his administrator, and among his effects was a large assortment of law books, medical works and a general assortment of other works.

MAJ. HORACE NYE came to Ohio when a child, August, 1788, with his father, Col. Ichabod Nye. From that time until his death Ohio was his home, and until 1833 his residence was Marietta.

He was the grandson of Gen. Benjamin Tupper, a soldier, and the son of Colonel Nye, also a soldier, and he was surrounded by men who put themselves under strict military discipline during the Indian war, while living in the Campus Martius. Thus he became a soldier himself, and was all through his life noted for his military bearing and soldierly qualities.

Though but a child, he shared in the privations and hardships and dangers of the garrison, and at an early age began to share in the toils, and to form habits of endurance and energy.

His life was coeval with the first settlement of the State, and the history and experience of its tragic scenes and patient toils and heroic sufferings were as familiar to him as household words.
